The chair was taken by Mr. James Oliver, who explained that he presided in the place of his father, the appointed chairman. He had a friendly word of introduction for all the speakers, and opened with a word of warm welcome home to the Rev. H. E. Dowson, and of gratitude for the kind courtesy shown by their Congregationalist brethren on that occasion. He said Stalybridge might be passed over as of little importance in the world, but for his own part he gloried in the fact that they had held the record for examination successes for many years.

The Rev. H. E. PERRY (Denton) moved the thanks of the Association to the Stalybridge friends for the way in which they had carried out all the arrangements. It was, he said, his first experience of a Good Friday gathering, and he should never forget it. He could not compare with previous years, but he could not conceive anything better than the arrangements he had witnessed there.

The Rev. H. E. Dowson seconded the vote, and in doing so especially emphasised the general feeling of indebtedness for the loan of the Congregational Church. A former minister of the same church had once exchanged with him, and he hailed this broader spirit as the death of narrowness and bigotry and the birth of true religion. The vote was carried with acclamation, and the Rev. W. G. Price replied.

Mrs. H. E. Dowson was the first of the appointed speakers, and her subject was "The Sunday School Atmosphere." When she was asked to speak at the meeting, she was away spending some weeks in the pure, sunny, health-giving air of the Swiss mountains. Unseen, yet full of power to restore and invigorate the life of the body, it was, she felt, a physical type of what the religious, moral, and mental atmosphere ought to be in which the young people were brought up. First, the school should be clean, bright, and wholesome. Then teaching should be attractive and cheerful. But beyond these there should be the kindly spirit of the teacher. Discipline should not be obtrusive; it should grow out of the spirit of the school. The school should have the atmosphere of a good home by securing the affection and interest of the scholars.

The Rev. DENDY AGATE had for his subject "the appeal of the Scholar to the Teacher." He recalled the familiar picture associated with Cassell's Popular Educator, "The child: what will he become?" There were always the two ways open, the way of sin and shame and failure, and the way of honour and respect. And the mute and unconscious appeal which the scholar made to the teacher was, Help me to love learning, to be just, true and kind, help me to understand and avoid evil, and, as I grow up, teach me to be consistent and honourable in my profession and conduct. There was often a great waste of energy in the school. The teacher must strive to impart good and helpful knowledge, to form and build up character, and himself to set the example he would have his scholars emulate. He commended to his hearers the study of Mrs.

Southwood Hill's book, entitled "Notes on Education."

The Rev. E. G. EVANS spoke on the subject of our elder scholars. He proceeded to argue that whereas the Education Act of 1870 relieved the Sunday-schools of the duty of imparting secular knowledge, the legislation of the near future would relieve the day schools of the duty of imparting religious knowledge. Would their Sunday-schools be prepared for and competent to meet the new situation? The test of our schools, as they now are, is the elder scholar. He is their finished product. The future supply of both teachers and congregations depended on him. He is the centre of all our problems. But how indifferent he is to his own importance—how careless of his great possibilities! The prime defect of the elder scholar is the absence of any definite consciousness of his theological and religious position. Mr. Evans proceeded to urge that the Unitarian Sunday-school should have a definite theological as well as religious and ethical atmosphere. The Bible should be the text book in all classes; amateur science should be given up; there should be more flexibility, especially in dealing with elder scholars. Mr. Evans closed on a note of hope and faith—provided the elder scholar were properly instructed, he would come to the relief of all our problems.

The Rev. CHARLES PEACH spoke on the momentum of character. He cordially supported and emphasised the appeal of Mr. Evans. The Sunday-school existed to build up character. It was a mistake to submit the results of its teaching to competitive examination. The only adequate examination and test of its efficiency was life. Did it make good men and women? Examinations must be directed to knowledge, but that did not necessarily mean that the scholars had been made better, truer children of God. Examinations were not loved of the natural boy, and the Sunday-school should be loved. It should teach by example, sympathy, and association. It should discipline by love. Every kind of teaching might be legitimate and useful, but only as a means to the great end, which was character. He had seen Sunday-school classes cramming up for an examination in political economy. How would that help a passionate lad, set in the glare of a great town, to fight his battles and meet his temptations? Knowledge must pass away. In the hour of moral conflict it is character which saves.

The papers and addresses were discussed by the Revs. W. R. Shanks, W. Harrison, W. T. Bushrod, W. G. Price, H. Dawtre, and Messrs. J. Wigley and O. H. Heys, and the meeting closed with hymn and prayer. The collections during the day amounted to nearly £20.

NORTH MIDLAND SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of this Association was held at Mansfield on Easter Monday, and there was a good attendance. The Rev. Walter Burgess, of Loughborough, preached the annual sermon in the place of the Rev. H. M. Livens, who was unfortunately prevented by illness. His discourse was based on the text: "Except ye become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter the kingdom of God," and it was listened to with keen attention and much appreciation by a sympathetic audience. The devotional part of the service was conducted by the Rev. Chas. Sneddon, the new minister of Christ Church, Nottingham.

A hearty welcome was extended to the delegates of the S.S.A., the Manchester District, the Midland, and the Yorkshire Associations. The Committee's Report was received with satisfaction, and the officers for the ensuing year were re-elected, with the substitution of Rev. T. J. Jenkins for Mr. Timmans as President.

In the afternoon Miss Emmeline Davy, of the Free Christian Church, Leicester, read a most interesting and stimulating paper on "Modern Methods in our Junior Sunday-schools," in which she dwelt especially on the importance of early life as the time of the foundation-laying of character. To a large extent, she said, a child's tastes, inclinations, and habits are formed before he is seven, and can only with difficulty be altered later; therefore the work in the infants' school is of vital importance. It should aim at forming habits of truthfulness, obedience, and courtesy; at developing trust in parents into trust in the unseen Father; and at creating respect for all forms of life as His children. It should unconsciously create love of the Bible, and should be a training-school for young teachers. In order to secure these results, the infants' room should be bright and airy, with suitable, comfortable seats and tables, and with provision for removing outdoor clothes, and with a musical instrument of some kind. Children must be approached by Eye-gate as well as Ear-gate, by means of pictures, objects to illustrate Eastern life, and especially by rough chalk sketches on blackboard or brown paper. As little children cannot give voluntary attention, the subject must be presented in such a way as to secure involuntary attention. There must be provision for the child to express his conception of the lesson, so strengthening the impression made by the teacher by his own self-activity. He should be allowed to reproduce the lesson or some part of it by drawing (with crayon on brown paper), by acting it, or by some Kindergarten occupation. All must be under the direction of an experienced, trained teacher, with a staff of senior boys and girls to help him or her, and to learn gradually to take part in the teaching proper. Miss Davy called special attention to the excellent books on this subject by Mr. Hamilton Archibald and others, published by the Sunday School Union.

There was no time left for discussion, but the audience was deeply impressed, and gave Miss Davy very hearty applause.

The proceedings concluded with a vote of thanks to the kind friends in Mansfield for their hospitality.

God's gifts a soul may selfishly appropriate; but God Himself, the more truly a soul possesses Him, the more truly it will long and try to share Him.—Phillips Brooks.

LEWIN'S MEAD DOMESTIC MISSION, BRISTOL.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting was held at the Mission, Lower Montague-street, on Monday evening, March 25. In the absence of the President, Mr. P. J. Worsley, through indisposition, the chair was taken by Mr. William Hall, and there was a good attendance of friends of the mission, including the Revs. T. Pipe, of Birmingham, and J. Wain, of Trowbridge, who, on the previous day, together with the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, had preached on behalf of the mission. (Mr. Blatchford was kept from attending the meeting by a bad cold.)

The CHAIRMAN, having expressed sympathy with the friends who, in a spirit of self-sacrifice, were doing such good work in connection with the mission, spoke of the obligations of citizens to their poorer friends and of the responsibility of Parliament and municipalities to make the conditions of life in the large cities as favourable as possible to the poorer people. Temperance legislation was needed; there must be less overcrowding, and there must be more education. The cost of education, he felt, was the best investment they could make. But they could not dispense with personal help and influence in the uplifting of weaker brothers and sisters, and that work must be done intelligently as well as lovingly. The best way to help the people was to show them how to help themselves.

Mrs. BROADRICK, the missionary, read her report, in the course of which she stated that quiet, patient work had been carried on, and deep and heartfelt gratitude had been shown by those helped. There was still a great deal of sickness and suffering in the district, the winter having been long, hard, and trying, and many had been out of work. On the other hand, it was pleasant to report that the penny bank had done well, considering the state of trade; £177 being deposited during the year, and over £172 withdrawn, and the good results accruing from the weekly visits of the ladies as collectors, and the kindly suggestions they were able to make to the depositors had been found most useful and beneficial. The practice of lending small sums of money had been much appreciated, and not abused, and had proved a great benefit in several cases, where otherwise it would have been impossible to pay rent and taxes when demanded. The helpful work done by the aid of the Poor's Purse could not be put into words—the sum of £61 15s. 5d. had been received and £58 19s. 8d. expended. The country visiting fund, by which the sick, as well as the convalescent, were sent into the country for a few weeks at a time, and the Mary Carpenter Guild for Christmas gifts, clothing, &c., had also done good and needful service.

The junior and senior girls' clubs must also be credited with useful and faithful work. The mother's meeting had been most successful during the year, with an average attendance of 33 members. In the autumn, by arrangement with the Bristol Educational Committee, a course of "Talks on Hygiene," "Management of Babies," "Food and Cooking," was given to the mothers by one of its lady teachers, which evoked much interest among the women, and it is earnestly hoped may result in some permanent benefit in their home life.

The Monday evening lectures, concerts, and socials had been a source of instruction and pleasure. The attendance at the chapel service showed an increase, the average number present during the year being 48 persons. The Sunday-school had maintained its efficiency with its faithful band of 12 teachers, the average attendance being 87 scholars. Mrs. Broadrick mentioned at the end of her report that she wished to resign at the end of June. Owing to the state of her health she felt it would not be good for the mission or herself to attempt another winter's work. She thanked all for the cordial support given her in the work.

Professor SIBREE read the committee's report, which offered thanks to all who had helped during the year in the work of the various agencies of the mission, and expressed regret at the resignation of Mrs. Broadrick, and especially on account of the cause which had led her to send in the resignation, for the committee recognised the valuable work she had done and the good effect of her influence upon the people.

Mr. J. K. CHAMPION, hon. treasurer, read the financial statement, which showed that the year was commenced with an adverse balance of £71 16s. 2d. That sum was wiped off by donations, and the year ended with a balance in hand of £3 3s. 5d.

The reports and statement of accounts were adopted on the proposition of the CHAIRMAN, seconded by the Rev. E. I. FRIPP, who remarked that no one could have heard the reports without realising that an important work was being carried on at the mission. The work had steadily increased and shown vitality since Mrs. Broadrick became the missionary, and that in spite of her recent poor health.

The following resolution was then proposed by the CHAIRMAN, and seconded by Mr. T. GAYLARD: "That this meeting receives with much regret the announcement of Mrs. Broadrick's resignation, and while expressing its cordial thanks and sympathy to her for her zealous and loyal service to the mission during the past year, trusts that a change of occupation may enable her to regain better health."

Mr. GAYLARD said that he was very sorry to be asked to second that resolution for he felt strongly that in losing Mrs. Broadrick they were losing a true friend and helper, and speaking on behalf of the Sunday-school, he would like to say how much Mrs. Broadrick's work had been appreciated. They had better discipline than ever, and yet it was a rule of love and not of fear, and he deeply deplored the loss it would be to the Sunday-school as well as to the mission.

The CHAIRMAN, in putting the resolution, to the meeting, also expressed his deep regret on behalf of himself and the Oakfield-road church.

In reply, Mrs. BROADRICK thanked all who had spoken in such kindly words of her work and service, and of her deep regret that she felt compelled to give up such a noble calling.

A resolution was proposed, offering the best thanks to the Revs. Thomas Pipe, Joseph Wain, and A. N. Blatchford, for their support of the mission as its preachers on the previous Sunday, to which Mr. Pipe and Mr. Wain replied, giving interesting accounts of mission work and words of encouragement to the workers.

The committee and officers for the ensuing year were then appointed, and the meeting closed with a hearty vote of thanks to the chairman.

PRESENTATION TO COLONEL PILCHER.

LT.-COLONEL JESSE PILCHER, V.D., J.P., received many congratulations on Tuesday last on the attainment of his seventieth birthday. Colonel Pilcher has occupied a prominent place in the commercial and public life of Manchester, but our Free Churches and their connected institutions have always had the first place in his affections. As Colonel of the 2nd Vol. Batt. Manchester Reg., and as chairman of the Stretford Liberal Association, he has come most prominently before the public, but those who have been privileged to know him best have felt that he always courted publicity with reluctance, and that he preferred the quieter paths of religious fellowship and service. There are very few of our Manchester institutions to which Colonel Pilcher has not rendered conspicuous service. He was for sixteen years hon. sec. of the Manchester District Sunday School Association, and for a lesser period he held the similar office in the Sunday School Union. For more than half his life he has been associated with Lower Mosley-street Schools, where, among the names most venerated are those of the three brothers—Richard, Albert and Jesse Pilcher. At present Colonel Pilcher is chairman of the Cross-street Chapel Committee.

During the last few years the energies of Colonel Pilcher have been almost entirely absorbed by the Home Missionary College. He was one of the first to recognise the far-reaching consequence of the Jubilee proposals brought forward by the old students of the college, and to him more than to anyone else credit is due for their realisation. It was fitting, therefore, that his colleagues on the staff and committee of the college should be foremost in their congratulations. A deputation from the College Committee, consisting of Principal Gordon and the Revs. E. L. H. Thomas and C. Peach, accordingly waited upon Colonel Pilcher at breakfast-time and presented him with the draft of the following address. It is to be illuminated and bound in book form. Colonel Pilcher consented to sit for his portrait and the commission has been given to Mr. T. C. Dugdale, whose portrait work exhibited in the Royal Academy and the Manchester local exhibitions has attracted very considerable attention.

"April 2, 1907.

"DEAR COLONEL PILCHER,—We, whose names are here inscribed, your colleagues in the General and Jubilee Committees, the Principal and Tutor of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, Summerville, greet you on the occasion of what, it has much surprised us all to learn, is your seventieth birthday. We trust that it may be long indeed before we realise, by any marks of age, that you have attained to three score years and ten. Half of this great number of years you have spent in the service of the College as a member of its Committee. That you have retained the Presidency of the Committee for so long a term as twenty years is evidence of the possession by you of qualities of character and of business capacity that have been invaluable to your colleagues and to the cause of the College. It would be difficult to exaggerate the value of those qualities at any time during your long service, but during no period were they so much needed, so much noted, and so much valued as when, at the time of its Jubilee, the College entered upon a new and ampler life with a larger outlook and with increased responsibilities. Only those of us who shared with you the experience of these latter years of anxiety and joy can fully appreciate all that you have been to them. Nothing but your steady patience and firmness, calmness and courtesy, and, perhaps above all, your unwavering faith, could have helped your grateful colleagues to enter upon so arduous a voyage, to steer so straight and speedy a course, to weather the sudden storm that overtook them, and to arrive safe and sound into the haven where they would be. In days to come, when men review the events of these days in the history of the College, they will perceive that it was no scanty triumph that then was won, and that it must have been no common faith that was then rewarded; and they will feel assured that there was somewhere an influence, however modest and unobtrusive, that was able to unite and guide the scattered forces to such a victory. In any retrospect in years to come the quiet but hopeful and persevering part you played will not escape the grateful notice of those who will value their heritage and understand how it came to be. Your friendliness to all concerned in the work of the College, and your interest in the successive generations of students, have perhaps exerted a greater influence for good relationships than we can any of us properly estimate, making many a crooked path straight and many a rough place smooth, and tending, by a natural and simple human touch, in the midst of routine affairs, to lighten every task.

"Some little portion of the gratitude we have felt towards you we take this occasion—very sincerely, however inadequately—to express, and should esteem it an honour if you would consent to sit for a portrait which we might have the privilege of placing upon the walls of the College.

"And most earnestly we wish you, in the time-honoured phrase, Many Happy Returns of the Day."

THE sweet sincerity of joy and peace which I draw from this alliance with my brother's soul is the nut itself, whereof all nature and all thought is but the husk and shell. Happy is the house that shelters a friend.—Emerson:

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Banbridge, Co. Down.—At the annual meeting of the First Presbyterian (non-subscribing) church, held on March 28, the Rev. Edgar Lockett in the chair, the hon. secretary, Mr. S. Bell, read a satisfactory report, which states that Mr. Lockett accepted a unanimous call to the church early in June, and was installed on July 20. There had since been increased attendance at public worship, and at the November Communion service almost double the number of communicants for some years past came forward. Mr. Lockett had a successful Bible class on Sunday mornings, and had organised a Band of Hope at the beginning of the winter, in which much interest was taken. The report of the Sunday-school was also encouraging, and showed that the school had practically doubled itself during the year. The head master of the Dunbar Memorial day schools submitted the inspector's report which was very satisfactory to all concerned. Addresses were delivered by the Rev. W. Weatherall, of Moira, and the chairman, who said there were thirty-four members in his Bible class, and the attendance were very encouraging.

Banbury.—The Rev. Geo. St. Clair, who has resided in Banbury and discharged all the duties of preacher and pastor at Christ Church Chapel during the past twelve months, preached farewell sermons on Easter Sunday. The attendance in the evening was the largest of the whole year, and included many persons from other places of worship. During Mr. St. Clair's sojourn the ordinary attendance has increased, and the general position and prospects of the congregation have much improved. The members were unanimous in wishing Mr. St. Clair to settle down among them, and the trustees offered him the appointment, but he has not seen his way to accept it. Regret is general, and on Sunday night the committee, in thanking Mr. St. Clair for all that he had done, expressed the hope that he would often come among them again.

Belfast: First Presbyterian Church.—The Rev. H. J. Rossington, M.A., who has been for the past six years minister of the Longsight Free Christian Church, Manchester, has accepted the pulpit of the First Church, Rosemary-street, Belfast.

Boston.—The anniversary services of Spain Lane Chapel were conducted on Easter Sunday by the Rev. Thos. P. Spedding, the newly appointed Field Agent of the B. and F. Unitarian Association. The evening discourse was on "The Atonement and the New Theology," in which Mr. Spedding criticised the views of the Rev. R. J. Campbell, as set forth in his new book.

Ipswich.—A special course of lectures in the Friar-street Chapel during the past six weeks on questions raised by the "New Theology" discussion awakened an unusual amount of interest in the town, and was attended by congregations numbering from 200 to 300. Many members of other churches and non-churchgoers were present. The first lecture was by the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth on "What is Unitarianism," followed by the Rev. A. Hall on "Miracles," the Rev. R. H. Fuller on "Judgment, Heaven and Hell," and the Rev. L. Taverner on "Incarnation," "Inspiration of the Bible," and "Atonement." Literature provided by the B. and F.U.A. was placed in the vestibule of the chapel and was much appreciated.

London: Peckham.—For many years prior to her death on March 25 (as recorded last week), Mrs. Harriett Harris had been debarrd by infirmity from the active Unitarian work in which she engaged in the days of health and strength; but her keen interest in it was manifested in various ways to the last. Born at Stratford in 1828, she was in her childhood taken occasionally by her parents (Mr. and Mrs. John Winder) to Hackney Unitarian Church, three miles distant from her home. She was trained as a teacher in the Borough-road College, and was engaged first at Chapel-street, Cripplegate, and afterwards at Effra-road (Brixton) Day School, retaining the latter position for some years after her marriage to Mr. George Harris of Deptford. At different periods, according to abode, she attended public worship at Unity Church, Islington, and Portland-street Chapel, taking up membership finally at Avondale-road Church. Both Mrs. Harris and her husband (whom she outlived by nearly three years) were ardent temperance advocates, and took a keen interest in the work of their son, Mr. A. W. Harris. Mrs. Harris was buried in Nunhead Cemetery on March 28, the funeral service being conducted by the Rev. George Carter.

Manchester: Longsight (Resignation).—At the annual meeting of the Longsight Free Christian Church, held last week, the Rev. H. J. Rossington, M.A., announced his resignation, consequent on his acceptance of a call to the First Presbyterian Church, Rosemary-street, Belfast, in succession to the Rev. D. Walmsley, B.A.

Newcastle-on-Tyne (Presentation).—On Wednesday, March 27, the members of the Literary and Debating Society met in the library of the Church of the Divine Unity to present the president, the Rev. Frank Walters, with a parting token of their affection and esteem. The gift, consisting of a set of valuable philosophical books and a silver-mounted paper-knife, was presented by the secretary, Miss Nelly Elliott, who referred to the fact that Mr. Walters had been president of that society since its formation in 1904, and spoke of the deep debt of gratitude they owed to him for what he had done for the education of the young people, and above all by his personal influence. They deeply regretted the severance of that tie, and very earnestly wished him well. In reply, Mr. Walters expressed his deep gratitude, and said that the love and loyalty of his young members had been a chief source of strength through a ministry of twenty-two years.

Newport, Mon.—The annual church meeting was held on Wednesday evening, March 27, there being a very good attendance. The report for the first year of the church's history as an organised body showed an encouraging degree of progress. Not only has there been a substantial increase of membership, but the fact that the congregation, who were almost strangers twelve months ago, have become much better known to each other, is bound to be a useful factor in future development. During the past winter classes, lectures, social gatherings, &c., have been regularly held and well supported. The financial report showed that the estimated income had been realised, with a few pounds to spare, and that a small balance remains in hand. The Rev. S. Burrows was cordially thanked for his valued ministry during the past six months, from which the church has derived much benefit. The following officers were elected for the coming year:—Mr. W. Pritchard, president; Mr. G. H. Llewellyn, vice-president; Mr. J. N. Bell, treasurer; Mr. W. Sutherland, secretary; also a representative committee. The "grand old man" of the congregation, Mr. W. Banks, was elected an honorary vice-president as a mark of the esteem in which he is held.

Saffron Walden.—The 70th annual tea was held in the General Baptist Chapel on Good Friday, and in the evening (for the third year) divine service was held, the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth preaching from John xiv. 28, "I go to the Father." On Easter Sunday Mr. Brinkworth commenced the 33rd year of his ministry at Saffron Walden.

THE MYSTERY OF NEWMAN. By HENRI BREMOND. Translated by H. C. CORRANCE. With an Introduction by Rev. GEORGE TYRRELL.

"The handsome and well-finished volume before us is one that everyone interested in Newman will feel bound to read, and will read to the end with unflinching attention. It is far away the best criticism on Newman that has yet appeared, full of cordial appreciation, and yet no unreasoning panegyric."

NATURALISM AND RELIGION. By RUDOLF OTTO, Professor of Theology in University of Gottingen. Translated by Professor J. ARTHUR THOMSON and MARGARET R. THOMSON.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE order of proceedings at the stonelaying of the Martineau Memorial at Norwich next Saturday, will be found advertised this week. Visitors from London who can only spare the one day can leave Liverpool-street Station at 10 a.m., reaching Norwich (Thorpe Station) at 1.15. Then, if they want to get lunch in town, they will find the old Maid's Head Hotel pleasant and convenient, and will have abundant time to be at the Octagon Chapel before 3.30. And for the return journey there is the train at 5 p.m. from the Thorpe Station (Saturdays only) reaching Liverpool-street, viâ Cambridge, at 8.25, and another at 6.22, viâ Colchester, due at Liverpool-street, 9.25 p.m.

FRIENDS who can stay over the Sunday also will, of course, be even more heartily welcome. And is it quite useless to say any more about money? It would be a happy thing, indeed, if for the Martineau Memorial that stone might be laid with no burden of debt resting upon it. It would be a happy thing, worthily done, and a golden memory in after years for the generous friend or friends who had made it possible!

PROFESSOR JEAN RÉVILLE, of Paris, has been appointed to the chair of the History of Religion in the Collège de France, which was held with so much distinction by his father, the late Albert Réville. We congratulate Professor Réville very cordially upon his appointment, and yet must regret that it involves his retirement from the Protestant Faculty of Paris.

A GENERAL SYNOD of the Liberal Churches of France has been held this week at Mazamet, not far from Montauban. We hope very soon to receive from Professor Réville an article on the position of the Liberal Protestants in France. We are very glad to learn that he is to be one of the delegates at the International meetings at Boston in September.

HEARTIEST congratulations to the Christian World, which this week completes fifty years of remarkable service to the cause of liberal religion. Friends should by all means secure a copy of the jubilee number, if it were only for the sake of buying such a penny-worth! But, of course, there are other and better reasons than that. In addition to forty pages of the usual size, there is a further supplement, reproducing the first number of the paper, dated Thursday, April 9, 1857; eight more modest pages, and in one corner of p. 3 some verses by "Marianne Farmingham" (was it so spelt fifty years ago, or only by mistake in this facsimile?), who is still writing verses as fresh as ever, and in this jubilee number, gratefully commemorates the fifty years, with a concluding exhortation to the young:—

"Face life with trust, and not with fears, God rules the years."

The history of the Christian World, as recorded in this jubilee number, is of the greatest interest, but we shall not tell any of it here. Get the paper and read it all.

MR. LUMMIS's translation of Professor Wernle's "Sources of our Knowledge of the Life of Jesus," the first of the New Testament series of the Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher (J. C. B. Mohr: Paul Siebeck, Tübingen) is published this week by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, as a well-printed two-shilling book. Professor Wernle has written a special preface to the English translation, which contains a fitting reference to Dr. Carpenter's "First Three Gospels," and concludes:—

"If many features in the old picture of Jesus are destroyed by this criticism, that is good: it exhibited so much that was lacking in love, so much narrowness of heart, which deserved to be destroyed; and Jesus will gain by its destruction. If, on the other hand, there is in the new image of Jesus—which is indeed, in our view, the oldest of all—much that remains fragmentary and doubtful, there is no harm in that. We trust that all knowledge and all recognition of truth makes for faith in God, who is truth itself. But the reader cannot be too often reminded of one thing, that Jesus was not given us to satisfy our desire for knowledge, but to actuate our will; and that the soul which best understands the picture of Jesus, be it the old or the new, is that soul into whose life the being whom it there sees is most deeply and earnestly admitted."

WE have been very glad to receive from Messrs. Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, of Göttingen, a new work by Professor H. H. Wendt, of Jena, "System der Christlichen Lehre," an elaborate treatise on Christian Doctrine. It is in two parts, making together a large volume of 676 pages (M. 15, or bound, M. 17). Professor Wendt, it will be remembered, was our Essex Hall lecturer in 1904. His well-known work on the "Teaching of Jesus" (Die Lehre Jesu), first published in 1886-90, reached a second edition in 1901. Both this and his "Johannesevangelium" have been translated into English (the latter by Mr. Lummis). This new book, after an introduction and statement of principles, deals with the Christian doctrine of God and of the World and Man, and then in the second part with the doctrine of Jesus Christ as bringer of salvation; the revealer, atoning for sin, and the Son of God; these subjects and the resurrection and ascension, as, indeed, the whole of the work, being treated in the light of the history of religion. Further sections deal with the work of Christianity and the Church, and with the doctrine of human Sonship to God, with a concluding chapter on Christianity as a whole, its character, truth, and value. We shall look forward with the keenest interest to the study of this work, and shall hope to give our readers some further account of it.

THE Scottish Congregational Union some time ago instructed its general committee to draw up a new code for the admission of ministers into its ranks. The Committee has now presented a draft of certain rules, the effect of which, if adopted, will be to establish a new symbol of orthodoxy, all the more dangerous because of its indefiniteness. The amount of testing that a man's creed is to undergo depends, curiously enough, upon his academic attainments. At the present time all ministers in the Union are expected to "confess their faith in Jesus Christ as their Saviour and Lord." But the interpretation of this belief is left to private judgment, and it is expressly provided that the Union, as such, does not require "formal subscription or assent to any doctrinal creed." Now it is proposed to alter this, and a candidate must (according to his scholastic proficiency) either submit in writing a statement of his theological opinions or must answer a set of doctrinal questions set before him by the Union. What the questions shall be we are not told. They may include a whole corpus of effete theology, and apparently may be arbitrarily changed from time to time. This is bad enough; but then the answers are to be considered and judgment passed upon them; and although the assessors of another man's faith may be both competent and fair, there is and can be no certainty that they will be either the one or the other.

WE are witnessing, in fact, another struggle of the retrograde spirit. It is strangely out of tune with the spirit of the age. Unhappily it is not an isolated spurt of dogmatic orthodoxy among our Congregational brethren, although it is a sad departure from every tradition of freedom which in the past the churches have held dear. They would seem to be tired of Christian liberty and to long again to be enslaved by the letter. Perhaps it is inevitable. There has been in recent years a strong tendency towards more liberal beliefs, and against every new tendency a reaction is manifested. But it is none the less deplorable, and we trust that these new rules will not be adopted in their present form.

THE income of Trinity Church, Glasgow (Dr. Hunter's), for the year 1906 amounted to £3,028 12s. 6d. Of this amount the sum of £1,200 was raised for philanthropic purposes, including £487 for the Children's Convalescent Home, Ravenscraig, which was started by Dr. Hunter in connection with the church seventeen years ago, and £458 15s. for home mission work. The stipend of the minister is £1,000.

DR. FAIRBAIRN'S attack on Mr. Campbell in the Manchester Guardian, in a notice of the "New Theology," has naturally called forth indignant protests. In last Saturday's Guardian Mr. Campbell wrote himself, deprecating any further reference to the incident. In the course of the letter he says:—

"Dr. Fairbairn's article I am unable to account for; it is utterly unlike him, and could only have been written in a moment of deep annoyance caused by something of which I have no knowledge. I owe him too much to wish to retaliate, or to see anyone else retaliate. I have known him more or less intimately for about fifteen years. During the latter part of my time at Oxford he was exceedingly kind to me, and, although I was not one of his own men, gave me a great deal of his time and much valuable advice, by which I have since profited in no small degree.

* * * *

"Somehow I cannot feel that he really means the personal attack he has recently made. A perusal of the following letter read at my induction when I came to London in 1903, is, I think, better evidence of Dr. Fairbairn's real attitude towards me than his article in your columns:—

"Mansfield College, Oxford, 30-4-1903.

"MY DEAR CAMPBELL,—If I could have come to your recognition I would. I see you as the minister of the City Temple with the greatest possible gratification, and it would have been a real happiness to me to have done anything in my power to have helped you in your great enterprise. I can only wish you all possible success.—Believe me, ever sincerely yours,

A. M. FAIRBAIRN."

"Dr. Fairbairn's strictures on my academical qualifications would scarcely be approved by my own college, and will not be taken seriously by those who know the facts."

Mr. Campbell was at Christ Church, Oxford, and when he took his degree was seriously ill during the final honours examination. But notwithstanding that fact, on the record of his work as a student, he obtained a second class in the Honour School of History and Political Science. Having told of this and quoted the cordial testimony of the Bishop of Oxford, at that time Dean of Christ Church, Mr. Campbell naturally adds: "The comparison drawn between my academic qualifications and those of the average Congregational minister is somewhat difficult to understand."

A LEADING article in the Liverpool Daily Post and Mercury of April 3 welcomed Mr. Haigh's "Sir Galahad of the Slums," as a book which in spite of obvious faults "throbs with reality," and in its hero reveals "one character of which any novelist might well be proud." "It is some achievement to have presented in the environment of slumdom such a pure, strong, and spiritually inspired man. There is his hidden romance deftly indicated; there is also his constant readiness to help those who have fallen by the way; above all there is the inspiration of his fine life on the lives of those around him, who need inspiration truly enough. He has not an atom of the prig. He is good gold all through, and in fashioning him for our affection Mr. Haigh has put the lover of fiction and the lover of fine human ideals under a deep obligation."

"SIR GALAHAD of the Slums," the writer of this article concludes, "is a book for the thinker to read, and for the reader to think over." And two days later a letter appeared in the Post and Mercury from Principal Dale of the Liverpool University, with the following warm appreciation of the book:—

"May I express my gratitude for your leading article on Mr. Haigh's 'Sir Galahad'? While in full agreement with your kindly criticism, and recognising not only the limitations but the defects of the book, I feel that the author has made us his debtor by writing it. For though the book is not a great work of art it is alive; not machine-made, but heart-made; telling us what a true man has seen, known, felt, hoped, and dreamed. It could have been written only by one who was both a man of experience and a man of ideals.

"The book is helpful in more than one way. It makes a distinct addition to our knowledge of social conditions in Liverpool; and though it is not always possible, even when we know what is amiss, to find the right remedy and to apply it, without such knowledge we shall not only fail to cure, but in the attempt to cure may do more harm than good. Mr. Haigh also reminds us of a fact that is too often forgotten—that social redemption is not a one-sided work, but that among the very people whom we seek to uplift (of them as well as in them) there are men and women ready to take their part in the work, and eager to grasp the hands stretched out to them in service and in sympathy.

"It does not surprise me that Mr. Haigh lays little stress upon distinctive theological convictions. They have their place; but their place is not here. The subtleties of metaphysics, the elaborations of creeds, and theories of church government, will serve us little in saving men. At close grips with human sin, and ignorance, and need, in the effort to change the conditions of life so as to lessen the difficulties of right living and to give human virtue a fair chance, two things come first—a profound faith in God, and a passionate love of Man. When society is converted—turned right side up—then speculation and philosophy may come in; but not before. In great religious movements men have grasped this principle by instinct. When the flame lit by Whitefield and Wesley caught the Churches rigid Calvinists forgot their creed and preached as if every man to whom they appealed might be saved if he would. And in the ethical revival of later years, those who held the sacrifice of the Cross to be the only ground of salvation, and that 'faith' is the beginning and the end, proclaimed with an equal fervour the gospel of 'works.'

"Mr. Haigh's book, I trust, will give a fresh impetus to the social work now carried on in Liverpool, and bring new workers into the field."

THE April Mill Hill Pulpit contains a sermon by the Rev. C. Hargrove, on "The Son of Man; His Prerogatives and Lordship according to Jesus." It is a most interesting study of the question what Jesus actually meant by the words "Son of Man," concluding that, as he used the phrase, it did not refer to himself as Messiah, but simply to man, and that herein he made great claims for humanity, not for himself in any separate sense.

THE Annual Choral Competition and United Concert of our London Sunday Schools is to be held at Essex Hall on Saturday afternoon, April 20, beginning at 3.30, Concert at 6.0. It is always a very pleasant occasion. The annual competition has done great service to the singing in the schools.

VERY great is the peace of obedience. When a man has his lot fixed and his mind made up, and his destiny before him, and he quietly acquiesces in that, his spirit is at rest.—F. W. Robertson.

LET us often repeat the beautiful words, "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none on earth that I desire in comparison with thee." There is no need to wait for a time of leisure, in order that we may shut our door and be alone; the moment in which we long for devotion may be also the moment in which we practise it. We have but to turn towards God within our hearts, in simple loving confidence.—Fénelon.

LITERATURE.

LITERARY NOTES AND NEWS.

THE chief literary event of the past month for a great many readers has been the expiration of the copyright of Ruskin's earlier works. Messrs. Dent and Routledge, with characteristic enterprise, have published rival popular editions. Either is a desirable possession for those best lovers of good literature, the people with short purses. Messrs. Dent's issue of "Modern Painters"² has an interesting preface by Mr. Lionel Cust, in the course of which he speaks of the book as consecrated by the dignity of age, and expresses the hope that its presentation in this cheap form will help to spread the gospel of hope, truth, and purity. The edition of "Unto this Last," by the same firm, has a preface by Sir Oliver Lodge, who thus gives welcome evidence that he is able to steal some time from theology and science, and the interests of the Commercial University, for the pursuit of humane letters.

Sir Oliver has also published recently a book on Electrons and a "Catechism of Faith allied with Science." It is needless to say that it is the latter book which has hit the mood of the moment. It has passed already through several large editions, and is the only rival to Mr. Campbell's "New Theology" in popular esteem. From all accounts the sale of Mr. Campbell's volume has been enormous. There can be no doubt that it is its freshness and outspokenness, its freedom from technicality, and its blunt criticism of conventional religion, and its methods, which have won for it such a wide popular welcome. These are the very qualities which have aroused at the same time the strong opposition of the theologians.

In this connection we must describe Dr. Fairbairn's bitter attack in the Manchester Guardian as the most regrettable literary incident of the past month. Mr. Campbell and his friends will only be helped to wider popularity by such abusive methods. It is the interests which Dr. Fairbairn himself represents, the cause of sound learning and patient investigation, which suffer seriously in the hands of such a champion. Certainly we are not attracted by this latest exhibition of the tactics of trade-unionism in theology.

Other theological publications, in themselves of importance, have been almost eclipsed by these showy meteors. Messrs. Williams & Norgate have published Cornill's "Introduction to the Canonical Books of the Old Testament" as a new volume in the Theological Translation Library. A small volume on "The Social Gospel" by Harnack and Herrmann, in the Crown Theological Library, is sure of a wide circulation. We are also glad to welcome the second volume of Lindsay's "History of the Reformation," which completes the work. Its style makes it attractive to the general reader, and its close dependence upon original authorities gives it value for the student. It may find its place in such good company as the Reformation volume of the Cambridge Modern History, and Brand's fascinating Hibbert Lectures. The latter, by some freak of forgetfulness, Professor Lindsay does not mention.

We are glad to see that Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton announce for early publication "The Man of the World," by Fogazzaro. It deals with the worldly career of Piero Maironi, the hero of Il Santo. Possibly it will diminish its interest slightly for English readers that they are thus invited to study the development of character backwards. No doubt "the Saint" was given first place on account of its psychological interest, and the significance it possesses for liberal Italian Catholics, as a manifesto of their attitude in face of the dominant claims of criticism and science, and modern political and social theory.

It is just this quality of the religious manifesto which weakens the appeal of the Saint as a book of strong human interest and artistic imagination. It contains powerful scenes but it is lacking in dramatic coherence. The characters are not convincing; they conform far too easily to necessary types. Anyone who will compare its clerical figures with the clear-cut portraiture of L'Abbé Tigrane will see this at once. A book by an English novelist which depicts the same clash between the modern mind and traditional catholic loyalties is "Out of Due Time," by Mrs. Wilfrid Ward. It has not had the favouring trade winds of advertisement, but the delicacy of its artistic treatment and the sincerity of its human passion should commend it to a wide circle of readers.

The Athenæum of March 30 devoted a long article to Mr. Lethaby's book on Westminster Abbey. It is the kind of book which makes the past live again, and offers the reader a delightful combination of historical research and artistic enthusiasm. By the way, Mr. Lethaby is the first to disinter the reputation of the crowd of craftsmen and artificers who erected the Abbey. Speaking of his careful study of those forgotten workers in stone and metal, the writer in the Athenæum says: "It is no exaggeration to say that the work opens a new chapter in national biography." But the best tribute to the worth and beauty of Mr. Lethaby's book is his appointment by the Dean and Chapter as "Surveyor of the Fabric," whereat all lovers of the Abbey will rejoice.

Messrs. Macmillan will publish very shortly the biography of William Allingham. It will consist chiefly of letters and diaries, the work of a man who had not only an original vein as a writer, but also an unusual gift for drawing the greatest of his contemporaries into the circle of his friendship. The same firm announce for publication in April Professor Raleigh's "Shakespeare," in the "English Men of Letters." Shakespeare has been one of the chief sufferers from the modern fashion for small monographs and popular lectures. When the lecturers are silent and the professional critic ceases to trouble, we shall perhaps discover that Shakespeare and the Bible, and sundry other books of mark, are meant to be read. But every rule has its exception, and Professor Raleigh is one of the authors who can write about great things with reality and distinction. His books on Milton and Wordsworth make us grateful in anticipation. Moreover, he has the saving grace that he does not publish too much. Unlike some writers of more noisy pretensions, he does not bombard us with a book every season, but gives us time to be expectant!

W. H. D.

DR. DALE'S HISTORY OF ENGLISH CONGREGATIONALISM.*

WE well remember, many years ago, reading for the first time a volume of sermons by Dr. R. W. Dale, and receiving the impression of a man of very noble spirit, instinct with moral ardour, strong and fearless, a preacher of Christ and his spiritual law as the only rule in all the concerns of daily life. Dale of Birmingham was a great power in his own day (he died in 1895) among the Non-conformists of this country, and as a theologian he was recognised in a still wider circle. As a public man in his own city he was a trusted leader, and in the great work of its municipal regeneration was closely associated with his friend, the late Dr. Crosskey, and with Mr. Chamberlain, as also in the work of educational administration and reform, and in an ardent liberalism. Now we meet him in another capacity, and with no less remarkable gifts, as the historian of Congregationalism in England. This was a work very near to his heart, to which he had devoted much labour. He had a whole-hearted enthusiasm for the ideal of the Congregational churches, to which the service of his life was given, and their history had been his constant study. But death overtook him before the work was complete. Indeed, although the greater part of it was written (and it makes a large volume of over 700 pages), the whole needed very careful revision, while the final chapters had still to be added. He had spoken of this to his son, Mr. A. W. W. Dale, who is now Vice-Chancellor of the Liverpool University, and asked him to write the chapter on the Institutions and Enterprises of Modern Congregationalism, even while he himself still hoped to finish the book; and it has now been completed by his son with reverent care, leaving it essentially his father's book, except for the last two chapters, the last giving an account of the International Congregational Council of 1891. It is a fine work, conceived in the spirit of the true historian and executed with great skill, impartial in judgment and restrained in manner, yet touched throughout by the fire of the author's faith and enthusiasm.

For his ideal of the Church, as a society of which Christ is the founder, and the constant living Head and Lord, Dr. Dale goes back to apostolic times, but very quickly launches out into the story of English Congregationalism, telling of the struggles of the early pioneers under Elizabeth. It is a story of fascinating interest, traced by a master hand. The picture of the Statesman-Queen is admirably presented, and what she did for her people in keeping the peace in those troubled times of religious conflict. Elizabeth could not compel all her Protestant subjects to uniformity, and this is how Dr. Dale writes of them and of others who did submit:—

* "History of English Congregationalism." By R. W. Dale, D.D., LL.D. Completed and Edited by A. W. W. Dale. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s. net.)

"Jewell and Grindal and Sandys and Parkhurst, who shared the scruples of the Puritans, but who, in obedience to the Queen, and for the sake of order, submitted to wear copes and surplices, and what was worse, took part in imposing them on others, were good and able men; their submission may be defended on strong grounds. It has been already conceded that the policy of the Queen to which they submitted may have saved the nation from those religious wars which inflicted permanent and immeasurable evils on Germany and France. They doubtless believed that in submitting to it, they were rendering what, in the long run, would be the truest service to the cause of Protestantism, and were averting immediate political troubles. To them, a calm and impartial historical criticism may concede the honours of practical wisdom. To the extreme Puritans must be conceded honours of another kind. To them must be attributed an immovable resolution to be loyal to conscience and to Christ at all hazards; a deeply rooted faith that no compromise with error can be necessary to secure the ultimate victory of truth; a vehement abhorrence of superstition and idolatry; a relentless hatred of priestly pretensions and priestly tyranny—and these are virtues which are more necessary to the life of nations and of churches than the profoundest sagacity; and they are more acceptable to God." (P. 100.)

Then comes the story of the martyrs, and after that, the Pilgrim Fathers, and the long conflict of the Civil War, with the triumph and failure of Puritanism, and then the last Act of Uniformity, and the ejection of the Nonconformist clergy. Of this Dr. Dale says:—

"The ejection was a great act of baseness. Charles was solemnly pledged to protect the men who gave him the throne, and his pledge imposed on the whole of the Royalist and Episcopalian party the most solemn obligations. It was a crime—less barbarous, less cruel, less tragic, than the massacre of the Huguenots in Paris ninety years before, but hardly less treacherous. There is, however, one great contrast between the French Bartholomew's Day and our own. The crime of the Guises almost crushed Protestantism, and by crushing French Protestantism, it rendered possible those enormous political and social wrongs which had to be swept away by the volcanic forces of the great revolution. But the English ejection was the salvation of the religious life of the nation, and of its religious and civil liberties." (P. 420.)

The eighteenth century, except for the rise of Methodism, is not a heroic period in the history of religion in England, but the story of the Nonconformist Churches is still full of interest. Here we come upon the Salters' Hall controversy, and the growing separation between the Presbyterian and the Congregational interests, as many of the former, both ministers and congregations, moved away from a strict orthodoxy towards their later Unitarian-

ism. Dr. Dale writes with impartiality of Unitarians, as of Roman Catholics, in his history, but not always with complete comprehension of their position. Thus, when he comes to the Lady Hewley case and the Dissenters' Chapels Act, he seems to us to present the case too exclusively from the point of view of the orthodox opponents, as though it were his own. In connection with the Manchester Socinian controversy he says: "In the four counties of Lancaster, Chester, Derby, and Nottingham it was asserted the Unitarians possessed but six chapels by legal and equitable means; and to the remaining fifty-six chapels, with all their endowments, they had no legal or equitable right or title whatever."

So with regard to the Lady Hewley case: "It was also asserted that they had obtained possession of funds left by Lady Hewley to which they had no claim," which reads as though "the Unitarians," as a separate party or sect, had managed to get hold of property which did not belong to them and wrest it from the rightful owners. But that by no means represents the facts of the case. For "the Unitarians" as a people worshipping in those old chapels, and holding the trust funds, had been there all the time in unbroken possession from generation to generation; what had happened was, that they, holding chapels unbound by dogmatic trusts, had moved on from the old orthodoxy of the earlier generations, by gradual steps, until they reached the Unitarianism of the end of the eighteenth and beginning of the nineteenth century. It is true that it was still a penal offence to be a Unitarian (until 1813) and therefore they could not legally hold such property, though it was their own natural inheritance; but when the cases arose it was generally felt, except by the ultra-orthodox, that a cruel wrong would have been done if they had been dispossessed; and, therefore, the Dissenters' Chapels Act of 1844 was passed to legalise their rightful possession. The purpose of the Act is not correctly described by Dr. Dale (p. 642) as though it secured possession to any congregation on the basis of a twenty-five years' usage. Where there was an orthodox trust no such usage could justify heterodox possession; the Act was to justify such possession only where there was an open trust.

Dr. Dale's chapter on "Congregationalists and National Education" will be read with special interest, and in the rest of the story we cannot forget how the writer himself was active in the making of the history. The chapter added by his son on "The Institutions and Enterprises of Modern Congregationalism" tells, among other things, of the establishment of Mansfield College at Oxford, in which Dr. Dale had a very influential part. (We note on p. 733 that the "New" should be omitted from the title of Manchester College at Oxford.) The last chapter, on "The International Council," forms a fitting conclusion to the history. Over that remarkable gathering in London in 1891, though it is not mentioned in this book, Dr. Dale himself presided. We cannot better conclude this notice of a work, which will rank as a standard history of Congregationalism, than with these words of his son's as to the men who united in that Council:—

"In loyalty to the principles of the Congregational polity, in conviction that Congregational Churches embodied a truth that they were called to maintain before the world, in consciousness that the traditions of their past determined the measure of their debt to the present, the men who met in Council were of one mind and of one heart. Their forefathers had fought for freedom—for freedom to obey the will of God as it might be revealed to them. It was for them to use the freedom so dearly won for the regeneration of mankind. The Divine Life in man, the Divine Presence in the Church, were the sources from which they drew their faith and their hope, their strength and their peace. The glorious ideal of the Christian Church as a society and communion of saints they too believed that they might—that they must—make real in the life of their own days."

* * * * *

"Meeting where they met, while reaching out in aspiration to the things which were before, it was not for them to forget the things that were behind. The martyrs who perished in the flames of Smithfield, the men and women who withered in the Fleet prison—they could not forget these. For it was those who thought Congregationalism worth dying for that had made Congregationalism a living power; and it was through the faith, the courage, and the obedience of those obscure believers and humble societies that 'the little one had become a thousand, and the small one a strong nation.'"

ILLUSTRATIONS OF ATONEMENT.*

WE can easily overlook the slightness of treatment and much repetition in this American book for the sake of its earnest directness and freshness in dealing with the essentials of its subject. The author holds that "every great theory of the atonement can be matched by a story of reconciliation embodied in some drama, poem, or work of fiction. Over against every prominent expounder of the atonement is a poet or a novelist who caught the same vision and proclaimed the same essential verity." And this proves "that the chief expositions of reconciliation between God and man have come out of the burning heart of humanity, and are not unwarranted conclusions of minds still in the twilight of religious knowledge." Thus, he selects his illustrations of the working of the human mind in this matter of forgiveness and reconciliation from Homer, Æschylus, Sophocles, Dante, Shakespeare, Milton, George Eliot, Hawthorne, Hosea, and Tennyson (an interesting parallel being drawn here between Gomer and Guinevere); and lessons are learnt from Job, Symonds, Whittier, and Walt Whitman. The manner of the writing is pleasant, and as far as possible from most theological styles, and the attempt is made to reach divinity by way of humanism. Perhaps some people would consider the parallels drawn between certain theological systems and certain works of literature a little fanciful; but a clear resemblance, at least, is made out between Anselm's theory, that the atonement of Christ was necessary in order to cancel the sinner's debt and remove the dishonour due to God's majesty, and the ideas expressed in the Greek poets. The further history of the doctrine in Thomas Aquinas and the Schoolmen is also parallel to Dante's insistence on "perfect justice" being done, even in the matter of forgiveness. The comparison between McLeod Campbell's teaching and Hawthorne's "Scarlet Letter" is most suggestive. Not least instructive is the remark that it is in the non-Christian story of George Eliot that Adam Bede, while showing a noble willingness to forgive Arthur Donnithorne, is unable to go beyond a certain point, for he says "There's a sort of wrong that can never be made up for." (We are reminded of the similar limitation in Mrs. Humphry Ward's "William Ashe," in withstanding the Dean's plea on behalf of his wife.) To Adam, forgiveness was possible, but not "reconciliation." This brings us to the very illuminating distinction which our author draws between forgiveness and reconciliation. He avoids the common mistake of reducing atonement to mere at-one-ment. Atonement includes two allied but often separate things. Prospero, e.g., in "The Tempest," "could forgive freely and righteously, if his foes recognised the true nature of their crimes, were genuinely contrite, and brought forth fruits meet for repentance. But the more difficult task of reconciliation is accomplished only when goodness has wrought its perfect work," when, that is, we are able to feel a glad acquiescence in the total result of all that has happened (as Job, Whitman and Whittier are able, and as Adam Bede was not). It is the possibility of reconciliation, in this sense, even more than forgiveness, that the modern mind feels difficult; and here it is interesting to notice that Mr. Dinsmore will have nothing to do with such explanations of the existence of evil as Emerson's (that evil is good in the making), or the Neoplatonists' (evil the necessary foil of good, a mere negative thing). And so nothing will meet the case except the complete triumph of good over evil. "Reconciliation is forgiveness plus that repose of the mind which can only come through an unalterable conviction that evil is either restrained or in God's wise providence ministers to the final good." The "reconciliation" that cannot take place in connection with Arthur Donnithorne is made possible in the "Scarlet Letter" by Hester's triumphant goodness.

How, then, is atonement made, and what are its conditions? We are glad to note that the author does not put us off with any popular version of the "moral influence" theory of atonement, which often "amounts to little more than this: God, in the life, sufferings, and death of Jesus Christ, so revealed his fatherly love and pity that men are persuaded to repentance and won to a life of rectitude. This makes Christ an actor and Calvary a spectacular performance." One of our author's strongest points is this: the moral influence theory fails because it is the calamitous consequences of sin that awaken conscience; it is not the spectacle of forgiving love that does this. Forgiving love only comforts and consoles the sinner after he is awake to the nature of his sin. (This point is proved by many references to literature.) And, therefore, in order that forgiveness of any sort may take place in a moral universe, "it must be so in accord with righteousness that the sanctity of the moral law shall receive no diminution." "The principle of propitiation to conscience, to the holiness of love, as a condition of forgiveness, is clearly recognised by George Eliot," &c. "Invariably, also, both in literature and in life, the austerity and authority of the moral law are revealed by the sufferings which the infraction of moral relationships entails." It is the sight of these woes entailed by sin that awakens the conscience in Guinevere, &c. But it is the sacrifice and suffering unto death of Jesus that has most powerfully had this effect; and it is in this way that he has "mediated the pardon of sin." It will be readily seen that this is no "substitution" theory. But it could be wished that the writer had universalised his explanation in such a way as to show the organic connection of all sufferers for the good, who are actually taking part in the world-atonement exactly in the sense (although in varying degrees) in which the word is used of Jesus. Unfortunately, the writer does not seem to know the good recent books such as Moberly's, or Rufus Jones's "Social Law in the Spiritual World."

Coming to the treatment of reconciliation, in the sense explained, the writer shows that what is wanted is, that we should be shown "immortal love outwearing mortal sin," and the world a redemptive process. This is possible because of the "indwelling God" who brings good out of evil. In this book He is called the "Eternal Christ," but the author does not mean by this the historical Jesus, and he admits that the "indwelling God" would be a better term. The conception of an "Eternal Christ" is a gratuitous difficulty. It seems to be brought in in the interests of "Christology"; and "Christological" notions are gnostical pitfalls for Christian faith. But it is pleasant to see that this illuminating little work is strongly averse to that pernicious emphasis on "Incarnation," which was in fashion twenty years ago (Allen's "Continuity of Christian Thought," &c.) and still has its back-wash in some ideas of the "New Theology." "Christianity's symbol is not to become the manger instead of the cross. Not what man is by nature, but what he can become by grace, is Christianity's enduring message."

INTRODUCTION TO THE OLD TESTAMENT.*

THIS is a student's book, and the general reader will probably find it extremely dry. The word "Introduction" is a technical term, and denotes the treatment of the two questions, "How did the several books of the Old Testament come to be written?" and "How did they come to be collected together into that group which is called the Old Testament, as a body of Holy Scripture?" The first question is dealt with under "Special Introduction," the second under "General Introduction." The questions are answered under the first head by investigations of date and authorship, the analysis of texts into earlier and later components, and under the second head, by comparison of evidence drawn from references to collections of O.T. books, or to the entire canon. Every book on Introduction, whether to the Old Testament or the New, deals with such problems, and thus there is no great scope for variety between one book on Introduction and another—at all events if the writers of them are masters of their subject. Each successive book that appears ought to mark in some way the points in which the author has carried the subject a little further than his predecessors, since there is no reason for writing a fresh Introduction unless there is something new to say that was worth saying. In the volume before us Professor Cornill appears to have aimed chiefly at giving a sketch of the present state of opinion amongst scholars on the general subject of O.T. Introduction, without, however, drawing special attention to what is new. That the treatment is scholarly is vouched for by the reputation of the author. The reader can, therefore, feel safe in the hands of a guide who knows his way through the tangled paths which the student of Introduction has to tread. But unless the reader be prepared to face a severe discipline, which necessarily excludes from its scope all the beauty and grandeur of the O.T., all for which it is supremely worth reading, he will leave "Introduction" alone, or look for some brief summary of the generally accepted results. It seems only fair to say this; because it may well happen that some one desiring to read the O.T. literature with more thorough appreciation of what is great in it, should suppose that he would find in an "Introduction" especially by a first-rate authority, just what he needs. And such a reader would probably be greatly disappointed, and wonder whether he must plough through that maze of J and E, of Rd. and Px., in order to get what he really wants. This is said not at all in disparagement of Cornill's book, but by way of caution to the general reader. The book is excellent, just as a good edition of Euclid is excellent, and nearly as dry. And, in consequence, the duty of reviewing it is not easy, especially in a journal like the INQUIRER, which is not intended solely for scholars. The author devotes some few pages to a discussion on preliminary questions, including a short discussion of the art of writing amongst the Hebrews; and also a brief summary of the present state of the question of metre in Hebrew poetry. This would, perhaps, be more in place in the section devoted to the poetical books of the O.T. It is true, of course, that poetry does occur in well-nigh all the O.T. books; but not surely in sufficient quantity to make it needful to treat of metre in the general prolegomena. The subject is one on which scarcely anything is as yet established and accepted among scholars; and, for the English reader who does not read Hebrew, it is unmeaning. Cornill himself does not add anything to the knowledge of the subject except a refreshing scepticism as to the value of proposed solutions of the problem which tear the Hebrew text into small pieces and read the mangled remains by fantastic rules. Following on the prolegomena, the books of the O.T. are dealt with in the order in which they stand in our Bibles. This, of course, is not the order in which they were actually written, as the subsequent investigation shows. But it is, as Cornill points out, the better order for a treatise on Introduction because the student starts with what is familiar, viz., a book known by such and such a name and ascribed to such and such a writer; and then he learns what is to be learnt concerning the contents of that book. If the contrary order were followed, the student would begin with the song of Deborah, and make his way down through the centuries, stepping from one passage in one book to another in another, in a manner likely to be very confusing. Cornill gives at the end of his book a useful chronological table of the O.T. literature, arranged according to the order which, in his opinion, critical research has established. (p. 537 fol.).

The general impression made on the present writer by Cornill's book is that of moderation and sanity. There is no tendency to drag everything down to a post-exilic date, or to deny historical value to an admittedly ancient tradition. Of course, a great deal of the O.T. literature is post-exilic, and in its present form all of it is. But critics have seemed sometimes unwilling to admit that anything authentic goes back to an earlier period than that great cleavage in the history of Israel. And I take Cornill to be a fair representative of the sounder criticism of the present day, whose results may be accepted without much fear of their being set aside hereafter, except to be corrected in detail. That Cornill shows here and there the usual bias against the Pharisees, or rather the usual want of comprehension of them, does not affect to any important extent the value of his work on the O.T.

As to the translation it is rather dull; and sometimes so clumsy that one wishes to refer to the German original in the hope that the author did not write so badly as he is made to do in English. Also, there are far too many misprints, especially in proper names. A misprint even in the table of errata leaves something to be desired in the proof reading. We would advise those who can read German to read the book in the original. They will better understand (for various reasons) the substantial excellence of Cornill's work.

SHORT NOTICES

The Fourfold Portrait of the Heavenly King as Presented in the Gospels, by "Interpreter," is described as "a new translation of the Gospels side by side with the Authorised and Revised Versions, quotations from the Old Testament Scriptures, and Parallel Passages arranged to facilitate comparison of the Gospel narratives." As a matter of fact it is the author's new translation which occupies the right hand page, throughout, in large type, while the Authorised Version, in smaller type, is on the left, with the variations of the Revised Version simply added as notes, and parallel passages from other Gospels in still smaller type below. The work traces out the author's attempted harmony, a scheme of which may be seen in the concluding index. It is a work of earnest purpose, presented in an interesting manner, which may have some value even for those who can least accept the author's view of the records. (Elliot Stock. Crown 4to. £1 11s. 6d. net.)

The Testimony of the Four Gospels concerning Jesus Christ, by the Rev. Charles Voysey, B.A., originally published in 1896, is now re-issued, the only addition, apparently, being a postscript to the preface referring to Dr. Martineau's "Five Points of Christian Faith," criticised in these lectures, which he afterwards told Mr. Voysey had been omitted from his own "Essays, Reviews and Addresses" as out of date. "I am morally with you, and only historically against you," he wrote to Mr. Voysey, and referred to his "Seat of Authority" as more accurately describing his present position. The entire inadequacy of Mr. Voysey's criticism in these lectures was noted in a review of the book, which appeared in the INQUIRER of October 10, 1896. (Longmans. 2s. 6d. net.)

CORRESPONDENCE.

INTERNATIONAL COUNCIL MEETINGS. BOSTON, U.S.A.

SIR,—Will you allow me to inform those of your readers who propose attending the meetings of the International Council at Boston, in September, that the Hospitality Committee will issue a circular in the course of a few weeks giving information about hotels and lodging-houses in Boston. Ministers, delegates, and visitors are each requested to pay a fee of $1 for registration so as to entitle them to participate in the proceedings.

Hospitality will be provided for all ministers, and for the officially appointed delegates of national, district, and local societies. The guests will be received on Saturday evening, September 21, and hospitality will be extended until noon on Friday, September 27. Ministers and official delegates will receive, free of charge, tickets for excursions and receptions, also for the banquet.

As one of the English members of the Executive Committee of the International Council, I have undertaken to receive and transmit the names of ministers, official delegates, and visitors from Great Britain and Ireland to the Rev. C. W. Wendte, and I shall be glad to hear from those who have not already informed me of their intention to attend the meetings. Copies of the booklet, giving particulars of the sailings and fares by steamer and of trains in Canada and the United States, will be forwarded on application to me at Essex Hall. April 9, 1907. W. TOWARDS CATHOLICISM.

SIR,—Those of your readers who have read the Rev. R. J. Campbell's article on "The Aim of the New Theology Movement" in the current number of the Hibbert Journal will have rejoiced at the liberal tone and fine spirit of catholicity it exhibits. Dissatisfaction is general among the earnest-minded: the influence of the churches is not what it should be. Is the time ripe for collective action? Are the present leaders of the various churches generous enough to so unite? Can we take the initiative in discovering whether a more charitable combination of forces is practicable? Is it folly to suggest that such men as the Editor of the Hibbert Journal, Dr. Edward Caird, the Rev. R. J. Campbell, Sir Oliver Lodge, the Rev. Joseph Wood, the Rev. Henry Gow, and the Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed be asked to unite, with others they may deem desirable, for the purpose of an exhaustive inquiry into the matter? The new reformation will not come without wise and combined effort; mere drifting will not give us that true catholicism for lack of which religion perishes.

ST. PHILIP NERI.

SIR,—The anecdote in this week's INQUIRER (March 24) seems a reminiscence of a story told of St. Philip Neri. It was put into verse by our good old Manchester poet and mystic, John Byrom, who is chiefly known to fame as the author of "Christians, Awake." The narrative, as he gives it, runs:—

"Saint Philip Neri, as old readings say, Met a young stranger in Rome's streets
one day;

And being ever courteously inclin'd
To give young folks a sober turn of mind,
He fell into discourse with him;—and thus
The dialogue they held comes down to us:

'Tell me what brings you, gentle youth, to Rome?'

To make myself a scholar, Sir, I come.

'And when you are one, what do you intend?'

To be a Priest, I hope, Sir, in the end.

'Suppose it so,—what have you next in view?'

That I may get to be a Canon, too.

'Well;—and how then?'—*Why, then,
for aught I know,*

I may be made a Bishop.—Be it so;—

'What then?'—Why, Cardinal's a high degree;

And yet my lot it possibly may be.

'Suppose it was;—what then?'—Why, who can say

But I've a chance of being Pope one day?

'Well; having worn the mitre, the red hat,

'And triple crown,—what follows after that?'

*Nay, there is nothing further, to be sure,
Upon this earth that wishing can procure.*

When I've enjoy'd a dignity so high As long as God shall please, then I MUST DIE.

'What! must you die, fond youth?—and at the best

'But wish, and hope, and may be all the rest?'

'Take my advice;—whatever may betide,
'For that which must be first of all provide,

'Then think of that which may be;—and indeed,

'When well prepar'd who knows what may succeed?'

'You yet may be, as you are pleas'd to hope,
'Priest, Canon, Bishop, Cardinal, and Pope.'

It is a fine homily on the futility of selfish and ill-directed ambition.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

BUILDING.

In our early games of pretending, some like best pretending to be somebody else, some enjoy most the doing part that comes first, arranging the place for the game, building the shop, or the hut, or the house, or the ship, or the castle.

In playing horses, half the fun is in making the harness and in building the stables, making the best of what we have within reach, adapting things for the purpose of the moment, putting old things together in new ways. With nothing more than cardboard, gum, string, scissors—and ingenuity—a summer-house, with a long bench, can be turned into a stable, having partitions between the stalls, and a manger for the fodder. And perhaps a little more imagination would even manage without the summer-house! When we are quite sure what we want to build we can turn anything into building material!

And what wonderful things can be built with a box of bricks! You have perhaps seen a toy shop, or a toy stable, that you have wished to have for your own. Some children have wonderful toys bought for them, but I do not think that the possession of such toys gives half so much pleasure as a shop, or a stable, or a station constructed with bricks. It is not the having, but the planning and making that gives most pleasure.

We do not need toys to make us happy, but to be able to make our own games, to make the most of our materials and tools, and to be able to do our own building.

To begin with, a child likes bricks because they can be upset, piled up, and thrown down again. It is the upsetting and the noise that pleases the baby.

Do you remember wanting to upset what the older ones were building?

Do you remember the disappointment of having your tower upset by a younger child, and having to begin all over again?

Each one of us in turn learns to find more pleasure in the building than in the upsetting—in the quiet, gradual building, than in the noisy upsetting that is done all in a moment.

At first we generally like just to build something high—a tower, perhaps—the higher the better, whether we are building with bricks, or stones, or sand.

But we soon find that it is not only height that counts. We can show as much skill in the plan as in the height of our buildings. It is more interesting to make a model of a railway, perhaps, with railway lines, embankments, bridges, tunnels, stations, and junctions. We may make the model of a city, with houses, roads, parks, river, docks, churches, and schools, or such a city as Stevenson describes in his "Block City":—

"Let the sofa be mountains, the carpet be sea,

There I'll establish a city for me:

A kirk, and a mill, and a palace beside,
And a harbour as well where my vessels may ride."

And for girls, it is much more fun to build your own doll's house with boxes or bricks than it is to buy a ready-made one.

A boy and girl who liked to make up their own games once built a model farm. Not having any live pets, they collected toy animals, and began by just playing with them in their little garden. Then one or two that would not spoil with rain, were left out at night, as if they were wild. There was a china cat like a tiger in a jungle of wallflowers and hollyhocks, and a tiny cow with a bit of sod for its field.

After a time the big cat disappeared, and some of the jungle was cleared to make room for sheds for more cows. Then a stable was built for horses, a pigstye, a fowlhouse, a dovecot, a pond for ducks and geese. Other farm buildings were added—a cart shed, a harness-room, a Dutch barn and granary.

All such buildings can be done quickly. But have you ever watched real building or helped in any way during the building of a hut or shed, a summer-house, a greenhouse, or a real house? If so, you will know what slow work it is, and how much work has to be done that does not show. The ground has to be prepared that the floor may be dry, and foundations have to be laid on which to build up the walls, that the whole may be steady and strong.

Only a very simple sort of house can be built entirely by one person. Generally many different sets of men work in turn at each house—stonemasons, bricklayers, carpenters, and so on.

One man, called the architect, plans the building, and others carry out his plan, some one part and some another.

Much of the work of the world consists in making and building—putting things together to make something else, building up by slow degrees from the ground.

Besides building houses to live in and work in, to play in or to buy and sell in, there is the building of roads and railways to travel on and of vehicles to travel in.

We all begin by liking building, and some grow up to be architects or builders or engineers.

Do the rest of us give up building when we outgrow our bricks and our games of building?

Or do we go on building as we may go on climbing?

Can we make pictures of life from building as we have done about travelling and sailing, and fighting and climbing?

Is there not something that we have each to build for ourselves, bit by bit, and day by day?

We build up our own tempers, our habits, our characters, our minds, and our hearts. We are building day by day, whether we think of it or not. Some people build without any plan, but you can see how much better it is to have a clear plan in your mind, and to try to build up day by day something as near that plan as possible.

Is it not something like following an ideal and trying to make it real?

The thought of building—with the slow, patient work it needs—may help us when we seem to be making but slow progress.

In this inward building each one is his own architect and his own builder. Each one builds up his own self.

And we can each do something towards the silent building that goes on all around us in our homes, and in our neighbourhood, be it town or country.

In Hymns for Heart and Voice (No. 137) is one about "The Golden City," the city of God, and it tells how we are all builders of that ideal city—

"Some can do but humblest service, Hew rough stones, or break the soil."

And there is also Longfellow's poem about "The Builders" (No. 282), which I hope you will read for yourselves—

"All are architects of fate,
Working in these walls of time;

For the structure that we raise
Time is with materials filled;
Our to-days and yesterdays
Are the blocks with which we build.

Build to-day, then, strong and sure,
With a firm and ample base;
And ascending and secure Shall to-morrow find its place."

CHILDREN'S FLOWER FUND.

SOME of you will remember that last spring I told you about this Flower Fund, and the good work its many helpers do in sending boxes of wild flowers regularly to the children in the London schools.

It is very pleasant to hear that what I then told you led several of you to take up the work, and become very excellent flower senders, who sent boxes regularly last year, and are doing so again this spring. But other helpers have fallen off, so that there are now about a dozen schools on the list unsupplied, and others are asking to have a share in the benefits of the fund.

That means that more helpers are needed. Think what pleasant work it is, and what great pleasure you will give to the children in London schools. It means getting the flowers and sending them off once a fortnight regularly. Think whether you could not do that, and would not like to help.

Let me repeat here part of what I said about this last year:—

It is very nice when the children in a country school agree to do this, and they enjoy doing it, I expect, quite as much as the London children enjoy having the flowers. But the children in any of our country Sunday-schools might very well take up the work (or shall we call it play, or pleasure?) if one of the teachers would see to the arrangements; or the children of two or three families who live near together might do it, or even the children of one family living in the country. It would be a good piece of guild work, too. But they ought not to undertake it do it unless they feel that they can keep up sending the boxes regularly during the school terms.

Anyone who would like to do this, or wants to know about the work, should write to Miss M. S. Beard, 20, Christ Church-road, Hampstead, London, N.W., who will be glad to tell you all about it, and send a paper of directions as to the packing and sending of the flowers.

Tin boxes are best, and biscuit tins (7 lb. to 2 lb.) do very well, and if you send a stamped and addressed label the box can be sent back each time. The Flower Fund will pay the expenses of sending the boxes, but, of course, where schools or families can afford the expense themselves it is all the better. While the children are asked to gather, and send the flowers, those who cannot do this can also help by subscribing to the fund.

OUR LIFE WITH GOD.

VERY different in character from Mr. CAMPBELL's book on the "New Theology" is that which we may call the companion volume by Sir OLIVER LODGE, "The Substance of Faith allied with Science: A Catechism for Parents and Teachers." * Not written like Mr. CAMPBELL's manifesto under urgent pressure to meet an immediate need, but slowly matured and carefully revised, as we should judge, in every line, before it was given to the world, the work of the Principal of Birmingham University leads us from step to step, in earnest converse, as it were, with a trusted friend, and in a calm atmosphere, undisturbed by the heat or stress of controversy, searching the deep things of the religious life. Yet it is in exactly the same line of religious development as Mr. CAMPBELL's book. Its aim is explicitly stated to be to formulate "the substance of religious faith in terms of Divine Immanence," affirming nothing but what is "consistent with universal Christian experience." It is an outcome of the same need of the modern mind in the light of science and history, fully recognising the progressive claims of knowledge, to secure to men a deep and happy assurance of faith. Such a work, from a man of Sir OLIVER LODGE's eminence in science, is of the highest significance.

The actual Catechism appeared originally, in a somewhat shorter form, in the Hibbert Journal of last July. There were then only sixteen questions and answers; in the book there are twenty, and one or two of the original answers have been revised. That, for instance, which spoke of strengthening our faith in the efficacy of prayer "by pleading the merits of the LORD JESUS CHRIST," now concludes with the simple statement that "we offer petitions in a spirit of trust and submission, and endeavour to realise the Divine attributes, with the help and example of Christ." Then in the book Sir OLIVER takes the clauses of the Catechism one by one, and adds notes of explanation and illustration:

It is true guidance for the teaching of religion, when he thus begins with our life as it is here on earth, and points to our perceptions of right and wrong, and our recognition of a Divine order, and the power we have to set our lives in harmony with it. We must come to the knowledge of God amid the things of daily life as they are, and as we are driven by inward impulse to strive to make them better. But it is to the knowledge of God that we must come, not simply to knowledge of the Universe, even though the universe be described as "a part of God." That does not seem to us to be a true implication of the doctrine of Divine Immanence. God is present in the universe, where power and wisdom, joy and goodness are manifest; but the universe, as the ordered world in which we live, manifests God, it is not God any more than we ourselves are God. There is a greater act of spiritual apprehension to which we rise, when we become aware in our own deeper life, in moral determination, in reverence and love, that we are with God, and He with us; as also in the ordered universe, in the wonder and glory and perfect beauty of His works, we are with God, and He is present, the Unseen and Eternal. But they which manifest His purpose are not God Himself. We may be truly called "sons and co-workers with God," as Sir OLIVER declares. But we cannot see the necessity or the spiritual truth of the sentence immediately preceding: "We are a part of the universe, and the universe is a part of God." We cannot fathom or comprehend the Infinite and Eternal; and it appears to us that we should be content to receive the tokens He gives us as tokens in the living language of the Spirit, but with the abiding conviction that He is other and more than they. The ultimate of religion is simply with humble, childlike heart to be with God, and to make our life a prayer that our FATHER's will may be done.

Thus it is that we cannot follow Sir OLIVER LODGE either: when he says that our conception of Godhead is to be reached "through recognition of the extent and intricacy of the universe," and more particularly in the loftiest spiritual development of man himself, and declares that "the most essential element in Christianity is its conception of a human God." It is when we rise above the intricacy of the cosmos to the supreme spiritual unity of the Eternal that we come to God, and the essential element in Christianity, we would say, is found when the human child comes to rest in the love which is more than human.

But we are none the less grateful for the helpful teaching of this Catechism:

THE RELIGION OF UNITARIANS.

LINDSEY, PRIESTLEY, AND BELSHAM.

THESE three names are inseparably linked together in the history of religion in England. "Never," says Priestley, writing of his retirement to Hackney after the terrible riots in Birmingham, when his chapel was burnt to the ground, his house ransacked by the mob, his books and papers and private correspondence scattered in the streets, and he and his family compelled to fly for their lives, "Never, on this side of the grave, do I expect to enjoy myself so much as I did by the fireside of Mr. Lindsey, conversing with him and Mrs. Lindsey on theological and other subjects, or in my frequent walks with Mr. Belsham, whose views of most important subjects were, like Mr. Lindsey's, the same with my own."

All three had been brought up in the orthodox Trinitarian belief. Theophilus Lindsey, the eldest of the three, had resigned his living of Catterick, in Yorkshire, and the certain prospect of high preferment in the Church if he had chosen to accept it. Priestley had been a student in the Congregational College at Daventry. Belsham, the youngest of the three, had been subsequently one of the tutors of the same college.

Lindsey was not a great theologian or controversialist. He was a devout and sincere man, and, when he found he no longer believed the creeds of the Church or found in its liturgy a truthful expression of his own faith, he ceased to repeat them, and sought freedom for the exercise of his own thought and teaching. Priestley was a philosopher, a man of science, and a theologian. Belsham was a theologian, a clear thinker, and an able controversialist, quick to see the weak points in an opponent's argument, and to take advantage of them.

The religion of all three consisted in an unshaken faith in "God the Father almighty, Maker of heaven and earth;" a recognition of the absolute and simple humanity of Jesus, the greatest of all religious teachers, having a Divine mission and authority such as no other teacher ever enjoyed; and a recognition of the glory and beauty of the universe as a daily manifestation of the goodness, wisdom, and love of the Supreme Being that created it.

To Belsham, especially, the glory and beauty of the natural world is itself an ever instant manifestation of Divine Love.

"I love that philosophy," he says, "which teaches us to see God at all times, in all places, and in all events; and I relish not that cold and cheerless system which excludes the Supreme Being from all agency upon and connexion with his works."

"God is the sole Architect of this stately frame. And God is Love. Infinite, immutable Love: the boundless desire to communicate happiness to a boundless multitude of beings, is the only conceivable motive which could induce an all-perfect and happy Being to the production of this magnificent effect."

And the recognition of the Divine Love

* Methuen & Co. 2s. net.

is the key to right conduct and the seal of inward peace.

"God is Love. Whatever, therefore, he requires of his creatures is for their benefit; and the amount of all his prohibitions is, do thyself no harm. His commandments are not grievous. The work of righteousness is peace, and the effect thereof quietness and assurance for ever.

"And we are explicitly and repeatedly assured from the highest authority, that love is the chief commandment, that it is indeed the fulfilling of the law. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbour as thyself. What precept can be more intelligible or more reasonable than this; or in practice more delightful? Universal obedience to it would be a source of pure, sublime, and universal happiness—a happiness approximating most nearly to that of God himself. For God is Love; and he that dwelleth in Love dwelleth in God, and God in him."

Lindsey, again, in his "Conversations on the Divine Government," says:—

"These plain intimations within, and interwoven in our very frame, of gratitude and love to God, and affection to our fellow creatures, can be considered as none other than the voice of God within us; his secret voice, by which He calls to the sons and daughters of men in all ages and countries, and teaches them their duty and the road to their happiness."

At the very basis of their theology and their rejection of the doctrine of the Trinity lies the belief in the distinction between God and man. To them man is not and cannot be God, and God is not and never was man. But this distinction does not involve a separation. It allows the closest possible communion; and the realisation of the communion depends upon the man. It is possible for the individual in a deep and real sense to alienate himself from God, or to come into the closest living communion with him.

Priestley declares that a vicious and profligate man may "live without God in the world, entirely thoughtless of his being, perfections, and providence." Such persons he calls practical atheists. With this type of character and attitude of mind he contrasts that of the man who cherishes the thought of God as his father and his friend; who lives, as it were, constantly seeing him who is invisible. "He sees God in everything, and he sees everything in God. He dwells in love, and thereby dwells in God and God in him."

Priestley is very far from confining the idea of this communion to his own theology, or elevating any religious dogma above the religious life and spirit. He recognises the divine law, the sanctity of the divine name and nature, the necessity of worship as a means of conscious communion with God. But, so far from insisting upon his own theology, he declares "Infinitely better were it for you to believe whatever the most stupid of mankind have believed concerning God than to disregard his laws, profane his name, or neglect his worship." And, again, he inculcates above all "that integrity of heart and life that genuine love of God and of mankind, without which all knowledge is but as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal"; and adds,

"Better had it been for you to believe in three hundred gods, and those of wood and stone, than to believe in the one only living and true God, and at the same time live as without him in the world."

Lindsey, too, warns his hearers, in his sermon at the opening of Essex-street Chapel that "No transports of devotion, no warmth of zeal for God and his true worship, will justify a man in the want of integrity and kindness to his fellow creatures, or atone for wilful continuance in immoral practice."

These men had no misgivings as to the distinction between right and wrong, good and evil, virtue and vice.

"The Lord knoweth the way of the righteous," says Belsham. "He knoweth all his sincerity, his grace, his fervent piety, his ardent benevolence, his love of truth, his desire of usefulness, his earnest persevering endeavour to approve himself a faithful, diligent servant, and to fulfil the duty of the part assigned to him. . . . He likewise knoweth the way of the ungodly, he discerneth all his follies and his crimes; his contempt of God and goodness, his confirmed habits, his fixed resolution to persevere in the paths of wickedness; he knoweth all his scornful and biting reflections upon religion, upon its principles, its professors, and its advocates, and all the pains he takes to seduce the young and the unwary into forbidden paths, and to make them altogether like to himself. . . . The way of the ungodly shall perish, it tendeth to destruction."

Their religion gave them not reconciliation with sin, but the strength to pursue righteousness in the spirit of peace.

It gave to Priestley strength to bear up against persecution, and the destruction of all that he held most valuable in this world, and the violation of the sanctities of his private correspondence, and the abuse of a furious mob against his political aspirations and his religious faith.

It gave to Lindsey, as Belsham says, "That deep commanding sense of piety towards God, which was the master-spring of all his actions, and the true key to his whole conduct in life : : : that generous zeal for civil and religious liberty, that magnanimity of soul under losses and persecutions, that cheerful and thankful spirit which never deserted him, that Christian patience which no suffering could exhaust, that entire devotedness to God, that dutiful resignation to his will and firm confidence in his promises which no adversity could shake."

"During the whole of his illness," says William Frend, in his memoir of Lindsey, "no complaints escaped him. He was ever cheerful, ever ready to enjoy what remained of the comfort of life with thankfulness to his Maker. . . . Almost the last words that he uttered articulately were, 'Whatever God wills is best.'"

"They who possess the filial spirit of the Christian Religion," says Belsham, "learn not only to abstain from all fretfulness and murmuring under the visitations of divine Providence, but also to bear losses, sufferings, and bereavements with quiet submission, with dutiful resignation, with cheerful hope, and even with gratitude and thankfulness."

THE RELIGIOUS CRISIS IN FRANCE AND ITALY:

ITS INTENSITY—ITS ORIGIN—ITS MANIFESTATIONS IN FRANCE—IN ITALY—CONCLUSION:

By PAUL SABATIER.

Translation of the Article in the "Hibbert Journal" of January, 1907.

By E. L. H. THOMAS, B.A.

II.

Its Manifestations in France.

So far, I have almost confined myself to statements without proofs, and have repeated that the crisis exists, that it is deep-seated, and has assumed an importance that cannot easily be exaggerated. It is time now to be more precise, and to offer names and facts.

The religious crisis is manifesting itself in all directions at once, and there is not a thing, not even excluding the Liturgy, that is not in process of being, not overthrown, but quickened from the standpoint of evolution. Instead of seeing in the Liturgy a mass of formularies, criticism, by dint of science and love, is finding within them the gradual effect of the labour of the centuries, and the memorial of the paths along which poor humanity has wended its way towards a conception of religion ever more deep, efficacious and spiritual. Hence the need for the study of all those odd and repellent formularies, which, at first sight, might seem a tedious collection of the errors of the human mind, a study which now is invested with a new method, and a new importance, as displaying the history of the soul of a people, the ancestral soul of a people, to which our own soul is still inevitably bound by so many delicate bonds.

Nay, more, the Pagan formularies, the presence of which in the Catholic Liturgy has so often astonished and repelled the Protestants are susceptible now of explanation and illumination, and assume a new significance and value of their own. They constitute a part of our heritage. To destroy them, to expel them, would be as inept as to go straightway and destroy the Coliseum or the Acropolis, under the pretext that these monuments no longer correspond to anything in the state of our present moral life.

I have spoken of the Liturgy because it was perhaps easier to tell of the labour of the reform that is in process of transforming and reconquering it, but, indeed, there is no province of religious thought or even of human activity that entirely escapes the energetic attention of the young Catholics. Exegesis, dogmatic, history and philosophy were the first to be approached, but politics, pedagogics, and the very conception of the sacerdotal ministry, are likewise in course of transformation under our very eyes. You have but to read the works of M. Klein, M. Fonsegrive, and of M. Fogazzaro, to find a type of priest, of which neither the Council of Trent, nor the Council of the Vatican, had even so much as dreamt. Now this conception is virtually victorious, and its strength lies in the fact that it has followed quite legitimately and naturally from the ancient conceptions, and is not a contradiction, but an expansion of them.

The Catholic Crisis was revealed to the general public through the agitation in connection with the name of M. Loisy, but we have just gathered that it took its rise much further back, and that M. Loisy, far from being the originator or sole labourer in the field, is but one of its numberless expressions. But he is the adequate expression of it, so to speak, as touching the most delicate problems, and as investing everything with a new spirit.

In fact, the more admirable the labours of Protestant exegesis are, the easier it was to remodel them purely and simply, and beginning them afresh, succeed in perfecting them. Now, what M. Loisy did was quite another thing.

Whatever external resemblances there may be between his exegesis and the exegesis of Protestantism, they are, for all that, completely different, because their methods are totally opposed to each other. Protestant exegesis starts out from a scientifically abstract conception, quite bare, so to speak, and unrelated. Its business is to discover the thought of the author. This effort to discover the thought of the author is not, it is true, for M. Loisy a matter of secondary importance, but it takes in his system a second place. Our exegete starts out with a concrete conception, with a conception of a fact, a conception at once past and present, the conception of the church, of that society, equally difficult to define, and yet more visible and more productive of energy than the political society. The sacred books are, to be sure, the expression of the thoughts of men, but they are, to begin with, and above all, the expression of the life of the Church which adopted these and no others, and discriminated them from others.

M. Loisy is a marvellous exegete, second to none of the princes of this science, where study of details is concerned; but, admirable as are his works for their erudition, they could have had nothing but a scientific influence had they only been erudite and nothing more. Their importance and resounding fame in men's minds spring from quite another cause. They spring from the circumstance that this savant, although suspected of heresy in certain Catholic quarters, is actually in the act of constructing one of the bases of the Catholicism of to-morrow.

A time comes when the scientific apprehension of the text no longer suffices, when, baffled, as it were, it comes to a standstill, and when it waits to be completed and crowned by that feeling of communion which unites us with the past. It is our thought that is here in question, inasmuch as it is the thought of our ancestors. It belongs to us. These ideas, be they fetishistic or grandiose, childish or coarse, have been thought by men who set out on that pilgrimage to truth, with which we ourselves are now associated. It is in such an atmosphere as this—composed of love, of reverence, of liberty, and of the need for progress—that exegesis ceases to be a dead science. Now, it is this resurrection that M. Loisy has effected, and that is why, in all the seminaries of Europe, there are young priests whose eyes brighten with intense joy when they can approach any happy mortal who has paid a visit to Garnay, and who can give them news of this modest, silent man, who has opened up new horizons to their intelligence and to their heart.

A large part of the general public has seen little of all this except from the outside. M. Loisy has had, unfortunately, many historiographers who were not all endowed with the fine and plastic intelligence of M. Paul Desjardins.* They were, in the main, keenly anxious to keep their readers rapidly posted up with information. The difficulties encountered by M. Loisy as he proceeded, and the condemnation of the Index, contributed, in no small measure, to mislead opinion, and to represent him as a rationalistic priest, or in some vague way a rebel against the Church.

Whilst at the Ecole des Hautes Etudes, M. Loisy was reviving the science of Exegesis, others, whose names are less popular, but whose influence has been no less profound, were likewise labouring—often enough without knowing it—to impart to Catholic thought a new orientation, men like Messrs. Maurice Blondel, Edouard Le Roy, and Père Laberthonnière, and others, again, whom it were better not to mention by name, so as not to expose them to the blind piety of their adversaries, have made many disciples and sown seed that is springing up on all sides. Nothing, as a matter of fact, would be more mistaken than to suppose that the Catholic crisis is the work of a little clan of intellectuals, entirely out of touch with the mass of the people. It has penetrated everywhere and everybody. The cohesion of the movement, which betrays no evidence of being deliberately organised, is nevertheless perfect. And there can be no better proof of this than the fact that if you except the politico-clerical press, sunk as in a quagmire, in its dream of reaction, and magazines of good works, not to say business magazines, it can be maintained, whether people like it or not, that nearly all the Catholic periodicals have opened their columns, at some time or other, to articles imbued with the new ideas. Is not this the evidence of a thing that is alive?

It would not be difficult to enumerate a whole series of reviews of which the same could be said—the Revue du Clergé Français, the Correspondant, the Annales de Philosophie Chrétienne, the Revue d'histoire et de Littérature, the Quinzaine, Demain.†

This is a hasty enumeration, given haphazard, and I must certainly have forgotten some. Perhaps the janissaries of orthodoxy will compass the extinction of one or other of them. Well, they will speedily reappear, the day after, under new names, in better fighting form by reason of their struggles, and rid of some portion of their retrograde elements. If the Roman authority listened to the denunciations daily levelled at it, it would comprise in its reprobation, besides the periodicals already enumerated, nearly all the recent productions, and in this number would, first of all, be included the Semaines Sociales and the Sillon. Hatred and fear have a strange way of sharpening men's perceptions. The denunciators are right. For assuredly the Semaines Sociales, as well as the Sillon, however far they may imagine themselves removed from Loisy or from Fogazzaro, are manifestations, on a different soil of the self-same stirring of the sap.

In Italy.

In Italy the same causes are producing the same effects, with an indefinable element intermingled. A more popular, plastic, eloquent, and sunny element marks the movement.

Names crowd to our lips, names of venerable prelates, yet bold and optimistic as young combatants of twenty; names of young men who, like the saints of old, are renouncing luxury and light pleasures to delve their furrows like any labourer of the field; names of shy saints with dreamy eyes, artless, fresh, and vigorous, close kindred to those of whom Donatello was thinking when he created his St. George; names of women who have earned the signal glory of being calumniated for their activity and their convictions, by the clerical press and the virtuous Jesuits!

The characteristic of the religious crisis in Italy has been that it has placed in the same rank social and scientific concerns, and that it has comprehended that the same impulse which was leading men to seek new scientific methods was likewise leading them to seek modes of new action in relation to political and sociological questions. The publications of the Abbé Murri not only approach social questions with entire candour, but they are likewise admirable instruments of intellectual training.*

In his case, as in the case of his disciples and friends, who are now widely scattered throughout Italy, one feels the passion for liberty and Italianity which opens a way for them to all hearts. Italianity is an emotion so complex and so profound that it is well-nigh impossible to define it. Italianity possesses nothing visibly in common with the nationalism so frequently met with in other countries. It is, on one side, a feeling of the beauty of the Italian land, and of the originality of its genius; and on another side, it is the clear comprehension that without Italy the evolution of humanity would lack one of its essential factors. Nor does Italianity take as its basis a sentiment of egotism or pride, or, in a word, a hateful, withering, and sterile particularism; but, on the contrary, it springs from a deep sense of the co-operation of all nations, and from an energetic instinct of love and solidarity.

When one remembers that the Abbé Murri has barely attained his thirty-fifth year, and when one realises all that he has so far accomplished, and when one contemplates the ever increasing number of journals and reviews that, throughout the Peninsula, spread his views and his new methods of work, it is, indeed, a subject for marvel. If the results are so prolific and so deep-seated, it is owing to the fact that the Abbé Murri has been favoured by the best kind of co-operation—the co-operation, that is, of circumstances.

He has had the good fortune to be able to sow the seed on a thoroughly prepared soil.

His work is not known outside the borders of Italy so well as it deserves to be known. This arises, no doubt, from the circumstance that his work is characterised by thoroughness and efficiency. The young Italian Catholics study and act, and hitherto they had hardly produced a literature, when lo! this very year their voice was so raised as to be heard throughout Europe and beyond.

In his Santo, in fact, M. Fogazzaro appears as the herald of the new school. All the prepossessions, the ideas, and the aspirations of the Catholic élite find expression through his pen, with an amplitude and harmony which constitute this book a landmark in the history of religion. Its beauty consists in the sincerity that is the fruit of a realised experience.

By his past, and by temperament, M. Fogazzaro was, in all departments of his life, what may be called a conservative. But he has been not only courageous enough to think his thought to a logical conclusion, but also, as a consequence, to exemplify his thought in practice, and become the apostle of the Catholic revival.

His book, therefore, is the story of a soul, but of an eminently representative soul. Whilst he is narrating the story of an individual crisis, he is also relating the story of the crisis which is unfolding itself in the case of the élite of the Church, and he has contributed to its solution. And with him, and with his hero, thousands upon thousands of consciences have passed out of a Catholicism of birth, or chance, or habit, into a personal, conscious, and fruitful Catholicism.

So, then, in the case of Murri, as in the case of Fogazzaro, the very basis of Catholicism, instead of being a passive obedience, an acceptance of a yoke, and a renunciation, is, on the contrary, an active, joyous, reasoned obedience, an affirmation, a fulness of life, and an ascension.

This is the explanation of the vast success that has attended the new point of view. His adversaries, to explain these things, have conjured up the existence of some conspiracy or other and dark machinations. In reality, these ideas have an ally in the depths of every heart, and there would be no difficulty in enumerating the names of priests who but yesterday were the implacable adversaries of the young Catholics, but who to-day are resolute followers.

I mentioned just now the seminaries, where the unfolding and diffusion of the new methods were so rapid; but nothing, really, escapes this influence, inasmuch as the same needs of work and of liberty are experienced by every mind, and I could cite a certain convent of Dominican ladies where the letters of Father Tyrrell were read with enthusiasm, and whence flowers were sent to the monument of Savonarola.

And the evolution of Tommaso Scotti, far from being an isolated or individual instance, is an eminently representative case. Scotti belongs to the most aristocratic circles of Milan, but he had the good fortune to find amongst the clergy entrusted with his education a man of an incomparable intellectual and moral standing. The pupil has been worthy of the master, and it is true to say that Scotti, who is only now about twenty-eight years of age, has not ceased to put into practice his ideas with an ever-increasing intensity and sincerity. The war that political and religious conservatism has declared against the young Catholics has only resulted in deepening his reflection and inducing him to strengthen his positions, and ultimately to write to the Abbé Murri a public letter of ardent sympathy, with the information that henceforth, in the struggle, he would take his stand side by side with him.* This letter ought to be read by all who would understand the movement which is impelling all that is best in Italy, not, I cannot too often repeat, towards revolt and doctrinal negation, but towards an intensity of life and thought of which the doctrinal affirmations of yesterday were the groundwork, the project and anticipation.

Ecclesiastical authority has long been likened to a mother. No comparison could be more just or more fruitfully suggestive, for the authority of parents, being absolute in principle and absolute in fact during the infancy of the child, is in a state of perpetual change. Its true function is to strive to render itself unnecessary.

But there are occasionally to be found parents who do not grasp this transitional function that Nature has assigned to them. They behave as if children were made for them and not they for children. Their intentions are excellent, but they compass nothing but the misery of their children. For, whether the children revolt or simply submit, the result is equally deplorable.

Now, Ecclesiastical authority is actually pursuing a similar course of mistaken actions. The good child, who does not make a noise, is her ideal. She loves her children, but when she sees them climbing up on to a stool to look through the window she confiscates the stool and then condemns the window. To all her sons eager for life and space and light she would like to reply, like a religious lady of my acquaintance, "Come, my darling, here are scissors and paper; amuse yourself in cutting out paper flowers."

There comes a time when we don't want to cut out paper flowers, or when we can no longer do so.

This tendency to coddle, and to treat men as eternal minors, is the natural rock on which all authority threatens to go to wreck, but never had such a glaring instance of it been seen as in the case of the Papal Bull Pieni l'animo of July 22, 1906, addressed by Pius X. to all the Bishops of Italy. It may be truly said that the Pope put his whole soul into it. Here you can far better get at him and study him than in the Encyclicals on the Separation, or in the Papal Bulls on his accession to the Pontificate, which allowed far less liberty and originality to his pen. Not that the Papal Bull Pieni l'animo possesses any originality, but its lack of it to such an extraordinary degree constitutes for it a claim to originality.

These pages ought to be read, displaying as they do in every line either a defence or a threat, in every paragraph a sort of chain, wherein authority appears before us only in its aspect of coercion, negation, prohibition, where it shows itself discouraged and discouraging, haughty and vanquished, bitter, acrid, morbid, and, into the bargain, strange, indifferent, or hostile to all the causes towards which her children's hearts are irresistibly escaping.

What will be the consequences? Some of the Italian Catholics will find no hardship in submission. In the Church, as in the family, there are big fellows of eighteen who still love to play with dolls and cut out paper figures. Rickety intellects, they will go on making paper flowers, they will go on being created Papal chamberlains of the cloak and sword, or knights of the order of the golden spur.

From others, Pius X. will exact a quite external loyalty, under which will be concealed scepticism, indifference, sarcasm, and, it may be, the epicureanism of the practical life.

Others, finally, will break the chain, and, in my opinion, they will be in the wrong. But for the mass of the people things will continue to proceed as in a family: "Il tempo è galant l'uomo," says the Italian proverb. Time will solve many problems which at present seem quite insoluble. We must not be in too great a hurry.

The act of Pius X. has only been enthusiastically welcomed by the Voltairian Conservatives, zealous to support a Church which they hope will repay them with usury. As for the true Catholics, they have extended to it a respectful but sorrowful reception. Pius X. will not understand, but the successor that the future reserves for him is, it may be, even now taking account of the elements that cannot be coerced, in that movement which is drawing the young to gaze on new horizons. And, who knows? perhaps the successor of the successor will take account of what in that movement is beautiful and saintly. I shall be reminded, no doubt, of the immutability of the Papacy. But that is a one-sided and erroneous view which we only ought to have accepted under the law of non-liability to obligations beyond the sufficiency of the assets.

Conclusion.

If I have made myself clearly understood, it should not be difficult to see that young Catholicism, far from constituting a revolt, is a revival; far from representing a tendency to unbelief, it is a tendency of faith. And it is obvious that if the innovators, as they are called, are on such comfortable terms with Protestants, if they do not morbidly fight shy of them, as hitherto was the wont, that is because they have gone beyond them, and because the Protestant doctrine appears to them like the authentic sister of scholasticism, and, at once, as respectable and as ephemeral as her elder sister.

Clericalism was on the point of turning the Church into a sect. These others (the young Catholics) recall her old name of Catholic, and intend that the reality shall correspond to the word. They intend to be the heirs of all the past, heirs who are turning to account their heritage, and whose gaze is directed to the future to prepare it.

Hence that odd title, at first sight, of Demain (to-morrow) and of Domani (to-morrow), which two periodicals have, without collusion, simultaneously adopted, in France and in Italy. How many journals are there which, if they divulged their programme, ought to be entitled Hier (yesterday)?

It is not, then, for them a question of not thinking, but of thinking, in abridgment, all the thought of the centuries, not so as to choose from them a particular instant, as the eclectics might do, but so as to furnish this tradition with a new link. By reason of these prepossessions they find themselves on a level with contemporary thought and with the aspirations of the proletariat.

These it is who also chant the song of emancipation, for they are preparing for it. As they hear their song of liberty and see them toiling manfully, many of the people will come to understand that genuine liberty is no mere child's play, but the need to assume full responsibility for one's own life, so as to work harder and work better.

The unity of the Church, which, so far, had been above all things, disciplinary and doctrinal, begins to assume a fuller, intenser, and more efficacious meaning. It is a union of living forces, not for any one given effort, but for the advancement of the New Heaven and the New Earth spoken of in the Bible.

The young Catholics are thus more Catholic than their elders, for they comprehend more. Ardent and generous, they advance to meet those who are yet unknown to them, and, seeing them afar off in the dimmest distance, they make ready to bless them. In all this there is no capitulation to unbelief, no make-shift opportunism, no mere insipid religiosity. But there is in all this not only the feeling, but the realised experience, that we are all brothers. There is, in all this, love and faith, faith that in raising up before our eyes future realities, helps us to prepare them.

Far indeed are we removed from the sectarianism and the clericalism that of old reigned alternately in France. Their power is far enough from being extinct, but the force that will one day extinguish them is already operating in our midst.

OF Mr. Haigh's "Sir Galahad of the Slums" (Liverpool Booksellers' Co.), the Publishers' Circular says:—

"Many writers have in recent times attempted to portray slum-life in fiction, but few with so large a measure of success as Mr. Haigh. He avoids undue sentimentality, and has a picturesque and humorous touch, which relieves the grey setting of many of his incidents. He introduces us to a large number of characters, all racily sketched, and a few of his men and women are very finely drawn. Vernon Carruthers, the altruist and idealist, and Frank Herald, the man of the world, are well contrasted, and the manner in which they tackle many of the problems that face them in the grim underworld of Liverpool forms the greater portion of the interest of this sincere and earnest story. There are pathos and tragedy in Mr. Haigh's work, and it deserves the attention of all those interested in social problems."

EXPERIMENTS IN SOCIALISM.

"NEW HARMONY."

WHEN a social reformer contends for co-operation, mutual helpfulness, and harmonious organisation of all industry for the common good instead of mere individual action, of competitive strife for personal gain, his contention is so obviously in harmony with the teaching of the New Testament that every professing Christian must at least approve of the principles he enunciates. And if the reformer should attempt to put his principles into practice and actually carry them out in a social experiment, his attempt should surely have the sympathy of all Christian people. If the experiment should succeed, it should be the business of the Churches to see that the world should know it and should never be allowed to forget it; and if it should fail, surely it should not be for Christians too eagerly to hold up the failure to the world to the discredit of their own teaching and the discouragement of reform.

Of course, if their religious principles of brotherly helpfulness and harmony really do break down and prove impracticable when put to the test of working experience, the fact must be admitted, however sorrowful a fact it may be; but surely, before admitting it as a fact, every possible care should be taken to ascertain whether it really is the principles that have failed or only some misapplication of them—some injudicious attempt to make them work under conditions that foredoom them to failure.

Unhappily, that is not commonly the way of the Christian world. When some enthusiast—professing or non-professing Christian—gets some reforming bee in his bonnet and sets about to show the world how life ought to be lived, and comes to grief in the attempt, the Churches seem just as ready as others to hold the reformer up to scorn, and to point to the ruins of his scheme as a warning and a proof of the futility of his principles.

Let us take one of those American experiments that have been recently alluded to in these columns, and see, if we can, what was the aim of the experimentalist, and why he failed. We will take the famous New Harmony scheme of Robert Owen's. One cannot, of course, go very fully into the subject in a single article, but it may be useful to put as briefly as possible just the main facts of the story.

Owen had the deepest sympathy with the sufferings of the poor, and he had a strong conviction that they ought to have shared more directly and more fully in the enormous increase in the world's productive powers by the development of machinery. His study of the subject had convinced him—even so far back as the early part of the nineteenth century—that the industrial world had reached a point in its unfolding at which co-operation should replace competition. All the world knows something of the success of the great co-operative movement of which Robert Owen was a pioneer, but he had a great ambition to found an entirely new society on the new principle, and in 1824 what seemed a splendid opportunity of doing so presented itself. He was at the time the flourishing manager and part proprietor of the new Lanark cotton mills, and he had the offer of a ready-made village of 160 buildings, with 30,000 acres of land, in Ohio. It was an estate that had been colonised by a party of Schismatic Lutherans from Wurtemberg in 1813. "Harmonie," as they called it, had been a communistic and celibate society entirely controlled by Pastor Rapp, and materially it had been so successful that in twenty-one years the capital of the settlement had increased from 25 dollars per head to 2,000 dollars—or somewhere about ten times the average for the United States at that time. The Germans were fat and flourishing, but stolid and unambitious, and Pastor Rapp seems to have grown weary of his flock, and was about to break it up. Here was a fine opportunity for a little new world, a chance of showing what men could be made by a really healthy industrial and social system, and Robert Owen, the secularist, the infidel, the atheist, as the good old world called him, spent 150,000 dollars of his own money in the purchase of the village of "Harmonie" and 20,000 acres of land around it, and left his luxurious home and fine business to see what he could do to show the world a good, healthy lead on what were essentially the very principles of the New Testament.

It was right nobly done, but it should be remembered that a hundred years ago society was not greatly perplexed by any multiplicity of reforming schemes, and had had very little practical experience such as Owen's venture required. His principles were right if Christianity is true, but in the application of them he had to do his own thinking and beat out his own path, and there is no doubt he made the gravest mistakes. His son, Dale Owen, says that, to begin with, he made a mistake in buying that particular estate. It was a bad investment. "It lay in an interior nook of country, off any main line of travel, actual or projected, and on a river navigable by steamers for only a few months of the year." The colony was thus very isolated—and isolation is bad, and, to a large proportion of people, intolerable. But, what was more important, New Harmony was very remote from markets, and markets are, of course, absolutely essential to all progressive communities. It is ridiculous to run down trade and traders, though it is legitimate enough to oppose the present competitive system of trade. But trade and markets we must have; they represent the world's exchange, and a community cut off from exchanging with the world around is bound to become stagnant and decadent. As I have before pointed out in these columns, where you have plenty of land and plenty of unemployed people it is as easy to create a market as it is to raise market produce, but of course it requires unlimited capital, and, even with that, some exchange with outside markets there must be. Owen had something under 1,000 people in New Harmony, and as they had abundance of pasturage, they could keep sheep and cattle, and they were able to make far more soap and candles and glue than they could possibly use, but they could not sell their surplus. If Owen could have brought along another 1,000 people there would have been the demand for these superfluities, and with every added thousand adjustments would have been easier and the establishment of outside communication more practicable. But Owen could not do this.

Then, again, he is commonly held to have made another fatal mistake in throwing open his gates to all comers without any discrimination whatever. He had at the outset unlimited faith in the power of good social conditions to make good men. It was the faith of a good man, and though I cannot discuss the point, I may say that I am not at all sure that in this admission of all comers he went wrong—at all events, from his point of view. But of course he got a very miscellaneous company—"radicals, enthusiastic devotees to principle, honest latitudinarians, and lazy theorists, with a sprinkling of unprincipled sharpers." Whether right or wrong in forming his company, he certainly made a grievous mistake in the governmental system he adopted for such a mob. He began with unbounded faith in liberty, equality, and fraternity, but he was wiser before he had done. He found that there was an element of time which he had left out of account. It is impossible all at once to make bad, or even indifferent, men into good ones by any combination of circumstances, and this seems at length to have dawned upon the enthusiast. He did, indeed, originally arrange for a novitiate of two or three years before any of his villagers should have any claim on land or other property or take any part in government; but, having planted his colony and stayed there a month, he had to return to England, and during his absence the ideas and ambitions of the motley throng developed very rapidly, and on his return there was a clamour for popular government and community of property, and to the astonishment of his two sons, who were with him, Owen drew up a constitution by which "all members, according to their ages, not according to the actual value of their services, were to be furnished as nearly as possible with similar food, clothing, and education, and as soon as practicable they were to live in similar houses and in all respects to be accommodated alike," while the government was to be vested in a council consisting of all adult residents. This seems to have been actually tried for a time, and things went right merrily. They had a fine band of music, they played at soldiers, they had one evening a week for discussion, another for a concert, and a third for dancing; but over all sorts of serious business discord broke out and divisions arose, and Owen was entreated to take autocratic command of the whole concern. This he endeavoured to do; but what was wanted was a little statesmanship that could apply principles with practical sagacity and discretion, and could rule with a firm grip. His community was in pretty much the position of one of our Crown Colonies, and it needed a colonial governorship for which Robert Owen was altogether unfit. His great trust was in education, but he forgot that education is a very slow business at the best, and when he tried to bring it to bear upon his scratch crew of all ages they would not stand it. In little more than twelve months he was himself forced to admit that the whole scheme was a dismal failure, and within about eighteen months, I think, he gave it up and came back home with a loss of 200,000 dollars—nearly all his wealth; and from that time to this people have pointed to New Harmony as a signal illustration of the failure of Socialism and the wisdom of laissez faire.

It really illustrates nothing of the kind. It would be just about as reasonable to talk about the failure of education, because Owen tried to bring its power to bear on the lives and characters of grown people, and found that that could not be done to any effect in the evenings of a single winter. In a thousand ways the Collectivist principle of social life has advanced, and is advancing, and the attempt to discredit the principle by pointing to such a failure as Robert Owen's on the Ohio is about as right and wise as it would be to rail against the living, vital principle that is ever throbbing through the forest because some injudicious person, out of due season, has taken up a tree and transplanted it in another climate and another soil and the tree has died.

GEORGE F. MILLIN.

SOME of the Bristol clergy are engaged in a piece of work which would have rejoiced the heart of John Ruskin or William Morris. This is nothing less than digging the foundations and building the walls of a much-needed Church Hall at Fishponds. The population of the district is rapidly increasing, and the parish is not wealthy. Here we have an apt illustration of an over-familiar experience—where money is most needed it is most hard to come by. The Bishop and Canons and lesser dignitaries have discovered that there are at least two ways of obtaining a Church Hall. There is the simple method of signing a contract, but there is also the more direct, if more arduous, plan of building it yourself. And this latter is the interesting resolve of the churchmen of Bristol. Accordingly, clergy and parishioners are to be seen as diggers, wheelbarrow wheelers, hodmen, and bricklayers. Artisans, architects, labourers, preachers toil together, each doing what he can. The man of skill for skilled work; the man who can but wield a spade and a pair of arms, be he the Bishop himself, just wields the spade. And so the work goes forward. The cynic might doubt whether the building will be as true and strong as if only professional builders were engaged. But one thing is certain. The Hall will find its usefulness immensely increased by the fine memory of the circumstances under which it was erected. The parishioners will understand more fully how hard clergymen work, and the clergy will have a more feeling perception of the labourer's life.

THE Seed sower this month is of special interest. It contains a review by Mr. Allanson Picton of Mr. Lloyd Thomas's little book, "A Free Catholic Church," a sermon by the Rev. F. K. Freeston on "The Substance of Faith," and an address by the Rev. Joseph Wood on "Immanence and Incarnation."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Belfast: First Presbyterian Church.—

It appears that our announcement last week that the Rev. H. J. Rossington had accepted this pulpit was premature, but prophetic, as the forms of the Presbyterian Order had not then been completed. A special meeting of the congregation was held last Sunday morning, after service conducted by the Rev. W. S. Smith, deputised by the Presbytery of Antrim to preside. A unanimous call was given to Mr. Rossington, and signed by about seventy of those present. It has since been accepted.

Brighton.—The last week evening lecture of the season was given in the New-road Lecture Hall, by Alderman William Thompson, of Richmond, on "A National Housing Policy"—a most interesting and practical address. Recently Dr. Benham lectured on "Milk," pointing out the importance of a pure milk supply and the means of securing it. The minister and the church committee arrange these lectures, which are, however, attended by a number of social reformers of various connections. The aim is to get expert guidance on various phases of the social problem.

Edinburgh.—An interesting series of special services at St. Mark's Chapel (promoted by the M'Quaker Trustees) was brought to a close last Sunday, when the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold preached two eloquent sermons to large congregations, her subjects being the "Prophetsess Deborah" and "Salvation through the Cross." Other who took part were, besides the minister of the congregation, the Revs. James Forrest, J. M. Lloyd Thomas, and W. Copeland Bowie.

Ilford.—The experiment of two weekday lectures was recently tried, but met with only moderate success as regards attracting the public, though very much enjoyed by the church members. "The Rev. R. J. Campbell on Sin" and "The New Theology," were very ably dealt with by the Rev. E. Savell Hicks and the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones. The efforts towards the possession of a church, which commenced almost with the first service held at Seven Kings in January, 1906, are progressing. A suitable plot of land in a central and convenient position will in a few days be secured, thanks to the kind and generous donations to the land and building fund by Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, £100; Mr. F. Nettlefold, £100; and the B. and F.U.A. £50, this last being conditional on £50 being raised locally. That responsibility has been undertaken after a conference between the General Committee and the Ladies' Sewing Circle. A sale of work will take place early in October next, and other efforts are being made to augment the fund. Mr. Walter D. Welford, the hon. secretary, will be very glad to receive any useful hints from other Unitarians, who may have had the same work to do. His address is 61, Mansfield-road, Ilford.

Ipswich.—The Friars'-street Social Guild has just concluded a very successful programme of interesting and profitable evenings; thanks to the indefatigable efforts of the president, the Rev. L. Tavener, the secretary, Miss Pollard, and others. The object of the Guild is to develop the social and religious life of the church. There have been very pleasant social evenings. Lectures have been given by the Rev. L. Tavener (who during the session delivered two new lectures, "The Dawn of Art," and "The Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood"), Mr. R. Hamblin, Mr. T. Oliver Lee, Mr. S. J. Hutley, Miss Tavener, Mrs. Manning Prentice, and others. There were also musical evenings, and the teachers and elder scholars of the Sunday-school gave a most enjoyable evening, tableaux vivants from well-known pictures being much appreciated by a large audience.

London: Bermondsey.—On Friday and Saturday, April 5 and 6, a dramatic performance entitled "Wallace: The Knight of Ellerslie," was given at the Fort-road Church by the League of Comrades. The League is a young people's society led by Mr. Seymour Marks in connection with the church. On Saturday evening especially there was a crowded and appreciative audience. On Sunday a young people's induction service was conducted by the minister, the Rev. Jesse Hipperson. Ten young people were received into church fellowship.

After a special sermon for the occasion, the consecration hymn, "Take my life and let it be," was sung, and the minister, shaking hands with each of the new members, said: "In the name of the Fort-road Unitarian congregation I extend you each a hearty and sincere welcome into the fellowship of this church. May you become a bulwark of strength to us. We are a small church, striving to hold aloft the lamp of truth, and righteousness. Be earnest and sincere in your church life, and you will prove a great blessing to us all, and God grant that you may carry into your daily life the sanctifying influences which you will imbibe by your connection with this church." The whole service was very impressive, and the memory of it will probably linger for life in the minds of those who took part in it.

London: Essex Church.—An impressive service of self-consecration and church welcome was held on Sunday morning, March 24, the day being Palm Sunday, and also the school anniversary. Three previous services of the same description have been held since 1901. As in former cases, most of those taking part in the service had attended the minister's preparation class. In the course of his address, the Rev. Frank K. Freeston told the life-story of Travers Madge, son of a former minister of the congregation. The first part was meant for the many Sunday-school scholars who were present; the second part was spoken specially to the teachers, and the third to those who were to be received as church members. Travers Madge believed, not only in Sunday-schools, but also in belonging to a church, and in making church membership as real, and holy, and happy as it could possibly be. After going on one occasion to the church welcome of his friend Philip Carpenter, he described the service as all very beautiful and touching, but the giving of the right hand of fellowship as the most touching of all. The minister said: "I do, indeed, hold out the right hand of Christian fellowship. God bless you." It was an act he could never forget. Mr. Freeston said, in conclusion: "Friends, there are those with us this morning who are willing, in the spirit of consecration, to receive this church welcome, and on this Christian festival day of Palm Sunday. In the presence of you, their elders, in the presence of their parents, fellow teachers, Guild members and comrades, remembering the Christ-friend, and asking the blessing of God, you bid me say to them in your name, 'The Spirit and the Church say, Come.' 'God bless you.'" He then came down to the lectern, and gave the charge and welcome into fellowship, as set forth in the Service Book, concluding with the words: "I now give to each of you the right hand of fellowship, and present you with our Book of Common Prayer in memory of this service, and invite you to enter your names in the Roll-book of this church."

London: Hampstead.—The Rev. Henry Gow preached again at Rosslyn Hill Chapel morning and evening last Sunday, and took the whole of the services, after an absence from his pulpit of three months, owing to an accident at the end of last year.

Maidstone.—A very successful annual meeting of the Earl-street congregation was held in the concert-hall on Wednesday evening, April 3. After tea, the Rev. A. Farquharson took the chair, and Mr. A. M. Ruck, the secretary, presented the annual report. It was, he said, a remarkable report for them in every way, and it was due to Mr. Farquharson's able ministry. The offertories had doubled during the year, and they were anxious that new members should become regular subscribers. They were very anxious that their minister should become resident in Maidstone, and they had to face the question of building a schoolroom. Mr. F. W. Ruck, superintendent of the Sunday-school, in proposing the adoption of the report, said their evening congregations were now six times as large as eighteen months ago. Other speakers dwelt on the good work that was being done, and spoke with warm appreciation of Mr. and Mrs. Farquharson, and the hope that they would settle at Maidstone. The chairman said it was a great pleasure to preside over so enthusiastic a meeting. The past year had been to him one of very hard but also of happy work, and his wife had also done her part. He urged the need for a schoolroom. Mr. M. A. Ruck was re-appointed secretary.

Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches.—At the annual meeting of the governing body held this week, the Rev. Charles Peach was elected president for the coming year.

Manchester: Longsight.—Mr. Rossington informs us that our note of last week was inaccurate. He has, however, accepted the call to Belfast.

Manchester: Oldham - road (Welcome Meeting).—There was a large gathering of ministers and other friends from neighbouring congregations at the Varley-street Schools on Saturday last, to rejoice with the Oldham-road congregation on the settlement of the Rev. W. Griffiths, Ph.D., B.D., as their new minister. The congregation has been without a minister for nearly three years, and as this year marks the jubilee of its foundation the new settlement comes at a happy time. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. S. Hyam, and the Rev. A. C. Smith offered prayer. The Chairman expressed the thanks of the congregation to the Home Missionary College, neighbouring ministers, and the lay preachers of the district, for helping them over a trying time. But even better than the help of friends was the discovery of preachers who had arisen out of the congregation, and spoken helpful words to their fellow members. Now they were happily settled, and they felt the choice they had made was worth the long period of waiting. Mr. J. R. Hill, superintendent of the Sunday-school, and organist, spoke a very earnest and eloquent word of welcome to Dr. Griffiths. Recalling the dedication of their beautiful church, he said, the late Rev. W. Gaskell then repudiated the idea that their gospel was for the rich alone, and the late Ald. H. Rawson on the same occasion insisted on the truth. Now they were going to try once more to justify that faith. Oldham-road was a working class district. Still the congregation was not dead, and it was not going to die. Mr. J. Fletcher Robinson (President of the District Association) joined in the welcome, and Dr. Griffiths replied. He said he felt such a spirit of hopefulness and faith in the congregation, he could almost imagine himself home again in Wales. The district with its great needs and its vast opportunities appealed to him. He believed he had a message which would help it, and he would devote all his powers to its delivery. The Rev. W. G. Cadman spoke of his long and happy settlement at Oldham-road, and the Revs. Dendy Agate, George Evans, A. W. Fox, C. Peach, and other ministers present each added his word of good-will. The Rev. E. G. Evans, of Dukinfield, pleaded for consideration for the special difficulties of a Welsh minister settled with an English congregation. An excellent meeting then closed with hymn and prayer.

Manchester: Swinton.—Friends are reminded of the bazaar on April 18, 19, and 20, to raise £300 for the Church Funds, particulars of which are advertised this week.

Newport, Mon.—On Tuesday evening last, the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, President of the National Conference, commenced a round of visits to the Unitarian churches of South-East Wales with a service here, at which he delivered an impressive address on "The New Theology and the Old Religion." "Theologies are many, but religion is one," was the burden of the discourse. A large audience listened intently to the eloquent plea for a re-statement of theology in harmony with modern science and religious experience. The reverent treatment of the theme, and the charitable attitude towards those who are working along other lines than our own, produced an impression which will long remain with everyone present.

Norwich.—The annual business meeting of the Octagon Congregation was held on March 26, Mr. G. A. King presiding. The reports of the chapel committee and of various institutions were full of hope and promise. During the year 30 new names had been added to the list of subscribers, and there was every prospect of the good work being greatly strengthened when the Martineau Memorial Hall and schools were opened. The Rev. Alfred Hall, acknowledging an expression of thanks and appreciation of his ministry, said he had never come to an annual meeting with greater hopefulness than he did to the one they were now holding. There was every reason to believe that the success that had marked the past year would be continued in the future. He was about to complete seven years of ministry in Norwich. He had been with the congregation at one of the most critical periods of its history. During the first four years of his ministry, he saw friend after friend pass away, and the experience had been most depressing. He had sometimes wondered whether it would be possible to recover what had been lost by death, and three years ago he could not have hoped that the outlook would be so bright as it now was. The evening congregations had been larger than ever he had known them, and from the communications he had received he knew that many men in the city were beginning to take broader views of religion. He expressed the hope that he might see the morning congregation improve to the same extent as the evening one had done. He thanked them for the help they had given him.

Oldbury.—The new organ and mural tablet to the memory of the late Rev. Henry McKean were dedicated at a special service on Thursday evening, April 4. The organ was opened by Mr. Herbert New, of Birmingham, with a few appropriate words on the power of music in religion, and the service then proceeded, Mr. A. Prince, F.R.C.O. (organist of Holy Trinity, Smethwick), presiding at the organ. The prayer of dedication was offered by the Rev. James C. Street, who also preached the sermon, in which he recalled the memory of his fellow student and friend of fifty years, speaking of his father also, Henry McKean, the elder, who was succeeded in that pulpit by his son. Councillor W. Parkes, Chairman of the Oldbury Urban District Council, afterwards spoke, and paid a high tribute to Mr. McKean's public work. He then unveiled the tablet, which bears the following inscription:—"This tablet is erected to perpetuate the memory of the Rev. Henry McKean, minister of this place of worship for over 46 years. During the whole of his life he devoted his great ability to all matters appertaining to the good government of the town of Oldbury and the welfare of its inhabitants. Born at Alnwick, September, 1835; died at Oldbury, June 24, 1904. Faithful unto death." Earlier in the same day the ministers of the district held their monthly meeting, when, after tea, the Rev. A. H. Shelley, of Cradley, read a paper on "Church and Dissent."

Rawtenstall.—On Good Friday and Saturday a grand art carnival was held, being opened on the first day by Mr. J. W. Ramsbottom, and the second by Mr. William Holden. The proceeds were in aid of the Church and Independence Funds.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE stone-laying of the Martineau Memorial at Norwich is to take place this (Saturday) afternoon at 3.30. Friends in London, whom this note may reach on Friday evening are reminded that they will be in good time, if they leave Liverpool-street at 10 a.m., and can return the same evening, if necessary, by the 5 p.m. or the 6.22 train.

ON Saturday afternoon, April 6, a bronze medallion containing a portrait of Mr. R. D. Darbishire, and placed as a memorial to him in the Darley Dale Whitworth Institute, was unveiled by the Right Hon. Victor Cavendish. The medallion bears the inscription in Latin, "If you seek a monument look around," and the dates 1890 and 1906, the former being that of the erection of the Institute. The people of the district, grateful for all that Mr. Darbishire has done for them, subscribed for this memorial, and Mr. Darbishire, who was present at the unveiling of the memorial, gave a most interesting address, in which he told of his long friendship with the late Sir Joseph Whitworth, and how the aged man, always anxious to put his great wealth to the best use, for the benefit of his people, finally left it in the hands of his wife and two other trustees, of whom Mr. Darbishire was one, to administer as they knew he would desire, to the best of their judgment. Mr. Darbishire is now the sole survivor of the three. How nobly he has fulfilled the trust both Manchester and Darley Dale bear witness.

THE Colonial Conference, which was opened on Monday with a cordial message from the King, is the fourth of a series, the first having been held just twenty years ago on the occasion of the first Jubilee of Queen Victoria. The holding of these councils between the self-governing Colonies and this country may now be regarded as an established institution, and it is noticeable that whereas the immediate occasion of previous conferences was some national celebration, the present gathering has been called explicitly for the discharge of business. The opening session was attended by the British Prime Minister, who offered a warm welcome to the six Colonial Premiers who were present—Sir Wilfrid Laurier (Canada), Mr. Alfred Deakin (Australia), Sir J. G. Ward (New Zealand), Dr. Jameson (Cape Colony), Mr. R. F. Moor (Natal), and General Botha (Transvaal). Sir Robert Bond (Newfoundland) was unfortunately not able to be present at the opening ceremonial.

MANY matters of discussion, on some of which there is undoubtedly a considerable difference of opinion, will come up at the later sessions of the Conference. But the first sitting was utilised by Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman and the Colonial Premiers to express the fraternal sentiment which is so real a bond between the widely severed members of what, for want of a better term, is called the British Empire. Sir Henry's speech was very happy, and not least in the special word of welcome addressed to the youngest of the self-governing Colonies in the person of General Botha. It would have been rash to predict even two years ago that the Transvaal would now be holding its destinies in its own hands, that a Boer majority would be in political power, that the most famous of the Dutch generals in the late war would be the Prime Minister, and withal that the sentiment of the Colony would be one of unreserved friendliness to those who so recently were its armed foes. Yet such is the actual position, and it is one for which we may be thankful, for it raises our faith in human nature and in statesmen, and does something to mellow into forgetfulness the bitter memories of dark and evil years. It serves also to remind us of the force of a bond which is not a bond of force.

WE do not hold our Colonies by the strong hand. They are, indeed, not our Colonies except in so far as their people share the same ideals with ourselves. Their circumstances differ widely from our own and among themselves. Their problems are accordingly diverse. We recognise in some of them, in New Zealand most especially, a success in dealing with the evil antithesis between wealth and poverty which we find it so hard to imitate. And beyond any question such occasions as the present afford opportunity for mutual learning and wisdom, and remind us of the common heritage of tradition and of blood which unites us in spirit, however widely we are scattered to the ends of the earth, and in however strange surroundings our respective fortune and chance are placed.

AT the same time, it were foolish to overlook the fact that in each of these autonomous communities the local life is the most penetrating and persistent occupation of living men and women, and the passages in which Mr. Deakin expressed this thought are worth the most careful remembering. The representative of the Australian Commonwealth linked what he had to say on this subject with a graceful response to Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's address. Six weeks had elapsed since Mr. Deakin left home, and during that time events had not stood still. Sir Henry's remarks would be read throughout the Southern continent, and would recall the men of Australia to the thought of the common heritage of Australian and Briton as nothing else would so effectively have done. And "after these proceedings are over five weeks will elapse before either of us will have an opportunity of addressing the people of Australia . . . and all this interval requires to be bridged over by some such strong influence as you, Sir, by your address are fortunately bringing to bear upon them." To the Australian the things of Australia, to the South African the things of South Africa (though united South Africa is still a dream), and to the people of this country the life of the old civilisation of Europe are and must be the chief and most engaging interest. We should the more cordially welcome all chances such as the present of reminding ourselves of the larger realm which includes those sister states, the Colonies, and of appreciating the ideal of a world-citizenship, which, dream though it may seem in this practical age, has yet the power of shaping a future for mankind more just and ample than the past.

THE process of the amalgamation of the three Methodist communities that are to form the United Methodist Church is still going on. Draft deed polls, trust deeds, &c., are being considered, and some of the many "alterations rendered necessary by consequence" (to use the phrase of the N.T. Revisers) are receiving attention. Book-room business, the question of a hymn-book or hymn-books, the issue of a monthly magazine, and, to crown all, a great Thanksgiving Fund to raise 100,000 guineas, such are some of the matters that have to occupy the thoughts of the representatives of the churches concerned. The complexity and the difficulties of the work were, however, foreseen, and there is little doubt that those who have known how to prepare the plans and to clear the ground will be able also to complete the united structure. At half-past two on September 18, the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs of London are to visit the Uniting Conference, which, we believe, meets at City-road Chapel.

In view of the agitation for the enfranchisement of women the following is interesting. The secretary of the China Inland Mission reports that women missionaries are exposed to less danger than men. "Men are often suspected of political intrigue, whereas women are not." A quotation from one such worker is given thus: "When the river valley was in a state of rebellion against the Roman Catholics we were left undisturbed with the exception of one station, which was destroyed by the Roman Catholics. Even then the missionary and the ladies who were with her on the station were treated with extreme kindness for six weeks in the mandarin's official residence, where they stayed while the mission house was being rebuilt. The hatred against the French priests was so bitter that we, knowing the danger to gentlemen just at that time, wrote requesting our superintendent not to visit us. Our safety during the trouble seemed to be (under God) owing to the fact that we were women."

Two questions that the Wesleyan community cannot much longer defer, but which are exceedingly difficult to settle, are the class meeting and the three years' system. The two problems have this in common, that such freedom from a hard-and-fast rule as is now enjoyed is irregular, and of the nature of an evasion. The Wesleyan system makes no provision for the good Christian man who wants to be a member without the necessity of attending class. The proper entrance to membership is through the class meeting. Yet the habit of neglecting class grows, and it is well known that it is not always the result of indifference but often of conscientious objection, still more often of an invincible distrust of that means of edification. Yet to seem to slight the class meeting would appear like inflicting a wound on Methodism itself. To conserve the class meeting uninjured, yet to allow members full freedom to use it or neglect it, would seem to be contrary notions. Even so, it is felt that the evasions of the three years' limit for ministers, which occasionally take place, could not be regularised and made more frequent without altering the general constitution of the Wesleyan church. An Act of Parliament would be required, and consequential changes innumerable are foreseen from what would seem but a simple proposal to allow ministers to stay longer than three years in one circuit when both they themselves and their people desire it.

In a course of sermons on the "New Theology" at Upper Chapel, Sheffield, the Rev. C. J. Street dealt last Sunday evening with the question of sin. That Mr. Campbell should call it "a blundering quest for God" was, he said, due to the philosophical position he assumed of the "fundamental identity of God and Man" in his Monistic Idealism. Such a position was condemned by the moral experience of mankind. No one knew better than the rake that he was alienating himself from the life of God and from the respect and love of good men and women. Sin was as real and positive a thing as virtue, evil as good. Was not hatred the opposite of love, and was that not positive and active? It was not correct to say that sin had never injured God, except through man. What then of lonely vice, where the soul had relations, not with its fellows, but with God alone? Half our virtues and vices were exercised apart from our fellow-men. What, then, was sin? A voluntary self-degradation, an offence against the Divinity within, "a perversion of the will, a corruption of character," as Professor Upton defined it: "an estrangement of the inward life from the life of God," according to Dr. Drummond—a very different thing from a quest for God. It involved a deliberate misuse of free will, for sin could not arise without free will and knowledge and power. As we drew near to God in daily rectitude, we could not sin as once was possible. A rightly directed will made the sins and vices of old simply contemptible, and the vision of purity became more and more beautiful. It was a truer saying of Mr. Campbell's, who perpetrated many inconsistencies, that "sin is the centrifugal tendency in human nature, just as love is the centripetal." Sin was the deliberate choice of the known lower possibility; it meant a rejection of God for the time being. Only as we became free from sin could we be servants of God.

Is it any use warning ministerial brethren against clever scoundrels who go about the country with very plausible stories of distress, whereby they manage to defraud the unwary? Here is a gentleman, with a Jewish cast of countenance, a scholar familiar with many languages, of most engaging address. A year ago he was a Russian refugee, persecuted for Liberal religious principles; in fact, a convinced Unitarian! Now he appears in another part of the country, in an entirely different character, with a new story of distress. But in both cases he succeeded in laying his hands on a quite respectable sum of money, and in the interval no doubt has played a different game elsewhere. Some day, perhaps, the police will lay their hands on him. But, meanwhile, he and his kind will continue to appear at study doors, by preference rather late on Saturday night, claiming acquaintance with distant ministers. But why will men continue to be taken in?

SHORT NOTICES.

The Epistles of Paul the Apostle, and John's Revelation, by flossier Chamberlain, are curious little books. The writer appears to have worked in entire independence, possibly ignorance, of anything previously written on the subject; and he reconstructs the documents before him to suit his fancy. I have not counted the number of interpolators and editors who are credited with a share in producing the Pauline Epistles as we have them. I have learned that the "little book" which the angel gave to John to eat (Rev. x. 8), and which he found at first sweet and then bitter, is science! (Elliot Stock.) R. T. H.

The Friends' Summer School Continuation Committee (secretary, Edward Grubb M.A., 3, George-street, Croydon) has issued a brief text-book on the Life of Christ, in twelve lessons. It is the third volume of a series of Bible Notes, the two preceding volumes having covered the Prophetic period of Hebrew history. The book is interleaved, for further notes, and is well adapted for the use of adult Bible classes, reading circles, and private students. The point of view from which the lessons are written is that of "reverent but free inquiry, unhampered by prejudices, whether dogmatic or anti-dogmatic." For example, we may quote the author's conclusion as to the resurrection: "The most reasonable theory seems to be that the spiritual potency of Jesus was sufficiently great to absorb, or 'dematerialise,' His physical body; and that this was done, like His other 'miracles,' to quicken and confirm the faith of His disciples, in order that the work He had come to do might not fail of accomplishment." In this view, the appearances were psychical, rather than physical; but we cannot say that the theory appears to us in the least probable. Students and teachers of the Gospels will find much that is helpful and suggestive in these notes. The book may be obtained from the Secretary, at the above address, for 1s. 3d., post free.

The Pocket Charles Kingsley is a welcome addition to the series of little books edited by Alfred H. Hyatt, which now includes Stevenson, Jefferies, Macdonald, Dickens, Thackeray, Emerson, Hardy, and George Eliot. Some of the passages from Kingsley are pages long, others quite short, as this "Beauty is God's handwriting—a wayside sacrament; welcome it in every fair face, every fair sky, every fair flower, and thank for it Him, the fountain of all loveliness, and drink it in, simply and earnestly, with all your eyes; it is a charmed draught, a cup of blessing." The Truth of Christianity. Compiled from Various Sources by Lieut.-Col. W. H. Turton, D.S.O. (Sixth Edition) is in many respects an excellent manual of apologetics. It states the case for the orthodox dogmas very clearly and concisely. Wherever the gallant compiler meets with a difficulty for which he has found no explanation that satisfies him, he does not hesitate to say so. Often, however, he is too easily satisfied. Readers of a more liberal school of thought than that to which he belongs may find much that is suggestive in the book. (Wells Gardner, Darton & Co., 2s. 6d. net.)

A SHAKESPEARE SERMON:

"MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING."

A PLEA FOR COMMONSENSE.*

BY THE REV. E. I. FRIPP, B.A.

"Let your communication be Yea, yea; Nay, nay: for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil."—Matt. v. 37.

Now that April's here, and the trees are in tiny leaf, and the thrush and chaffinch sing upon the bough, I want to preach about Shakespeare. He was born and he died, you remember, in April, and the season was dear to him, as to Browning, and Chaucer, and all poets. The sweet sights and sounds of the spring, like the spring-tide of his life, were no small part of his thought and poetry; and as that thought and poetry have been only second to the Bible in their influence on Englishmen, it is not unfitting that we should make them the subject of our reflection during the next few Sunday evenings.

Shakespeare is for all time and for all times, but we understand him best when we see him in the midst of the surroundings which helped to develop his genius. I want to take you back to the year 1599, when Queen Elizabeth was on the throne and near the end of her illustrious reign. In that year the poet was thirty-five—like Dante when he wrote his "Divine Comedy"—midway through the allotted term of threescore years and ten. He had been an actor in London for a dozen years and more, and, after an uphill fight, was popular and prosperous, and at the head of those who wrote for the drama. He was in high favour with the Court and with the public, was earning, in our money, about a thousand a year, had recently purchased one of the two best houses in Stratford, and obtained a coat-of-arms which enabled him to sign himself "William Shakespeare, Gentleman."

Now, if there was a time in his life when his head was in danger of being turned, it was now. If ever he was exposed to the glamour of the world and tempted to forget the simple, not to say stern, environment in which he had been brought up and made his way to prosperity, it was in the year when he produced his brilliant comedy, "Much Ado About Nothing." This play is full of the spirit of success. It is characterised in every scene by an exuberant sense of power and happiness on the part of the writer. He laughs, romps, throws his wit and nonsense and kindliness all over the stage. His fun is simply infectious. He revels in words, in jokes, in fellowship, in all the delights and distinctions of society. Yet there is no play which has come from his pen in which he shows a finer restraint, a stronger self-mastery, or a more convincing common-sense. He knows exactly when he has gone far enough, never descends for an instant to the grosser tastes of his audience, keeps both the courtiers and the groundlings to a high level of merriment which Puritans would have enjoyed, and shapes everything in the story to give men wise thoughts as well as laughter.

Shakespeare came of a sturdy yeoman stock. He was born and reared in what we should call "the country." His father, I believe, was a Puritan. His writings show an early and intimate acquaintance with the Bible and with the Geneva version, which was chiefly read in Puritan families. And, whatever his youthful escapades, if there were such, there is no doubt of the wholesomeness and saneness throughout life of his principles. The young Stratford man is inevitably lost sight of in London for a few years, and when he reappears, it is with the best of characters. When an older and jealous playwright attacks him in an ill-natured spirit, the publisher afterwards apologises for the words used, saying that he himself knows him to be as civil in demeanour as he is excellent in his playing, and that men of position have reported his "uprightness of dealing and honesty." There is certainly no room for vice in Shakespeare's thrifty, strenuous, and progressive career, and all that we really know is in harmony with this publisher's high opinion. London did not dazzle and confuse his moral judgment, as it might have done—and did—that of weaker men. He was still the Stratford man, enjoying the capital as his university and place of business, and the centre of his patriotic, loyalist sympathies, but frugal with a view to retirement to his native place, and keenly alive to the affectations and absurdities of the city. We see this in many of his plays. Falstaff, though a monarch in East Cheap, the king of the tavern, exercising a demoralising influence over the Cockney mind, is "made an ass of" by simple people at Windsor. Jaques, with his reputation for experience and wisdom at the Court, is of little or no consequence in the Forest. Don Adriano, whose head is crammed with the silken terms and taffeta phrases of culture, is no match in the open air for the clown Costard. And even Touchstone is worsted by the old shepherd. Corin's philosophy of life is not unlike that of Shakespeare himself: "Sir, I am a true labourer; I earn that I eat, get that I wear, owe no man hate, envy no man's happiness, glad of other men's good, content with my harm, and the greatest of my pride is to see my ewes graze and my lambs suck." Shakespeare's "ewes" and "lambs" were literary—that's the only difference.

In his artist's fashion, the observer always, however, much observed, he noted the people of the town, and must often have said to himself, "With all your cleverness and culture, I have seen better men in Stratford." He had a keen eye for the weaknesses of those whose superior judgment largely made up public opinion, as well as for their strength of character. The Queen and her Court and her time had very marked limitations, notwithstanding their conspicuous and rare merits. She was a Tudor, and a woman of action, independent, and autocratic, and practical. Her vigorous policy of holding a middle course between the Catholic and the Puritan preserved peace for over forty years in a critical period of English history. She sternly suppressed the extremists on both sides. She gathered about her statesmen and ecclesiastics and courtiers of the same energetic practical temper as herself. Eleven years before the production of "Much Ado About Nothing" her sailors had defeated the Spanish Armada and made England for the first time mistress of the seas and the chief coloniser of the new world. Wherever she was there was movement, stir, enterprise. And this marvellous activity of mind and will in herself and those around her atoned for their follies. There has never been, perhaps, in England a more fantastic life than that which she led. We see it in Shakespeare's plays, in the crowd of droll and absurd personages he has introduced into his drama, and the grotesqueness of their dress and speech and recreation. Could a woman be more whimsical or ridiculous than Elizabeth in her state attire, surrounded by the pomp and parade of her retinue, addressed in language of extravagant gallantry, bandying looks and words with her favourites, behaving even in her old age like an affected and spoilt child? Indeed, she and her Court would have been intolerable had it not been for the vigour underneath this show, the shrewd wisdom that more than balanced it, the brains, the industry, the downrightness which made it excusable and attractive. Take away the sterling good sense, and we know what becomes of the rest. For Elizabeth substitute James, for the Tudor the Stuart, and all the vanity and levity that were enjoyable in the one lead to tragedy and ruin in the other.

Shakespeare witnessed both. He lived in close contact with the Court, first of Elizabeth, then of James, and he knew well the difference. It was the difference between "Much Ado About Nothing" and "Hamlet," between a culture that had its weakness and danger, and one that led to disastrous consequences. This evening we see Shakespeare looking at the follies of Elizabeth and recognising the good sense beneath. Next Sunday we shall see him studying the pedantry of James with the lack of the hero behind it.

Now, Froude says, and says truly, of Elizabeth that her "nature was saturated with artifice. Except when speaking some round untruth, she never could be simple. Her letters and her speeches were as fantastic as her dress, and her meaning as involved as her policy." Is not this the atmosphere of the Court of Leonato at Messina? All through "Much Ado About Nothing" we are in the midst of intrigue and strategy, guilty or innocent. By "indirections" men "find directions out." Friends are overheard by a man in an orchard, and again by a man concealed behind the tapestry. A gentleman woos a lady disguised as another. Lovers learn the truth of each other by hiding behind a hedge in the garden. Gentlemen are duped into believing that they are the witnesses of a lady's unfaithfulness. The instruments of this plot are themselves taken by watchmen lying in wait under a pent house. And finally the device of a friar is resorted to to make matters right again. Everywhere are ingenuity and crookedness, often very delightful, but apt to mislead and bring serious trouble. Sallies of wit and skilful diplomacy have their value—life would be dull without them; but they are no substitute, after all, for "russet yeas and honest, kersey noes."

The central thought of the comedy is, of course, love—love and marriage. There is one pair of lovers whose attachment is conventional, and another pair whose affection is romantic. The love of Claudio and Hero is of the ordinary fashionable kind. It is an affair more or less of arrangement among their friends. Money and position enter largely into it. The gentleman has an eye to the lady's wealth, and asks the kind offices of a powerful Don in his suit, and partly through them obtains the father's consent. The lady, on the other hand, is rather disappointed that the rich Don does not woo for himself; but she is willing to do as her father decides, and she accepts Claudio. She likes him, and he likes her, but there is no passion between them. They do not really understand one another; and, as such alliances often are, and very frequently were in Elizabeth's time, the betrothal is hardly made before it is threatened with rupture. If Claudio had loved Hero, it is inconceivable that he would have denounced her at the altar.

Then, over against this alliance, which is little more than a public function, Shakespeare sets the genuine thing, which has at first the appearance of unreality, but at heart is deep and true. Beatrice and Benedick talk in the usual society strain about love; they laugh at marriage, scoff at the very idea of becoming a wife or a husband. And to a certain extent they are sincere in their protestations. They both like the freedom and irresponsibility of their present happy lot so well that they have no mind to change it. It is obvious from the first that they are interested in one another, and have more than a fancy for each other; but the gladness of their single life and their independency of each other keep them apart until they have a deeper knowledge of each other's character and find out their need of the other to complete their lives. And this deeper knowledge comes through trouble. Beatrice and Benedick might have thrown their witty gibes at one another for years and not become man and wife. It requires more than the superficial life of the drawing-room to reveal their essential manly and womanly spirit. Marriages are not made in an atmosphere of mere pleasantie. Repartee and chaff, dress and dinner-parties, playing and singing to the lute, match-making and intriguing, do not bring hearts together and disclose their contents. There must be something to awaken the man and the woman, to draw forth the life through the wrappings of convention. And this came in the case of Benedick and Beatrice.

The first note of sorrow is struck in Balthazar's song. The artificiality, however gay and charming, of Leonato's Court exposes it to slander. Where little white lies live and laugh, dark and evil ones may enter. Nor is any very subtle villainy needed. Don John, the author of the plot, is no cunning, plausible scoundrel. He carries his evil with him, in his countenance, his walk, and his speech. His charge against Hero, coming from such a source, should never have been heeded. It is gross, palpable falsehood, and commonsense would have detected it. If Iago had manoeuvred it, and had been aided, as in Othello by every extraneous circumstance, commonsense for the moment might have been worsted; but only by the absence of commonsense—banished by the spirit of perpetual holiday, of perpetual leisure for talk and stratagem, of perpetual disregard of the stern duties and miseries of life—we can account for the gullibility of Don Pedro and Claudio, and the temporary aberration of Hero's own father, Leonato.

And it is just here that the true character of Beatrice is called forth. She is furious. She blazes out with righteous indignation against both the charge and the men who believed it. She jests no more. Her words come short and quick and fierce. She does not seem the same Beatrice, but she is the real Beatrice: "Kill Claudio. . . . You kill me to lay it. . . . There is no love in you. . . . Let me go. . . . In faith, I will go. . . . Is he not approved in the height a villain, that hath slandered, scorned, dishonoured my kinswoman? O, that I were a man! What! bear her in hand until they come to take hands, and then, with public accusation, uncovered slander, unmitigated rancour! O God, that I were a man! I would eat his heart in the market-place. . . . 'Princes,' and 'counties'! Surely, a 'princely' testimony, a goodly 'count'-confect; a sweet gallant, surely! O that I were a man for his sake! or that I had any friend would be a man for my sake! But manhood is melted into courtesies, valour into compliment, and men are only turned into tongue."

This moral outburst clears the air. Things are seen in their right proportions. Wronged womanhood cries out for justice. Benedick is aroused. He leaves his jests for action, and challenges Claudio in simple speech that contrasts with the shower of chaff poured upon him, and leaves no doubt of his meaning behind it. When he is gone, Don Pedro and Claudio talk seriously:

Don P.: "He is in earnest." Claudio: "In most profound earnest. . . ." Don P.: "And hath challenged thee?" Claudio: "Most sincerely." Don P.: "What a pretty thing man is when he goes in his doublet and hose, and leaves off his wit!" Claudio: "He is then a giant to an ape."

Then, mingling with the gaiety that thus turns to seriousness, and in closest connection with it, is the inimitable verbiage of Dogberry and Verges. Their names, suggestive of dogwood and verjuice, leave a somewhat pungent flavour behind them. They are types of fussy and blundering officialdom. They muddle along in delicious incompetence, making much ado about trifles, and passing over matters of grave concern, and have no small hand in Hero's defamation. A little commonsense on their part would have prevented it. On the very morning of the wedding they wait on Leonato with evidence of the plot in their possession, but the sense of their importance makes them longer-winded than usual, and they fail to get to the point before Leonato is summoned to the church. Unspeakable mischief results from this waste of words.

Then, while these do the talking—and, let it be noted, the drinking—their subordinates do the work—such as it is; and these also enact their little comedy of "much ado" about a personage who merely exists in their imagination—"one Deformed." The only man of the lot who has any capacity for business is the sexton, old Francis Seacole, who says very little. It is he, in the examination of the prisoners, who, in a very few words, brings their guilt to light. Indeed, the two characters in the play who relatively say least are the two that do most—namely, the villain, Don John, who so easily hatches the conspiracy; and the sexton, who as easily destroys it.

Sir Philip Sidney—writing when Shakespeare was a youth engaged in the study of Latin verse—speaks of the "delightful teaching" which is "the right note to know a poet by," and of the poet's power to "hold children from play and old men from the chimney-corner" and, "pretending no more," to win "the mind from wickedness to virtue." Such a poet was Shakespeare. Ostensibly providing mere recreation, he gives his audience instruction and inspiration. He affords them pleasure, and always pleasure, but pleasure of a noble, uplifting kind. How great he is! With what masterly ease he holds that Elizabethan world, rich and poor, in his hand, delighting and yet teaching them, making them laugh and cry at their follies without a touch of harshness. He was, indeed, the "Gentle Shakespeare," whom many besides Jonson loved "this idle idolatry."

Let me summarise the main points of his teaching in this beautiful picture of life.

We are not to make much ado about nothing. The art of life is to see things in perspective, to see them in their true proportions, and not magnified or minimised by the false medium of our thought. Education is, to a large extent, the training of our minds to recognise trifles as trifles, and grave things as grave. How much energy and reflection and concern we sometimes waste on matters that are of no importance, while serious affairs excite in us a feeble response!

We are not to mistake accomplishments for virtues, words and wit for wisdom, cleverness and charm for character. It is not the object of a young man's or woman's life to be a brilliant conversationalist. Those who shine in an interview do not always wear well at home. The test of manhood and womanhood is the regard we win in our private dealings and relationships. The world, indeed, would be a dull place without its play and prattle, its witticisms and euphuisms, but they are most refreshing and only permanently entertaining when the good man or woman is underneath.

We are not to talk lightly of morality and religion. To play with such things, to sport with love, to be frivolous about marriage, is to play with fire. Some can do it and come out unscathed, but not all. Many get dazzled, confused, blinded, or burnt. Novels and newspapers that encourage it are to be avoided—they may be dangerous.

And, last, we are to beware in ourself of the evil spirit of slander, and to check it wherever we find it in others. How many unhappy stories might bear the title of a famous novel—"The Autobiography of a Slander"! Cultivate the habit of truthfulness even in small things. Be conscientious enough not to exaggerate. Resist the temptation of playing, however cleverly and charmingly, with lies.

RHODE ISLAND AND ROGER WILLIAMS.—I.

PILGRIMS to the Boston Conference viâ New York will have an interesting choice of route, whether by rail or boat. If by rail, they will perhaps choose the Shore Line through Providence, because of its coast views; if by boat, and for the sake of seeing Newport, they will prefer the Fall River steamer. But in either case they will cross or touch the smallest of the United States, though by no means the least in interest.

Rhode Island is to the rest of the States what Rutland is to our English shires, or Greece to the countries of Europe. It is known familiarly as "Little Rhody," and has its own individuality. Its greatest length is 48 miles, and its greatest width 37 miles. Narragansett Bay, running 30 miles up from the open Atlantic, divides it into two unequal parts, and contains, amongst its many islands, the one which gives the whole State its name.

For us its chief association is with Dr. Channing. He himself thanked God that he was born in Rhode Island, where he spent the first thirteen years of his boyhood; and we find Newport beach, however noisy and changed by its shouting bathers, still glorious with its bounding rollers through Channing's well-known words:—"No spot on earth has helped to form me so much as that beach. There I lifted up my voice in praise amidst the tempest. There, softened by beauty, I poured out my thanksgiving and contrite confession. There, in reverential sympathy with the mighty power around me, I became conscious of power within. There, struggling thoughts and emotions broke forth, as if moved to utterance by nature's eloquence of the winds and waves. There began a happiness surpassing all worldly pleasures, all gifts of fortune, the happiness of communing with the works of God."

During his boyhood the little town was simple and unspoiled by the lordly pleasure houses and the garish displays of the ostentatious rich. The home in which he was born is still standing, and is used as a Home for Friendless Children. His father was a Newport lawyer, son of a Newport merchant; he himself, when a boy of ten, was present at the Rhode Island Convention, which tardily adopted the National Constitution of 1787, and made this little State one of the original thirteen. The Channing Memorial Church, erected at his centenary in 1880, stands on the south side of Touro Park. Immediately opposite to it is the fine standing statue, erected in 1893; it contains neither the name of the sculptor (W. Clarke Noble) nor of the donor (Wm. G. Weld, of Boston), but simply the one word "Channing."

A second association with Rhode Island and Newport takes us yet further back, and is unique. Bishop Berkeley has assuredly his own high place in philosophy, but never did philosopher dare a more romantic and enthusiastic venture than his expedition to America. Berkeley had become possessed by the philanthropic purpose of establishing a missionary college in the Bermudas for the promotion of civilisation, letters, and arts in the American States, the nearest of which was distant over six hundred miles. He was led to expect that the home Government took an interest in his project, and would vote him a large grant, not less than £20,000. On his own part he made great sacrifices in pursuance of his purpose, and spent four years in preparations for the great enterprise. At last, in September, 1728, he sailed off with his new wife, having decided to first go to Rhode Island and await the grant. There he bought a farm near Newport, lived in studious retirement, yet made many friends, and was highly respected by the inhabitants. But the expected grant did not come, and three long years of waiting ultimately dispelled his dream, and reluctantly compelled him to abandon his cherished plan. So he returned to London, and wrote in the following year his Alciphron; or, The Minute Philosopher, containing an account of his life at Newport and the fruit of his studies in America. But he left behind in Rhode Island a high tradition and a much-loved name. The old wooden church in which he sometimes preached still stands, his house has been preserved and restored, and is now a show-place for the curious; the cleft in the rock is pointed out where he used to sit and meditate. Here he enshrined in rhyme his vision of a glorious golden age for America, for he was a poet, or rather a versifier, as well as a philosopher:—

"The Muse, disgusted at an age and clime
Barren of every glorious theme,
In distant lands now waits a better time,
Producing subjects worthy fame.

There shall be sung another golden age,
The rise of empire and of arts,
The good and great inspiring epic rage,
The wisest heads and noblest hearts.

Not such as Europe breeds in her decay:
Such as she bred when fresh and young,
When heavenly flame did animate her clay
By future poets shall be sung.

Westward the course of empire takes its way;

The first four acts already past,
A fifth shall close the drama with the day;
Time's noblest offspring is the last."

Berkeley, sitting on the Newport cliffs and gazing across the seas towards his prospective college which is to inaugurate another golden age, is a picture to move us, and one worthy an artist's canvas. And Berkeley's beautiful character should also appear in that picture. Since Pope assigned to him "every virtue under heaven," neither adulation nor criticism have dimmed the lustre of his reputation. He was a Christian and a gentleman, an apostle of idealism alike in thought and action, one who humbly accepted the duties of his station, yet scorned all worldly ambition. "I had rather be master of my time than wear a diadem." His was one of the purest and noblest lives, truly, in the eighteenth century. He resigned his bishopric ultimately, and retired to Oxford, where he died in 1753, and was buried at Christ Church.

But the chief name which Rhode Island recalls, to the American, if not to us, is its founder, Roger Williams. No visitor can stay long there without desiring to know more of its great pioneer. And the capital, Providence, has not been ungenerous in its memorials, though they are for the most part of recent date. At the south end of the town spreads out the Roger Williams Park, a hundred acres in extent, and from its centre rises a noble figure, an erect statue with a lofty pedestal, on which the recording angel of fame writes his name in enduring stone. Close by is the Betsy Williams House, the quaint little cottage of the descendant who bequeathed this park. The City Hall in another direction displays a Roger Williams medallion. On the river bank is the "What Cheer Rock," his supposed first landing, "What cheer?" being the welcome words of the friendly Indians. His recognition of the rights of the native Indians to their lands and his longing to deal fairly and live peaceably with them entitle him to the same commendation as that bestowed on William Penn. But other and even greater principles found their champion in Roger Williams, and have made Rhode Island historic and sacred ground. Thus, as Mr. Bryce truly says, "Some touch of that dramatic quality which belongs to the cities of Greece and Italy recurs in this little republic on Narragansett Bay. Unlike in many ways as were the settlers who went forth from England under the Stuarts to the Greeks of two thousand years earlier, some of the questions which troubled both were the same, and bore fruits not wholly dissimilar. Nor are points of likeness wanting to the history of some of the older cantons of Switzerland." Small states have done great things, and pioneered great principles, and founded great institutions. Such a pioneer and founder was Roger Williams. F. K. F.

CAMBRIDGE MODERN HISTORY.*

THE latest volume of the Cambridge History takes the reader under the best expert guidance through the welter of events which followed in the wake of the Reformation. The Thirty Years' War, which closed with the Peace of Westphalia, is the central interest into whose vortex the conflicting forces of European politics and religion are drawn. The very life-blood of Germany was almost drained to its last drop in the ferocity of this conflict. A remark made in 1880 by Prince Hatzfeldt to Lord Granville is quoted in the preface, to the effect that "Germany had not yet recovered from the effects of the Thirty and the Seven Years' Wars, and that a determination to prevent the recurrence of similar disasters ought still to be the keynote of German policy." The present writer remembers asking a well-known German historian about the cause of the extreme poverty of the Thuringian peasantry, and receiving a very similar answer, that it was chiefly the legacy of the Thirty Years' War. The devastation is said to have been so complete that even the most ordinary domestic animals were exterminated over large areas; and in the period of exhaustion which followed the peace, material civilisation had to be rebuilt from its foundations. To the same cause may be attributed much of the sterility of German religion, its political subservience, and its almost instinctive subordination of spiritual independence to a theory of territorial rights. The settlement provided the most effective means which could have been devised for checking spiritual enthusiasm. The principle that a ruler determines the faith of his subjects may be a convenient political maxim, but it forces religion to abdicate its commanding claims, and substitutes prudent conformity for the freedom of faith. In this way the final Reformation settlement was in glaring contradiction to the fundamental Reformation principle.

A series of chapters is devoted to the contest between the Crown and the Parliament in the British Isles which culminated in the Civil War. As the editors are careful to point out that it ran its course side by side with the last years of the Continental conflict "without at any point intersecting it," it seems rather a pity, simply as a matter of arrangement, that these chapters are not presented consecutively to the reader instead of being scattered about through the volume. The authors chiefly responsible for them are Dr. G. W. Prothero, Colonel E. M. Lloyd, and Dr. W. A. Shaw. We may be pardoned in these columns for calling specially attention to Dr. Shaw's account of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, in which he dwells particularly upon the political motives by which it was actuated. As an ecclesiastical council, he forms a very unfavourable estimate of its significance. "It had none of the freedom of action of an ecclesiastical council; its constructive proposals have, therefore, none of the constitutional significance attaching to the decisions of any of the great Councils of the Church; there was no doctrinal width or scope in its debates, so that there attaches to the record not a particle of the intense dogmatic interest attaching to a great doctrinal synod such as, say, the Synod of Dort. . . . It is impossible to accord to the Assembly the respect which would be due to it, had it been a free and unfettered body with an initiative and programme of its own, and it is equally impossible to clear its memory from the stain of servile subjection to political faction." This moderate lay judgment applies a wholesome corrective to the undue deference which is still paid to the Confession of Faith and the Shorter Catechism as works of constructive religious genius. Probably the belief in their excellence, which is a point of honour with many theologians, is due chiefly to the religious associations of two hundred and fifty years.

It is not quite obvious why the two concluding chapters should be "The Fantastic School of English Poetry," by Mr. A. Clutton-Brock, and "Descartes and Cartesianism" by M. Emile Bontroux, in a volume in which the interest is predominantly political, and literature and philosophy have received practically no attention. Unless they are to be interwoven with all the movements of the time, and discussed with some completeness, it seems a pity to admit them at all.

APPLIED THEOLOGY.*

THE Rector of Bethnal Green has contributed to the Oxford Library of Practical Theology a book on Sin, written in the best spirit of the Church of England, sensible, learned, restrained, and marked by a feeling for what is weightiest in life and religion. It is distinctly a theological book, not a book of devotion or practical ethics; and yet it does not profess to be an exhaustive treatise. It belongs to a special class of works attempting to bring the best learning to bear on subjects of universal interest. Yet there is no catering for superficial thought, and the treatment is not "popular" in the bad sense. The moral tact and emphasis are so right that we can profit by the author's treatment even of a subject such as that of "Private Confession," where his reasons are entirely unconvincing.

His position is Moderate High Church. The Absolution of Sins is held to be part of the work of the Church through its appointed representatives, and the argument for Confession is strongly urged as part of the "Way of Recovery" by which men are saved from sin. But in regard both to Absolution and Confession, the degree in which they are necessary and helpful is left to the consciences of individual Christians; and the stress is laid on Confession as such, while the form of Confession (i.e., whether Public or Private, and in the latter case whether to a priest or not) is not regarded as an appropriate matter for an absolute rule.

There are wise and profound words on the Sin against the Holy Spirit; and there is a careful avoidance of dogmatic declarations as to those who may incur "eternal death." The difficult passage 1 John v. 16, 17, about not praying for a brother's forgiveness who is sinning the sin unto death, is helpfully treated. Some old theological positions also receive fresh applications. The distinction between "deadly" and "venial" sins is shown to be useful if it is not made into a mechanical separation of sins into different lists—it helps to bring home the real sinfulness of sin. The "seven capital sins," again, are treated as "root sins," and may be thus used as a basis for self-examination. We feel all through that the writer is "driving at practice," as when he throws his full force against the idea that sin may be "useful" as a means to a higher experience. We are not to call sin "by names less ugly than those by which the Bible calls it." And the Churchman does not forget the necessity of cultivating "the great natural or cardinal virtues, as they are called, temperance, justice, prudence, and fortitude."

The attempt to clear up Original Sin is not a success:—"Men are inclined to sin, but need not sin." But the inclination to sin is, surely, sin. That means, it is true, that some of our sin is not of our own sole making. But only an individualistic theory of morals would deny this. The true explanation is that human responsibility is a joint affair. The Christian religion raises this fundamental but generally unperceived fact into clear and explicit consciousness. But our author tries to hunt with the Calvinist hounds and run with the Pelagian hare.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. F. W. STANLEY.

It is with deep regret that we record the death on Monday last, from diphtheria, of the Rev. F. W. Stanley, of Effra Road Chapel, Brixton. Until about a fortnight ago Mr. Stanley had been in his usual health, but when he was struck down he had not strength sufficient to resist. Friends in London and in the West of England, where he ministered for twenty years, heard with grief of his quite unexpected death, and the profoundest sympathy is felt for his wife and daughters.

Francis William Stanley was a native of Nottingham, where he was born November 23, 1851. He himself told us, at the time of the late Richard Armstrong's death, how he and Charles Perry, as young men, were drawn to the new minister of the High Pavement Chapel. They attended Mr. Armstrong's Bible classes, and when his quickening influence led them to devote their lives to the ministry, he read classics with them to prepare them for college. Charles Perry matriculated and entered Manchester New College a year before Stanley, who went up to London in 1874. His health was not very robust, and though he was a diligent and conscientious student, he did not succeed in taking a degree, but completed his theological course without it. Faithful to every duty, and devoted to school and congregational work, he was well prepared for the pastoral charge, to which he gave himself with such steadfast zeal.

On leaving college in 1880 he was invited to succeed the late Rev. John Wright as minister of Trim-street chapel, Bath. At his induction service he received the right hand of fellowship from the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, of Lewins Mead, Bristol, who now sends us the following account of his friend's work in the West:—

"For twenty years Mr. Stanley gave himself faithfully and unselfishly to the pastorate of Trim-street Chapel. Entering upon the ministry there on leaving college, he commended to others the religious principles which he firmly held, not only by the conscientiousness that marked his public advocacy of them, but also by the sure persuasiveness of his gentle yet ever sincere spirit. Throughout this period of active work, he found a friend in every brother-minister throughout the West of England. The members of our western congregations, too, will long and gratefully remember his devoted and untiring services while honorary secretary of the Western Union, a post which, to the unaffected regret of every one of his fellow-workers he relinquished, on leaving Bath, some seven years since, for Brixton. Few, indeed, are they who could have discharged the duties of such a post as he filled in the West with truer self consecration. His work was marked by a kindness, a patience, and a care for the details of it, which never failed the friends whom he so admirably served. His influence for good was felt at the time of the reorganisation of the Union, and no less in the satisfactory arrangements which resulted in the settlement of the first District Minister in the West, the late Rev. T. B. Broadrick. He has, indeed, left in the hearts of those closer friends and colleagues who mourn his loss with no common sorrow, and he has left also in the remembrances of congregational life in the West, a name and a memory which should inspire each and all with unreserved devotion to the cause of truth and righteousness, which remains sacred amid all changes."

In addition to the good work he did in his own district, Mr. Stanley served for some years as one of the hon. secretaries of the National Conference, and was always keenly interested in denominational affairs. The record of such a ministry as his at Bath cannot be put into words, it is in the hearts of his people. During nearly the whole of that time he was happy in the co-operation of his wife, for in the summer of 1882 he married Miss Edith Hovey, of Nottingham, whose parents were connected, as he had been, with the High Pavement Chapel.

In 1900 he came to London as minister of Effra Road Chapel, Brixton, and while his record of faithful ministry was fully maintained with his new congregation, he became a diligent member of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and served also on Dr. Williams' Trust.

We have lost a true friend, one who used without stint the talents committed to his charge. We shall miss his kindly presence, his ready sympathy, his sound judgment and practical good sense, in all that concerns the welfare of our Churches and our common work. A faithful servant is called, as it appears to us, prematurely from the field of service. But he was one always ready to obey. He would give to us an example of submission and quiet faith.

The funeral service on Thursday afternoon in Effra-road Chapel was conducted by the Rev. C. J. Street, a fellow-student of Mr. Stanley's, and Dr. Carpenter. There was a large attendance of members of the congregation, representatives of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and Dr. Williams' Trust, and his brother ministers and other friends. The service opened with the hymn "O God, our help in ages past," and Mr. Street read the lesson, concluding with Hosmer's "I cannot think of thee as dead," and offered prayer. Dr. Carpenter, in a memorial address, spoke of the single-hearted faithfulness with which Mr. Stanley gave himself to his work. In his ministry he did not seek popularity, but he was deeply loved. It could not be otherwise with a soul so candid, sincere, gentle, and full of sympathy. Quietly he bore his responsibilities, and fulfilled his task as a workman who needeth not to be ashamed. And with experience power grew. He never thrust himself before the eyes of men, but he did what he undertook to do with whole-hearted devotion. It was the Lord's work, and he lived for Him. And as he lived, so he died to God. The address concluded with words of hope trust and in the Eternal Goodness reaching forward to the fulness of life. After the benediction the Dead March in Saul was played, the congregation standing in reverent silence.

The interment followed at Norwood Cemetery, where Dr. Carpenter concluded the service.

There will be a memorial service in Effra-road Chapel on Sunday morning, conducted by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I HAVE already told you about two poems in Robert Louis Stevenson's "Garden of Verses."

One was about a boy who climbed up into a cherry tree and saw for the first time beyond the garden wall into what he called "Foreign Lands." The other, "Block City," was about building with blocks or bricks.

Now, in coming to an end of what I have to say to you about games of pretending and pictures of life, we will have another of Stevenson's verses, from a poem called "Good Night."

As the children sit round the fire in the twilight they trace pictures in the flames. It is easy to imagine anything in the dim light, and see visions and weave stories; then suddenly pleasant imaginings are interrupted by the summons to bed. The boy has to turn all at once from fiction to fact, from pleasant dreams to disagreeable reality. You all know how tiresome that is, and how apt we are on such an occasion to feel cross and impatient.

The little boy of the poem manages better. After the warm firelight and the bright visions, the dark passage on the way to bed seems indeed uninviting and cheerless. He imagines the unwelcome summons as a call to danger, to be faced with courage, and he takes it like a man. It is a task not to be shirked or postponed, and he sets off as on an adventure in the spirit of a hero.

"Must we to bed indeed? Well, then,
Let us arise and go like men,
And face with an undaunted tread
The long black passage up to bed."

Is not that worth remembering next time we are summoned to leave our games of pretending and do something we do not like?

We can continue our game of being grown up by playing the man in little things, from day to day, at home and at school. If we are in a hurry to be grown up we can practise in that way ready for the time when, as men and women, we can take a share in the work of the world.

Whatever it is that has got to be done, even if it is only to come down from our cherry tree, or to put away the bricks after our game, or to go off at bed-time "with an undaunted tread,"

"Let us arise and go like men."

In games of pretending some children can never choose a part and stick to it, but want to try first one and then another. Whilst they are pretending to be the driver of a tram they are thinking that it would be nicer to be the conductor. Or perhaps the chairs are no sooner built up into a ship than the would-be sailor thinks it would be more fun to be a soldier in a castle.

For any game to go well each one must stick to his part—at any rate for that day—and give his mind to it. You may or may not have the chance some day of choosing what you will really do when you are grown up. But when it is once settled we have all of us to stick to our part and make the best of it.

One man becomes a postman and has to play the part, not just when he likes, but day after day, from morning to night, year in year out, in fair weather and in wind and rain.

Another has chosen the part of doctor, and has to go on and on at it, even if he finds that it is not the work he likes best.

In each lot there is much dull work which we call drudgery. In games of pretending we can skip the dull part's, in work we have to take the drudgery like a man.

Next week, on Tuesday, April 23, we celebrate the birthday of our great English poet William Shakespeare. He wrote, three hundred years ago, the best stories we have for acting, and these plays of his have made him famous as a poet all over the world.

I like to think that this famous Englishman, this honoured poet, was more than a dreamer of dreams, a seer of visions. He also played the man as an industrious worker. The better we know these plays the more we find out how much care and thought went to the making of them. You have only to try to copy out a single page of his poetry and then merely to count up the rest, and you will begin to realise a little what labour went in the mere writing out of the plays he imagined.

Besides being a playwright, Shakespeare was a play actor. He became the best playwright of his time, but he did not get to the top of the tree as an actor.

Pretending to be somebody else, which to us is a game, was to him work. It was his profession, and sometimes he seems to have found it wearisome. Each actor has to take his own part in a play, just as each man has to do his own work in the world, to play his own part.

In his poetry Shakespeare sometimes gives us picture language about life as a play, people as actors, and the world as "a stage where every man must play a part."

Shakespeare wrote many plays about kings. The only one of Shakespeare's kings who was really a hero was the one who learned to play the man both before he became king and afterwards too.

Prince Hal, who was so fond of games of pretending, was summoned to leave his fun and his jokes and do his work as king's son.

Prince Hal's part was settled for him; he learned to play his part, and he played it like a man.

I think that Shakespeare himself must have been a manly man, with an Englishman's respect for manliness in work and in play, and an Englishman's respect for deeds rather than words.

He was interested in men of all sorts—tinkers, tailors, soldiers, sailors, rich men, poor men, beggar-men, and even thieves. And he brings them all in upon the stage in his plays, and lets each man play his part—some well, some ill.

All through these plays we feel somehow that for Shakespeare the most important part to play on the world's stage is just the part that each man can play whether he be prince or peasant, clown or king. Everyone can play the man.

THE MARTINEAU MEMORIAL.

TO-MORROW, April 21, is Dr. MARTINEAU's birthday, and now, two years after the centenary, the Memorial at Norwich, his birthplace, is to come into being. On Sunday there will be special services of commemoration and thanksgiving in the Octagon Chapel, and on this (Sa'urday) afternoon the foundation-stone of the Memorial building is to be laid by Miss GERTRUDE MARTINEAU.

Many friends besides those who are able to be at Norwich will participate from afar with reverent sympathy and thankfulness in that celebration, looking forward to the completion of a Memorial worthy of the great name it is to commemorate. They will be glad to have this hymn, which has been written for the stone-laying by Mr. G. A. KING, chairman of the Octagon congregation:—

Behold us here with hearts aglow,
Led by one high and holy aim,
Naming Love's everlasting name:
Thy hand foundations firm and strong
Did lay, that to our earth belong;
And over land and mighty deep,
A present watch Thou still dost keep.
Here to an honoured name we raise
A building fair, where prayer and praise,
And earnest work of hand and brain,
To noblest uses shall attain.
Here youth and manhood brave and strong,
Firm for the right and hating wrong,
Shall, by Thy grace, for Freedom stand,
Justice and Mercy in the land.
This stone we here in reverence lay
Shall witness to a coming day
When, in a Human Brotherhood,
Thou, Lord, art seen and understood.
That day our eyes by faith may see,
Day of the Christ that is to be;
When o'er the wide earth shall have grown
Harvests from seed we, too, have sown.
No more fitting memorial to Dr.
MARTINEAU than this could have been devised, nor one more in consonance with his own deepest convictions and abiding affections. It is right that there should be such a memorial in the city of his birth, and attached to the venerable house of prayer in which, as he himself said, there came to him some of his first awakenings of conscience and of spiritual faith. It is right that it should be recognised as our national memorial to the Teacher to whom, in the fellowship of our Free Churches, we owe more than to any other. It is a happy circumstance that gifts should have come from friends in America also.

In a memorable letter to the National Conference at its first meeting in Liverpool Dr. MARTINEAU avowed his unabated confidence in the Christian congregation as the most beneficent of human institutions.

"When I look at any choice example of this institution," he said, "and ask myself what have been the real springs of its power, I find them in three conditions: (1) That its members unite purely for Fellowship and Growth in the Christian life and mind. (2) That, in its external action, it bears down with Missionary zeal on the Paganism and irreligion and neglected suffering which it sees around. (3) That on other Churches it looks as on confederates, moving upon different lines in the same sacred warfare. So that these three—namely, Sympathies of Godliness within the congregation; Aggression on sin and misery without; Loyal affection for comrades under other banners—are the animating principles which make even a small Christian Society a leaven of moral health to a neighbourhood ten times its size."

Speaking further of these conditions, he said of the second: "No Christian society gives any adequate expression to its essential character, unless from its heart goes forth some message of healing and entreaty to its neighbourhood; and it is but a selfish membership that looks coldly on such evangelising work. It ought not to satisfy us that we institute and equip Mission stations in parts of our large towns that need them most. Every visible place of worship needs a character, a significance, a spiritual physiognomy upon the spot. It should be more than brick and stone to the eyes that daily see it. Even from outside let it look upon the passers-by with a gaze of tender mercy and solemn warning and recovered hope." To the appeal of that ideal the congregation of the Octagon Chapel is fully alive, and there is great hope and promise of new life in the earnest work of the schools and other beneficent efforts to which the members are devoted. The new buildings were urgently needed, and they will be a most welcome source of strength. They will greatly help towards the perfecting of the good work which Dr. MARTINEAU, in the first enthusiasm of his consecration to the ministry, helped to initiate. They will stand as an emblem of the faith which he did so much to kindle and to sustain, and a worthy memorial, in which he would himself have certainly rejoiced, of a life of noble inspiration, given up to self-forgetting, reverent service.

It will be remembered that in THE INQUIRER of December 1 last year we published a drawing, with a ground plan of the proposed buildings by the architect, Mr. H. CHATFIELD CLARKE, and it will be of interest to add here his description of the buildings, which are to stand on an admirable site, by the entrance to the old chapel, "a site closely associated with liberal religious thought in Norwich, and eminently suitable to the needs of this Memorial":—

"The new buildings have been designed externally in keeping with the Octagon Chapel and surroundings in the traditional manner of domestic English buildings prevalent two centuries ago. Local materials will be used in facing the walls and the roofs covered with red tiles. There are two stories in the main building, with a third story over a portion facing Colegate-street. The ground floor contains two large class-rooms and entrance hall, also two stone fireproof staircases to the upper floor, and kitchen accommodation and lavatories. On the first floor are a large lecture hall with raised stage, and a large class-room capable of being added to the lecture hall, so that seating accommodation could be provided for nearly 350 persons. There are also on this floor three smaller class-rooms and minister's parlour. On the upper floor at the front are a large recreation room and an ante-room adjoining. Both externally and internally all elaboration of detail in building has been avoided, and any good results will be due only to proportion and effective use of material."

A PRAYER OF DR. MARTINEAU'S.

ETERNAL GOD, who committest to us the swift and solemn trust of life, since we know not what a day may bring forth, but only that the hour for serving thee is always present, may we wake to the instant claims of thy holy will, not waiting for to-morrow, but yielding to-day. Lay to rest, by the persuasion of thy Spirit, the resistance of our passion, indolence, or fear. Consecrate with thy presence the way our feet may go, and the humblest work will shine, and the roughest places be made plain. Lift us above unrighteous anger and mistrust into faith and hope and charity, by a simple and steadfast reliance on thy sure will; and so may we be modest in our time of wealth, patient under disappointment, ready for danger, serene in death. In all things, draw us to the mind of Christ, that thy lost image may be traced again, and thou mayest own us as at one with him and thee. Amen.

THE RELIGION OF UNITARIANS.

JAMES MARTINEAU.

To understand the religion of James Martineau, we would say to anyone who asks what it was, read the volumes of his sermons, the "Endeavours after the Christian Life" and "Hours of Thought on Sacred Things." The first volume of the "Endeavours" can now be had for sixpence from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in an admirable edition, and the second volume will also very soon be out. Read in the first volume the sermon on "The Besetting God," and in view of present-day reasonings as to the Divine Immanence, remember that this was first published in 1843. "The true, natural language of devotion speaks out in the poetry of the Psalmist and the prayers of Christ; declares the living contact of the Divine Spirit with the human, the mystic implication of his nature with ours, and ours with his." That was what Martineau meant by religion—"the conscious communion between the human soul and God," "a secret relation between the soul and God." In the essay on "Personal Influences on Present Theology," published in 1856, dealing with Newman, Coleridge, Maurice, and Carlyle, he pointed out how, amid all their differences, "when they are interpreted by their inner spirit, rather than by their outward relations, one thought will be found secreted at the heart of all—the perennial Indwelling of God in Man and in the Universe." That, Martineau adds, "is the distinct gain that has been won by the spiritual consciousness of the time." And that great truth was at the heart of his own religion.

When, in 1857, on his removal to London he bade farewell to the congregation in Liverpool to which he had ministered for twenty-five years, he said:—

"The one deep faith which has determined my whole word and work among you is in the Living Union of God with our Humanity. . . . We pine as prisoners, till we burst into the air of that supernatural life which He lives eternally; we are parched with a holy thirst, till we find contact with the running waters of his quick affection. Him immediately; Him in person; Him in whispers of the day, and eye to eye by night; Him for a close refuge in temptation, not as a large thought of ours, but as an Almighty in himself; Him ready with his moistening dews for the dry heart, and His breathings of hope for the sorrowing; Him always and everywhere living for our holy trust, do we absolutely need for our repose, and wildly wander till we find. We have no need to go far for this centre of rest; nay, we have only to return home, and believe what is simplest in our own hearts and greatest in the words of Christ. . . . Those simple faiths that come we know not whence, those dim suspicions of conscience that creep upon us with authoritative awe, that mysterious sense of an over-arching infinitude, pierced with bursts of light when the clouds of our lower mind clear off—nay, the common promptings of disinterested love, the call to self-sacrifice, the reverence for nobleness and beauty, what are they but the awakening touch of God's indwelling life, the movement of his Spirit among the trembling strings? To the private soul he thus reveals himself in its highest spontaneous affections, ever adding another grace and further insight to those who will be faithful with the first. To our collective humanity he comes in that great consent of spirits which arises in the presence of true heroism or sanctity, and constitutes the tendency of an age and the ultimate forces of history. Through all our natural life, individual and social, is the supernatural interfused: and the ideal colours of heaven are spread through the substance of our experience, to transfigure it. In us, however, there is ever a strife between the two. In Christ alone is the reconciliation perfect between the human and the divine; and of the blended natures the lower yields as a captive, and is, in him, wholly taken up by the higher. This once was God's idea purely realised. But the same two natures meet in us all, and he is but the exemplar of a perpetual incarnation—of a living and constant union of God with our humanity." (Essays, vol. iv., pp. 516-519)

"Is not this a true conception that we see in the mind of Christ the very essence of the mind of God in what He loves and requires to see in us; not the passiveness of an instrument or the obedience of a creature, but the filial devotion, the self-renunciation, the enthusiasm of all righteous affections which must for ever constitute the ethics of all worlds? In opening to us this co-essentiality with God through His own personality, did He show us what is true of his own individuality alone? On the contrary, He stands, in virtue of it, as the spiritual head of mankind, and what you predicate of Him in actuality is predicable of all in possibility. This interpretation of His life on earth carries the divine essence claimed for Him into our nature as His brethren. In Him as our representative we learn our summons and receive our adoption as children of God. The 'Incarnation,' thus extended from the person of Christ to the nature of man, may fitly be called 'the central mystery of revealed religion.'"

Dr. Martineau was ninety when he wrote those words. The same thought of the Divine revealing in the person of Christ may be found elaborated in the two sermons on "Christ, the Divine Word" in the second volume of the "Hours of Thought," published in 1879, and written, very likely, ten years earlier, or even twenty.

One of the clearest statements of his position is in that address on "Loss and Gain in Recent Theology," which Dr. Martineau gave to his old students in 1881. In that address, in which he spoke of Jesus as "the Head of a Divine Humanity," and again, as "simply the Divine flower of humanity, blossoming after ages of spiritual growth—the realised possibility of life in God," he made this statement:—

"Our attitude towards Scripture thus becomes the same which has long been familiar to the Society of Friends, simply assuming that the Spirit of God, which in the old time wrought their elements of sanctity into the pages of the Bible, lives and operates for ever in the human soul, renewing the light of Divine truth, and kindling eternal aspirations; so that the day of Pentecost is never past, and there is still a tongue of fire for every evangelist."

And again, speaking of the self-evidencing power of a spiritual faith, he said:

"The closer we keep to the simplicity of human life, the meanings of human experience, the depth of human duty and affections, the nearer shall we stand to God as well as man, and the less, from our station on earth, feel ourselves cut off from heaven. In youth, if ever we receive a 'Serious Call,' it is the most elementary religious truths by which the mind becomes entranced. Who can ever forget the intense and lofty years when first the real communion of the Living God,—the same God that received the cries of Gethsemane and Calvary,—and the Sanctity of the inward Law, and the sublime contents of life on both sides of death, broke in a flood of glory upon his mind, and spread the world before him, stripped of his surface-illusions, and with its diviner essence cleared? The restless intellect of mid-life may toss these things about in speculation, may add to them or take from them, and weave them into the artificial texture of a system. But in old age, as the end draws near, we repose again on these simple truths and trusts, only with a fuller inward witness and more spiritual calm. And so, the evening light is as the morning's, and sheds once more the tenderest beauty on the world." (Essays, vol. iv., pp. 330-331.)

Dr. Martineau's last great work was "The Seat of Authority in Religion," published in 1890. As at the beginning of the "Endeavours" in 1843, he had said, "All that we believe without us, we first feel within us; and it is the one sufficient proof of the grandeur and awfulness of our nature that we have faith in God, for no merely finite being can possibly believe the infinite," so, at the end of "The Seat of Authority," he wrote: "In the very constitution of the human soul there is provision for an immediate apprehension of God. But often in the transient lights and shades of conscience we pass on and 'know not who it is'; and not till we see in another the victory which shames our own defeat, and are caught up by enthusiasm for some real sed heroism or sanctity, do the authority of right and the beauty of holiness come home to us as an appeal literally Divine. The train of the conspicuously righteous in their several degrees are for us the real angels that pass to and fro on the ladder that reaches from earth to heaven. And if Jesus of Nazareth, in virtue of the characteristics of his spirit, holds the place of Prince of Saints, and perfects the conditions of the pure religious life, he thereby reveals the highest possibilities of the human soul, and their dependence on habitual communion between man and God."

To these passages may be added one more from a letter written in 1885 to the Rev. J. H. Hutton, when, at eighty years of age, Dr. Martineau retired from active college work:

"The Divine Life in relation to us presents itself to me as twofold, like our humanity—Natural, so far as we are creatures subjected to necessary laws and part of a determinate order; Supernatural, so far as He has endowed us with spiritual capacities and affections, open to His free appeal, and to our own responsive insight and direction under it. From this immediate communion of Spirit with spirit, in which the initiative is with Him and the answer with us, no soul is shut out; in the struggles of conscience, in the silent dawning of higher ideals, and in countless experiences of faithful and saintly lives, as well as in the awful warnings of shame and remorse, the pleading of the Divine Love is felt directly addressed to the individual's need, and following all the windings of his will. As it is on this side of our divine relations that all Religion lies, all Religion is supernatural, and there is a Revealing Presence of God in every soul that is not sunk in slavery to the mere 'Natural man.' But the closeness and intensity of this union between the human spirit and the Divine may vary in indefinite degrees; and the saints and prophets, in whom its higher measures appear, are the great instruments for clearing and opening the darkened windows of unawakened natures. Supreme in the hierarchy of inspiration, standing unique at its culminating point, identical in filial will with the Infinite Father's Perfection, is Jesus Christ, the moral incarnation of the Love of God. This affirmation of Supernaturalism in Christianity would gain nothing by birth 'of a virgin,' and loses nothing, to my feeling, by an immortality that dispenses with a bodily ascension. Instead of stripping the supernatural elements away from the life of Christ, I make it inward instead of outward, and by extending it in minor measures to his brethren of humanity, render them homogeneous with him, and through this harmony at one with God."

And, finally, this extract from a letter to Professor William Knight in 1895, in which Dr. Martineau, acknowledging a birthday greeting when he was ninety, thus characterised his work as a religious teacher:—

"What has been relinquished is historical tradition which partially crumbles away under the skilled search for its foundation; while what has been retained is the living and present relation witnessed by consciousness itself, between the human spirit and the Divine, and when once known there, re-found and recognised in its perfection under the unique personality of 'Christ, our Head.' The substitution, in short, of Religion at first-hand, straight out of the immediate interaction between the Soul and God, for Religion at second-hand, fetched, by copying, out of anonymous traditions of the Eastern Mediterranean eighteen centuries ago, has been the really directing, though hardly conscious, aim of my responsible years of life. So far as it is one-sided, it will doubtless be corrected and supplemented by teachers of wider and deeper vision. I thank God if it has been intrusted with any function serviceable for the needs of its day."

It is possible that the distance of Heaven lies wholly in the veil of flesh, which we now want power to penetrate. A new sense, a new eye, might show the spiritual world compassing us on every side.—Channing.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE GUILDS' UNION.

THE sixth annual meeting was held at Chowbent Chapel, on Saturday, April 13.

A council meeting in the afternoon was followed by the annual Guild Service in the Chapel, where a goodly company had assembled, composed largely of the young people connected with the Guilds at Chowbent, Leigh, Astley, and Swinton.

The Rev. Charles Peach conducted the devotional service, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. John Ellis.

Mr. Ellis took for his text 1 Tim. iv. 12—14: "Let no man despise thy youth, but be thou an ensample to them that believe, in word, in manner of life, in love, in faith, in purity. Till I come give heed to reading, to exhortation, to teaching. Neglect not the gift that is in thee." That, he said, was the right word for young disciples to-day. Ruskin had warned his young friends for whom he wrote "Sesame and Lilies" that "the happiness of your life, and its power and part and rank in earth or in heaven, depend on the way you pass your days now. They are not to be sad days; far from that, the first duty of young people is to be delighted and delightful; but they are in the deepest sense 'solemn' days." And he (the preacher) wanted to impress his hearers with the thought that their young lives were wonderful; that in them lay tremendous forces, which, if duly called forth and wisely directed would go to the making of a better England; but their souls were, or might be, radiant with a beauty that never was on land or sea. He quoted T. H. Gill's inspiring hymn: "Young souls so strong the race to run," as giving the right note. They were reminded of their Guild motto: "For God and the Good Life." G. F. Watts' life-motto: "The utmost for the Highest," and Emerson's saying: "Hitch your wagon to a star," were also good watchwords for the better life. Then their days would, in the best sense, be "solemn days," and they would have entered on a life quest which would assuredly end in victory.

He urged them to fashion their lives after the pattern of the great, whom they could not but admire—great in qualities of goodness, integrity, and purity. These they would find in the humble ranks of the toilers, and very likely in their own homes. What made them great in those admirable qualities? They did not drift, they steered. They kept their passions and impulses under control; they had an ideal always in view. Very likely they had a deep-seated and earnest trust in God and goodness which never failed them in all the vicissitudes of their changeable career.

If they would, therefore, be such as those they should begin in the "solemn days" of youth, and be "an ensample to them that believe, in word, in manner of life, in love, in faith, in purity." And each one should take heed to the exhortation: "Neglect not the gift that is within thee." In becoming members of their respective Guilds they had given expression to their wish and resolve to foster the religious life, and to render some personal service in promoting things pure, true, just, lovely, and of good report.

Mr. Ellis concluded with the appeal: "May the friendship and communion of kindred souls nourish in you a spirit valiant for good—humble and free. Let the work and interests of your Guild be very dear to you. Honour it with your loyalty. As far as possible be ready to serve all its members. Combine in the effort to keep life at a high level, to free it from selfishness, to maintain in it the supremacy of love, to inform it with the noble spirit of ministry. Through this fellowship you decide to "choose life," to pledge yourself to the great deep things of religion, and to some loving labour for the uplifting of men. Take for your encouragement another life motto, that of John Ruskin:

"To-day

Unsullied comes to thee—new born;
Tomorrow is not thine;
The sun may cease to shine
For thee ere earth shall greet its morn.
Be earnest, then, in thought and deed,
Nor fear approaching night;
Calm comes with evening light,
And hope and peace—thy duty heed
To-day."

After tea came the evening meeting in the schoolroom, over which the Rev. Frank K. Freeston presided. There was a large and enthusiastic gathering, numbering nearly two hundred, including members of the Chowbent Guild and Congregation, and visitors from Leigh, Astley, Swinton, Mon-ton, Bolton, Hindley, Ashton-under-Lyne, Higher Broughton, Manchester, and other places.

The proceedings opened with Robert Collyer's hymn,

"With thankful hearts, O God, we come Once more to plan our work for Thee."
The Secretary (Rev. John Ellis) then presented the annual report and Treasurer's statement.

ANNUAL REPORT.

The report stated that the Council had met four times since the last annual meeting—at Oxford, London, Manchester, and Chowbent. At its first meeting the Rev. Joseph Wood was elected vice-president, and the Revs. A. H. Dolphin, Gordon Cooper, J. E. Stronge, and Mr. W. Cheshire were co-opted members of the Council. The Rev. Gordon Cooper, having felt obliged by the pressure of other work to relinquish the secretaryship, and the Secretary of the National Conference not being able to undertake it, the Revs. John Ellis and Alfred Hall had jointly undertaken the duties for the current year. Through the kindness of Mrs. Wallace Bruce the Council were enabled to print and circulate the annual report and Treasurer's statement among all Guild members. The first edition (2,000) of the "Manual of Services and Prayers for Guild Meetings" having been sold, a sub-committee (consisting of the Revs. J. Wood, F. K. Freeston, and J. Ellis) carefully revised the "Manual," and a second edition, improved by the addition of music for the responses and a selection of hymns for Guild meetings, was issued last October and is already in considerable demand.

With a view to encourage habits of thought amongst the members of the Guilds, and to provide a wider choice of subjects for the Prize Essay Scheme, the Revs. F. K. Freeston and Alfred Hall were requested to prepare a topic list, and to indicate the special subjects on which essays might be written and for which prizes would be offered. This was done, and a carefully prepared "Syllabus of Suggested Subjects for Guild Papers, Reading Circles, and Prize Essays" was printed, and issued to the Guilds, in time for the autumn session. It is gratifying to find that several of the Guilds had found the "Suggested Subjects" useful, and that much time and thought had been devoted to their study. As, however, but a small part of this comprehensive topic list could possibly be dealt with at the ordinary Guild meetings during one season, the Council suggests that it be used again during 1907-8.

The special subjects for competition essays, under their respective sections, were as follows:—

Section I.—The Roots of Religion: "The Witness of God in Nature: God the Creator."

Section II.—Some Bible Stories and their Meaning: "Moses."

Section III.—Hebrew Prophets and their Message: "Amos and Hosea."

Section IV.—The Life of Jesus: Essay based on the first three Gospels.

Section V.—The Teachings of Jesus: "The Beatitudes."

Section VI.—Religion in History: "The Ejected Clergy: What we Owe to their Loyalty."

Section VII.—Biography: "St. Francis of Assisi."

Section VIII.—The Social History and Literature of England: "The Church and the People."

Again the response had been far from satisfactory. The essays sent in had, generally, merited high praise; but there were only 16 essays and only six Guilds were represented, and the Council had therefore decided that the Prize Essay Scheme must be re-considered and modified.

The Council had hoped to make a comprehensive report of the condition, aims, and methods of the Guilds comprising the Union; but several secretaries had not replied in time giving the information desired. Judging, however, from the reports to hand, it appeared that the main objects of the Union had been duly honoured. In almost every case the regular meetings are opened by a brief devotional service, and in the majority of Guilds the "Manual of Services and Prayers" published by the Union is used.

Guild members have been mindful of others, as the following extracts from reports will show:—

"The Guild sent 16 sick children to the country last summer." "The Guild promoted a Sale of Work, which realised £130, for the improvement of the Sunday School; made a collection for the lifeboat, &c.; gave a concert to the inmates of the Work-house." "The Guild, on Christmas morning, provided a 'Robin' breakfast for 1,000 poor children; provides articles for use in sick room for any poor people who need them; made house to house visitation (25,000) with invitation to special services; re-opened Chapel, which had long been closed, and Guild members conduct services." "The Guild entertained workers of the 'Institute for the Blind.'" "The Guild, during the last two years, collected £50 from the members for the new schools. Made offering of over 400 Easter eggs, which were distributed among the sick and poor, and the orphan and children's homes." "Guild members engage to visit the sick among the congregation and others; handed over a small sum of money to the church." "Members, in turn, provide flowers for the church each Sunday. Cases of distress in the congregation are dealt with by the Guild Committee. A yearly donation (in kind—books, chairs, &c.) is given to the Church."

A special effort was made during the year to interest some of the larger Sunday Schools in the Guild movement. Sixty-three superintendents were written to, and furnished with pamphlets on the Guild idea and syllabus of proposed work. Of these forty-three did not send any reply or acknowledgment of the letter. Among the replies received three said a Guild would be formed, two hope to form a Guild, and five would give the matter further consideration. Four others had Guilds but not yet connected with the Union. A larger Guilds Union would undoubtedly lead to more co-operation among the churches, and would be helpful to the young people, as in case of removal to another town they might be welcomed into a Guild similar to the one they had left. The report concluded by commending the Guild movement to the respectful consideration of those who are willing to promote work "For God and the Good Life."

The Treasurer's statement showed a balance of £1 6s. 7d., but a special appeal will have to be made to raise a sum of about £25 to meet the cost of the new edition of the Manual.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the reports, spoke of the high aims and noble spirit of the Guilds. He regarded the Guild as a sort of bridge between the school and the church. In the Guild, the other institutions of the Church which existed to promote the intellectual, recreational, and social life of the members could be drawn together, and infused with the religious spirit. He read a letter which he received from Rev. Joseph Wood, regretting his inability to be present, and suggesting that it would be well if the Guilds could be induced to unite in some common enterprise. The President, in conclusion, referred to the achievements of the Young People's Religious Union in America, and intimated that the societies forming this Union combined to promote the formation and support of new churches of our Liberal Faith.

The Rev. R. S. REDFERN seconded the resolution, and spoke from experience of the value of the Guild to the life of a church. He said, the old problem of how to retain our elder scholars was in a large measure solved by the Guild.

In putting the resolution, which was carried unanimously, the President suggested that the Secretary (Rev. John Ellis) be requested to convey hearty greetings to the Young People's Union, U.S.A., during his visit to America next autumn.

On the motion of the Rev. PETER HOLT, seconded by Mr. Isaac Barrow, the Rev. F. K. Freeston was re-elected president; and the following were elected members of the Council: Mrs. Wallace Bruce (London), Miss Edith Gittins (Leicester), Mr. Alf. Thompson (London), Mr. J. Highfield (Kidderminster), Mr. W. Cheshire (Birmingham), Rev. C. Peach (Manchester), Rev. C. Hargrove (Leeds), Rev. J. J.

Wright (Chowbent). Four others, according to rule, will be co-opted at the first meeting of the Council.

On the motion of the Rev. JOHN ELLIS, seconded by Mr. Thomas Holt, hearty thanks were accorded to the Rev. J. J. Wright, and the members of the Chowbent Guild, for their generous hospitality.

Brief and stimulating addresses on Guild work and Guild ideals were given by the Rev. C. Peach, Miss Redfern, and Rev. J. J. Wright; and members of Chowbent Chapel contributed musical items.

The meetings were full of enthusiasm, hope, and purpose, and should help to promote the Guild movement in the Manchester district.

ULSTER UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE annual sermons were preached on Sunday in the First Presbyterian Church, Belfast, by the Rev. John Page Hopps, to large congregations; and on Monday evening the annual meeting was held in the Central Hall.

After tea the chair was taken by Principal Gordon, of Manchester, and the report of the Committee was read by the Rev. J. A. Kelly, the hon. secretary.

The report stated that their agent, Miss M'Caw, has been able to resume her duties, in improved health, at the beginning of May, and that the work of the Depository had been well maintained. There was a constant demand for the "Declaration of the Scriptural Principles of Unitarian Christians," and a fresh edition of 10,000 had been ordered. The death of the following friends and supporters was reported with great regret:—Mrs. Davidson (Wind-sor), William M. Kennedy, Mrs. Latimer, William Lilburn, J.P., Mrs. Lowrie Martin, Mrs. Malcolm, Mrs. A. G. Malcolm, Miss Marshall, Rev. John Miskimmin, John Moore, J.P. (Dromore), James P. Orr, and Walter Scott, J.P. (Newry).

The accounts, presented by the Rev. G. J. Slipper, showed an adverse balance of £57 13s. 11d. Subscriptions were less, by £5, than last year, and an increased income of £30 was needed.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the reports, referred to the friends they had lost by death, and appealed to the young people to come forward, not only with financial help but with personal service.

The Rev. J. A. KELLY, who seconded, spoke with confidence of their principles and the need of their work. He welcomed the Rev. R. J. Campbell's "New Theology" movement, as compelling men to think, and deprecated the personalities which had been introduced into the controversy. The heads of theological colleges, who made light of Mr. Campbell's academic learning, were treating him just as the leaders of thought in Christ's time treated the Master. But the people listened to him in spite of them.

The report and statement of accounts were adopted, and on the motion of Mr. James Davidson, seconded by Mr. W. H. M'Fadden, a hearty vote of thanks was passed to Rev. J. Page Hopps, welcoming him to Belfast, and thanking him for his services on Sunday on behalf of the Association.

Mr. Hopps responded, pleading for more modesty and simplicity of religious faith, and a motion by the Rev. J. Kennedy, reaffirming the principle of the Association, followed by a vote of thanks to the Chairman and helpers, concluded the business. The meeting closed with the Benediction.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE IN SOUTH WALES.

WE reported last week the first of the series of visits which the Rev. Joseph Wood, as President of the National Conference, is paying to the churches of South Wales. That first visit, on the threshold of the province, was to Newport, Monmouth. Notes of further visits are added here:—

CARDIFF.—On Wednesday, April 10, Mr. Wood preached in the West Grove Church, his subject being the question, “Does the modern man need a church?”

CEFN-COED.—On Thursday, April 11, he lectured in the Old Meeting House, on “The New Theology and the Old Religion.” There was a large attendance, especially of young men, who listened with great attention.

ABERDARE.—On Friday, April 12, he gave his lecture on “The New Theology and the Old Religion.” In spite of a very wet evening the chapel was well filled, three-fourths of the large congregation being men.

PONTYPRIDD.—On Saturday afternoon, a ministerial conference was held here to meet Mr. Wood. A paper was read by Professor Moore, of Carmarthen, on “The Supply of Students for the Ministry,” and a second paper by the Rev. J. Hathren Davies, of Cefn, on “The Minister’s Difficulties.” We hope for some notes of these interesting papers in a subsequent issue. Mr. Wood embraced the opportunity of discussing with the ministers present the prospects of our churches in South Wales. In the evening he lectured on “The New Theology and the Old Religion.” The new and beautiful little chapel erected by the friends at Pontypridd was quite filled. On Sunday evening, Mr. Wood preached on “What think ye of Christ?” and again the chapel was filled.

PENTRE.—On Sunday afternoon, April 14, Mr. Wood visited this mining centre, and preached to a large congregation on “The Great Army of the Obscure.”

SWANSEA.—The meeting of the South East Wales Unitarian Society at Swansea on Monday is separately reported. Everywhere Mr. Wood has met with a most cordial reception.

On bravely through the sunshine and the showers!

Time hath his work to do, and we have ours.—Emerson.

Poor and shallow as one’s own soul is, it is blessed to think that a sort of transubstantiation is possible by which the greater ones can live in us. Egotism apart, another’s greatness, beauty, or bliss is one’s own. And let us sing a Magnificat when we are conscious that this power of expansion and sympathy is growing just in proportion as the individual satisfactions are lessening. Miserable dust of the earth we are, but it is worth while to be so for the sake of the living soul—the breath of God within us.—George Eliot.

THE FUNCTION OF A FREE CHURCH.

BY THE REV. S. S. BRETTELL, M.A.

“TRUE Reality,” says Lotze in his “Microcosmus,” “is not Matter, and still less Idea, but is the living Personal Spirit of God and the world of personal spirits which He has created.” Such I believe to be true doctrine: and to bring human spirits into conscious relationship with the Personal Spirit of God is the function of a Church. A Church must be a worshipping society. You may have debating clubs, or lecture halls, or religious discussion classes without worship, but a Church must consist of a body of worshippers. And what is it to worship? It is to bring our souls into the immediate presence of the Infinite One; to measure our lives by His standard; to try our thoughts by His holiness; to test our deeds by His purposes. It is to have the awe of the Eternal within us; to unite our souls with His; to enter into a holy alliance with Him; to feel abashed at our unworthiness before Him; and to resolve that henceforth our lives shall be consecrated to Him. It is, as His children, to lay before Him our plans, to ask whether our purposes coincide with His, or whether they are in collision with His will. This it is to worship. And if we are to commune with Him after this manner, it is necessary that all barriers that stand between the human and Divine spirit shall be removed. By individuals this difficulty is not felt—direct access to the Father is the privilege of each soul; each person can remove all that he deems hindrances to communion. But with an assembly of worshippers the difficulties are not so easily overcome. Still the essential problem is the same, and a Church, in its collective capacity, should be as free to throw off hindrances to a pure worship as the individual. Freedom is as necessary for the Church as for the individual. Each must make its own rules, in the light of reason, conscience, God; but, apart from the law of right and the sanction of the Holy Spirit, no external authorities must coerce a Church in its ritual or its doctrines. This is the Ideal Free Church. It will refuse to submit to any and every outer authority, be it Pope, Bible, or Christ, unless the teaching receive the sanction of the voice within. The Church will use all means of enlightenment before it pronounces its decisions; it will endeavour to assimilate the loftiest teachings of the greatest religious thinkers of all times and peoples; it will try to avail itself of all that helps the religious life in art, poetry, science, law, and history; and, above all, it will not forget that a part of its environment is the Father of lights Himself, from whom every good and perfect gift cometh. A Free Church, then, is a self-governing, worshipping Society, which goes whither reason, conscience, and the Holy Spirit guide it. What seems good to the Holy Spirit and the Church—that, and that alone, will it regard as possessing binding force.

If such a Church be true to its principles it will be a progressive Church. What is Progress? For our present purpose it may be defined as the advancing from a poorer to a richer life, intellectually, morally, religiously. Progress always implies the addition or evolution of a new and higher quality; otherwise stagnation and decay would result. A stream cannot rise higher than its source. The sources of progress are contained in God and Man. The Spirit of God communicates to man fresh revelations as he fits himself to receive them; and so by man’s exertions and God’s inspirations the institutions of the world are ever acquiring new truths, and rising to a diviner conception of their duties. A Free Church, then, will be progressive; its function is to seek moral and religious truth.

It must not only seek the truth, but it must spread the truth it finds. I have been dealing with the Church hitherto as a “Church of the living God.” But all Churches would claim that title. In its progressive capacity a Church may acquire a new truth—one it may deem so important in itself and in its issues that it cannot remain silent about it. Different things require distinct names; a new religion or theology demands a new name. This proves to be no insuperable difficulty to a Free Church. It has a right to choose its name, and a right to change its name when that name no longer represents the truth for which it stands. For the new truth may not only change a Church’s theology, it may also alter the character of its religion. The worshipper of God as absolute sovereign, who by virtue of His sovereignty has power, and will exercise His power, to predestinate some men to everlasting bliss and others to everlasting woe, without regard to any good or ill in them, cannot stand in the same spiritual relationship to the Supreme Being as does one who reveres God as a Father who will do justice to His every human child. The relations of a slave to a master are not the same as those of a son to a father. And hence with a changed religion and theology the Church is forced to adopt a fresh designation. Whatever term seems to a Free Church to describe fittingly its religion and theology, that term the Church can attach to itself. A Free Church can call itself Christian if it so decide, or Trinitarian, or Unitarian, or Theistic, so long as the term chosen accurately represents it to the community; but it is its imperative duty to modify or remove the temporarily adopted name the moment it becomes misleading to its members and the public.

Now, this duty of the Church to be loyal to the truth it has acquired carries with it an important consequence; it negatives the idea of a Free Pulpit. The pulpit of a Free Church is not to be used as a channel for the diffusion of Buddhism, Mohammedanism, Parsecism, and the numerous forms of Christianity; it is a pulpit for the proclamation and defence of its own gospel. The Church is free to invite a representative of any of those systems to occupy its pulpit either as a friendly act or in order to hear at first-hand what can be adduced in favour of that particular religion; it is free indeed, in the sense that it has the power, to turn its pulpit into a vehicle of any and every mode of thought; but to do so would show that it had lost the function of a Church. To so act is as much as to say to pulpit and pew, "Go to, now; let us preserve chaos."

If a Free Church has come to the conclusion that Sacerdotalism carries with it pernicious consequences, is it justified in throwing its pulpit open to such teaching? I affirm that it is not. If a Free Church has been led to the belief that Trinitarianism involves unethical teachings concerning God and man, will it not be disloyal to its own convictions if it offer its pulpit as a channel for the communication of these errors? I assert that it will.

A Free Church is the negation of a Free Pulpit. (Parenthetically, let me avow my conviction that the pulpit of a Free Church will be the freest that can exist.) You cannot divide a Church into two separate and independent parts—minister and congregation. In a Free Church a minister is a part of the congregation. A Free Church does not necessarily imply a pulpit at all—in the sense of one man being set apart as regular preacher to the assembled members. We may yet have to revert to the system that prevailed in the primitive Christian Church, when all the "saints" were entitled to speak the word of instruction, admonition, and encouragement.

But although there can be no Free Pulpit, the preacher is under a sacred obligation to utter his own convictions, no man making him afraid.

A larger truth may be revealed to a Church suddenly, but ordinarily the acquisition will be the result of a slow and deliberate process of thought and experience. But the constitution of a Free Church provides for either contingency. A minister, in his quest for truth, may discover what to him are purer and loftier thoughts of God and man; he may deem them of such supreme importance that necessity is laid upon him to emphasise them in his preaching. He may plead so powerfully and persuasively on behalf of the new thoughts as to carry the Church with him, and then it will take a step forward. But the Church may reject the strange doctrine. If it should do so, it should not surprise the minister if he receive an intimation that his services will be no longer acceptable, nor should he feel aggrieved at so unpleasant a consequence. The Church and he have a different gospel to advocate, and neither can be expected to be unfaithful to conviction. There must be a working agreement between minister and people, and if there be not, then he and his flock must part—in mutual respect and esteem. The one nor the few must decide the policy of the Church; the many must prevail. How numerous the many ought to be must be left to the individual Church to decide. But it is incumbent on the Church not to act without due deliberation in such crises. Calmly, patiently, and prayerfully, it should "try the spirits, whether they are of God."

The case, of course, may be reversed. The minister may be unprogressive, and not march with the Church. But the policy and action of the Church will be the same. It will deal with other members on similar lines. In every worshipping society there will usually be some laggards who will find the pace of the majority too rapid for their peace, and who will drop out of the ranks one by one; or the Church itself may not move fast enough for the adventurous spirits enrolled on its register. In such a case it behoves the pioneers to remember that they are not the Church, and if the Church will not advance they must be content to exert their influence within its borders, or else withdraw from a society that does not meet their deepest needs.

But the function of a Free Church does not end here. A Church exists not only to develop the religious life of its members, but to permeate society with its principles. A Church should inspire reformers, create philanthropists, and give ideals to rulers of city and state. In proportion as it achieves these ends does it fulfil its purpose. It desires to make the laws, the institutions, the policies of the towns and the nation, organs of justice and beneficence. But the Church is not a political institution; it is independent of all parties. It may even number among its members adherents of all political parties. How, then, can it influence in its corporate capacity the policy of city or nation?

It may take action in two ways. It may become a centre of sociological education. A Church exists to remove evils from society. But to work effectively to this end it is necessary that it should understand civic, social, national, and international problems, and to do this it must study them. Each Church, then, can in its discretion establish a class or classes for the study of social facts. These classes should be open to every adult member of the Church, and all members should, as far as opportunity will allow, attend them. These classes will aim at discovering what, in the light of the Fatherhood of God, constitutes the brotherhood of man. The Church, through these agencies, will seek to discover the relations that should rightfully subsist between man and woman, employer and employed, nation and nation, between civilised nation and savage tribe. The inquirers will not even stop there; they will endeavour to settle the attitude that man can justly assume to sub-human beings. No knowledge of the past will make up for ignorance of the present. Justice and goodness are perpetually gaining a richer content; what was adjudged lawful and right among the ancient Jews, Greeks, and Romans would be regarded as intolerable now. Each generation should lift the moral standard higher. And we desire that our ideas of justice and goodness shall be still further enriched and expanded until these qualities are perceived by us, even as they appear to the mind of the Eternal, to the end that we may become co-workers with Him.

Secondly, as occasion demands, the Church can turn itself into a deliberative assembly for considering and pronouncing judgment upon crucial questions of the times. On some subjects its verdicts will be unanimous; on others contradictory views will be expressed, and violent antagonisms evoked among the members. This is to be expected and allowed for. If the assembly favours any particular policy by a unanimous vote, that decision will go forth as the voice of the Church; if a majority, large or small, agree, it will be announced to the world as such. There must be no attempt at coercive action on the part of the majority towards the minority on such disputable matters; the decision of each individual must be respected, and no uncharitable aspersions must be cast upon the motives of opponents. "Who art thou that judgest thy neighbour?"

These remarks apply equally to the minister and his relations to the congregation, and to the congregation and its relations to the minister. In a Free Church the minister is a member of the Church, with the same rights as any other member. The fact that a Free Church has no authoritative rulers in its ranks is seen now to have a most important bearing. It is not for the minister to decide what the Church's attitude to these vexed questions shall be; he must speak for himself alone, unless the Church has authorised him to be its mouthpiece.

I am not counselling timidity on the part of the minister. The fully consecrated man allows no fear to influence his actions, and if he hear the Spirit of God whispering in his soul, "Declare ye this," he will lift up his voice in the name of the Most High, in scorn of consequence. I am not counselling timidity, but I am pleading for a wise courage.

Explanation should always precede denunciation; the former procedure will in numerous cases obviate the necessity of the latter. And the Church, called together to discuss grave civic and national issues, will constitute a fairer auditory for his message than would an ordinary attendance of the Church; fairer, because other members can, in their turn, exercise their right of speech, and, if they differ from him, may challenge his facts and correct his inferences. In matters of civic and state policy he will not infrequently find in his congregation members who are more conversant with the facts than he, and who have a more vivid realisation of the practical difficulties to be encountered and overcome. Intellectual and high-souled men desirous of discovering and adopting the best method of procedure in serious crises oftentimes arrive at the most divergent conclusions. Here is an instance from recent history which strikingly illustrates my present contention. I allude to the agitation that arose in England over the conduct pursued by Governor Eyre in preventing or suppressing an insurrection of the negroes in Jamaica in the year 1865. Rival societies were formed to denounce and support respectively the action of the Governor. The Committee opposed to Mr. Eyre included the following names:—John Stuart Mill, Herbert Spencer, Thomas Henry Huxley, and Goldwin Smith—a noble group. The association convoked for his defence had among its members Thomas Carlyle, John Ruskin, Alfred Tennyson, and Charles Kingsley—an equally honourable company. Who will have the hardihood to assert that either group was actuated by sordid motives? Other instances nearer to our own day will immediately occur to you. Now, it may be asked, "What is likely to be the effect of these collisions of opinion among the members on the existence and prosperity of the society? Will a Church be able to endure such shocks without scattering its worshippers and occasionally sacrificing its minister?" It should be able, and will be able, to avoid these disagreeable contingencies if it be grounded on the true principle of religious toleration—on the inalienable right of every individual to form and stand by his own judgment. Given that ideal, and a Church will have power to weather all storms and sail uninjured into port.

One further remark, and I have done. Each Church has its own work to do independently of all others. Isolated or federated, it has its own life to develop, and its own warfare to accomplish, and it must throw into the performance of its duties all the zeal and energy of which it is capable.

A true Church cannot be weak and insignificant. It may be few in numbers, and may possess little material wealth, but if the hearts of its worshippers are aglow with love of God and man it will be a potent instrument of righteousness.

All religions and Churches are vitalised by the Holy Spirit of God, but the Spirit is not possessed by all in the same degree. It is for each religion and each Church to be loyal to its own doctrines, and obedient to its own heavenly visions, trusting to the Heavenly Father to add knowledge to knowledge and grace to grace, until the absolute truth is seen in its pure and radiant whiteness by one and all. Let us pray and work for that consummation. But until that day dawns let us not forget that only by being faithful to our own trust can we promote the interests of the Kingdom of God.

OPEN CHURCHES.

SIR,—The Committee of our Brighton church has under consideration a suggestion that the building should be left open daily for meditation and prayer. I should be glad to hear of any of our group of churches that have adopted this course, and especially to learn whether it is found that the facilities are abused or any serious damage or expense results.

THE UNITARIAN VAN MISSION.

SIR,—It may be of interest to the many friends of the Van Mission to know something of our arrangements for the coming season. Operations will begin shortly after the middle of May, and by the first week in June four vans will be upon the road. Two vans are being built at Stamford, and the campaign will be opened in that ancient and interesting town. After the opening meetings, one van will make its way by Peterborough, Luton, St. Albans, Watford, to London, halting at these and intermediate places en route. The remainder of the season will be spent on the east side of the Metropolis in the district of the South-Eastern Counties Provincial Assembly.

The other Stamford van will, after visiting Melton Mowbray, come into the district of the North Midland Association, assistance having been promised at Ilkeston, Loughborough, Coalville, Burton, and other places. It will then pass through the crowded towns of the Potteries, Stafford, Stoke, Newcastle, Burslem, &c. Passing Manchester, it will spend a few weeks at the end of the season in the district of Walkden, Tyldesley, and the group of towns and villages between Bolton and Manchester.

The van which made the original tour last season will open with a mission in Bradford (Manchester), and then move on rapidly by Mossley and Marsden to Huddersfield. Between this town and Doncaster there are a number of busy places with populations from 10,000 to 20,000—e.g., Mirfield, Normanton, Pontefract, &c. The van will next proceed by Worksop and Bolsover to Sheffield, returning to Manchester by Mexbro', Barnsley, Glossop, and Mottram. In this tour the Manchester Association of Churches and the Yorkshire Union will co-operate.

Another van is building at Yeadon, near Leeds, and on completion will be taken by rail to Old Cumnock, in Scotland. It will then travel towards Ayr, thence to Kilmarnock, Ardrossan, along the coast-line via Largs, Wemyss Bay, Greenock, and so forward by Port Glasgow and Paisley to Glasgow. This tour will be under the auspices of the McQuaker Trustees and the Scottish Unitarian Association.

The combined tours will occupy from seventy-five to eighty weeks, and a large staff of missionaries is consequently necessary. Offers of assistance have already been received for considerably over half the time. All last season's missionaries were communicated with, and also a number of ministers who were known to be in sympathy with the movement. I should be glad to receive further offers of assistance from ministers who would be willing to travel with the van for a week.

It will be noticed that the vans will visit many towns and villages which are remote from existing churches, and it would be of great service to the Mission if our friends would forward the names and addresses of Unitarians or probable sympathisers resident in the places along the routes. We should be glad, also, to hear from ministers and churches, within reach of the places to be visited, who could render assistance with the musical arrangements, &c.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the vans have been provided through the generosity of private donors, and that in some instances the expenses of the tour have been covered in the same way. There are, however, considerable expenses still to meet, and it is hoped that contributions will be forthcoming. It is important that the Van Mission should have a large constituency, and it would be gratifying if we could start the season with a thousand subscribers. Last year there was practically no response to the appeal for funds until we were able to announce definite arrangements for the tour. When it was seen that the work was sure to go forward, subscriptions for both large and small amounts began to come in. We have arrived at this stage for the coming season, and may, no doubt, look forward confidently to a repetition of last year's experience in the matter of subscriptions, which may be sent to the Treasurer of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, London, W.C., or to me, at my new address.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Accrington.—The fourth annual musical festival of the N.E. Lancashire S.S. Union was held in the Town Hall on Saturday afternoon, April 13, and there was a large attendance, all the affiliated churches being represented. Mr. T. Marsden, of Padiham, conducted, and the Rev. J. C. Jenkins, of Padiham, president of the Union, presided, and gave an address on the helpful power of music, and the work their churches might accomplish. Choruses, anthems, and hymns were admirably rendered by the choir and orchestra, and there were a number of solos. The Rev. J. Islan Jones read a scripture lesson and offered prayer. The festival concluded with the Lord's Prayer and Benediction. After tea there was a further musical entertainment.

Bradford: West Bowling.—The first Sunday-school anniversary at Broadway-avenue Church was held last Sunday, a very large congregation assembling. The preacher was the Rev. A. W. Fox, of Tadmorden. In the afternoon an address was given by Mrs. E. Ceredig Jones. The services were very encouraging and inspiring.

Bury St. Edmunds.—At Churchgate-street Chapel on Thursday afternoon, April 11, a service in connection with the induction of the Rev. J. M. Connell was held. The Rev. Alfred Hall conducted the service, and the Rev. Dr. Drummond, of Oxford, preached an eloquent and appropriate sermon. In the evening a public meeting was held in the ante-room of the Athenæum. The Rev. J. Pollard presided, and offered a cordial welcome to Mr. Connell, which was seconded by Mr. W. Rogers, and supported by Mr. W. H. Scott, president of the Eastern Union, the Revs. Lucking Tavenor, R. H. Fuller, Alfred Hall, Dr. Drummond, and Mr. A. M. Stevens, of Norwich. Mr. Connell thanked all the speakers for the kind words spoken, and alluding to his chapel, said it came into existence nearly 200 years ago. At one time the congregation played a very important part in the religious and social life of the town, but it had dwindled down. He wanted the number to increase, and he asked his congregation to help him all they could to get greater enthusiasm and earnest devotion.

Chorley.—Special sermons were preached on Sunday last by the Rev. W. T. Bushrod, on the second anniversary of his settlement. The congregations, both afternoon and evening, were most encouraging.

Govan.—The week night lectures delivered by the Rev. E. T. Russell in November and in February having been well attended, the McQuaker Trustees have consented to a few evening services being held on the Sunday. On April 14 the first of these services was held. There was a large and enthusiastic congregation. Mr. Russell preached on "The Salvation we need." The choir consisted of friends from Ross Street, and from St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. The Rev. J. Forrest also took part in the service.

Manchester: Longsight.—Last Saturday, at a social evening arranged for the purpose, Mr. and Mrs. O. H. Heys were the recipients of gifts subscribed for by many members and friends of the Free Christian Church. The former was presented with a gold watch and chain, with monogram on the back, and the following inscription within:—"Presented to Mr. O. H. Heys in recognition of twenty years' devoted service as voluntary Organist and Choirmaster to the Longsight Free Christian Church, April, 1907." Mrs. Heys also received a pendant, set with pearls and peridots, she having been for many years a very loyal and efficient member of the choir.

Reading (Resignation).—The Rev. R. H. U. Bloor has signified his intention to terminate his ministry at the end of June. This decision has been received with very great regret. After the date named, Mr. Bloor will be at liberty to accept engagements for preaching and lecturing.

South-East Wales Unitarian Society.—The annual meetings of this society, representing fifteen churches, were held at Swansea on Monday. Conferences were held in the morning and afternoon. Mr. L. N. Williams, J.P., Aberdare, who presided, said he regretted the number of vacant pulpits—viz., Cardiff, Merthyr, Pontypridd, Clydach Vale, and Cwmbach. Mrs. Lewis, Pontypridd, secretary postal mission, reported, as instructed, she had offered an advertisement of their periodicals in a Welsh denominational paper, but it had been refused. The conference adopted an "information form" for the use of churches in sending returns to the society. A scheme embodying a proposal to alter the constitution of the society was, on the suggestion of Professor Moore, of Carmarthen, referred to a committee. In the afternoon a paper was read by Mr. F. Taylor on "The Church and the Social Service Movement." This we hope to publish next week. In the discussion the Rev. Joseph Wood, president of the National Conference, said the church did not only ask for the salvation of the human soul, but the salvation of society. If society was to be saved they must not only touch the individual, but institutions. Some of the questions they were called upon to deal with were the housing question, old-age pensions, sweating, gambling, and the great question of a living wage, which was as much a question for parsons as anyone else. (Laughter.) The church in the past had been a benevolent institution; it had been generous, and they must not detract from its great services, but after all what had been done was palliation, and not a cure. Mr. W. Holmes, Swansea; Rev. D. G. Rees, Bridgend; Mr. G. Thomas, Merthyr; Mr. R. E. Stone, Cardiff; Miss Brock, Mrs. Hutton, and others spoke. In the evening the annual sermon was preached by the Rev. Joseph Wood.

Stockport.—On Sunday last the Rev. B. C. Constable completed a series of five Sunday evening discourses on "The New Theology, the Rev. R. J. Campbell and Unitarianism." The attendances at the services were much beyond the average, and the discourses were listened to with evident interest. The annual meeting of the congregation was held on Thursday, April 11, under the presidency of Colonel J. G. Johnson, V.D. The annual report was adopted, which showed a great deal of activity during the year both in church and school, nearly £200 having been raised by special efforts. The average afternoon attendance at the Sunday-school was reported to have been larger than it had been for the past twenty years or more. The election of the vestry and various officers and delegates took place, and the Rev. B. C. Constable delivered his pastoral address. A "jumble sale" was held on the following Saturday, which realised about £10. The late John Turner, an old and respected member of the congregation, has left a legacy of £100 to the church.

Sychbant, Cardigan (Opening of New Chapel).—The new chapel at Sychbant, Llanwenog, is described as a handsome building, well suited to the district in which it stands, and a great improvement on the carpenter's shop which the congregation has used for the past twenty years, having to clear it out every Saturday for Sunday's use. There is a burial-ground attached to the new chapel, and already there are some graves in it. Re-opening services were held April 8 and 9, in connection with the quarterly meetings of the South Wales Unitarian Association. The chapel was filled to overflowing, and there was a good muster of ministers. Seven sermons altogether were preached. The special association sermon was preached by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford, to whom more than anyone else the new chapel is due. On Tuesday, April 9, the committee met, and fixed the next meetings for July 3 and 4, when the Rev. E. Gwilym Evans, of Dukinfield, is to be the preacher, and Captain W. Davies, president for the year, will deliver his address. Mr. E. J. Thomas, of Swansea, and the Rev. R. J. Jones, of Aberdare, were recommended as trustees of the new chapel at Pontypridd. The Rev. T. A. Thomas was appointed assistant secretary to the Rev. W. James. A hearty welcome was accorded to the Rev. Alva Richards, the new minister of Gellionen and Trebanos. The meetings altogether were most encouraging and full of enthusiasm.

Taunton (Resignation).—The Rev. F. A. Homer has resigned the pastorate of this church, on account of ill-health, to take effect at the end of June next, and the resignation has been accepted by the congregation, who deeply deplore that the state of Mr. Homer's health has compelled him to sever his connection with the church.

Tavistock.—The Rev. J. Barron preached his farewell sermon to a good congregation at the Abbey Chapel on Sunday evening from the text, 2 Thess. iii. 16, "The Lord of peace himself give you peace always by all means." Mr. Barron goes to Ashton-under-Lyne.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OUR readers will find on another page details of the arrangements made for Whit-week by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Sunday School Association. It will be observed that instead of the Essex Hall Lecture there will be a public meeting on Tuesday evening, May 21, when Miss Mary E. Richmond, from Wellington, New Zealand, will be among the speakers, and the American Unitarian Association will be represented by the Rev. Richard W. Boynton, of St. Paul's, Minnesota. The topics selected by the various speakers give promise of a most interesting and inspiring evening at Essex Hall.

The Rev. Alex. Webster, of Aberdeen, will be the preacher at the Religious Service at Little Portland-street Chapel at 11.30 on Wednesday morning, May 22. The President's luncheon to delegates of District Societies and others will be at 1.30. The Annual Business Meeting will begin at 4 p.m. at Essex Hall. The conversazione, usually held on the Thursday, will be on Wednesday evening at the King's Hall, Holborn, a new place of meeting this year. On Thursday morning, at Essex Hall, after a brief devotional service by the Rev. Alfred Hall, of Norwich, papers dealing with the principles and contents of "The New Theology" will be read by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., and the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, M.A. The discussion will be opened by the Rev. John Page Hopps.

On Friday morning, May 24, there will be a meeting of the representatives of District Societies to consider various questions affecting the welfare of our churches. The Rev. Charles Hargrove will introduce the topic of the grouping of two or more small congregations under one minister.

Dr. W. Blake Odgers will preside over the anniversary meetings of the Sunday School Association on Tuesday, May 21. The Rev. H. D. Roberts will read a paper on "The Right Use of Power and Knowledge in the Sunday School Class." The discussion will be opened by Miss E. Davy, of Leicester.

The National Unitarian Temperance Association will hold a public meeting, presided over by the Earl of Carlisle, on Thursday evening, when present-day aspects of the temperance question will be discussed by various speakers.

TO-MORROW, which is the first Sunday in term, the Principal will preach in Manchester College Chapel, at Oxford, and on May 5, the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, who is home again, after spending the winter in Italy. On the remaining Sundays in May and on June 2, Dr. Hunter will preach, and will also give four Sunday evening lectures on Maurice, Robertson of Brighton, Colenso, and Martineau. Professor Henry Jones is to lecture this term on Tuesdays and Thursdays at 5 p.m. on "The Religion of Idealism, with special reference to Kant and the Post-Kantians." These lectures are open to the public. Mr. Addis is lecturing this term on the Early History and Archæology of Israel and on the Wisdom Literature. The Principal's courses are on "The Person and Work of Jesus Christ in the Johannine writings" and "The Life and Teaching of Jesus Christ according to the first three Gospels." All lectures are open to members of the University.

At a meeting held in the Liverpool Town Hall on Tuesday, under the presidency of the Lord Mayor, a local branch of the Anti-Sweating League was formed. The Bishop of Liverpool and Bishop Whiteside (Roman Catholic) moved and seconded the first resolution, affirming the gravity of the social and industrial evils of sweating, and that efforts should be made to secure by legislation a minimum wage to workers in sweated industries, and a local branch of the National League should be formed. The Rev. H. D. Roberts, of Hope street Church, moved the second resolution, definitely forming the branch, with a committee, of which Alderman W. B. Bowring is chairman, and among the members are Miss Eleanor Rathbone, Canon Kempthorne, Mr. John Edwards, and Mr. Roberts himself.

THE Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, of the Free Christian Church, Leicester, is to give a short course of lectures on liberal religious subjects in the large hall of the Architektenhaus, Wilhelmstrasse, Berlin. Readers of THE INQUIRER, who have friends in Berlin are requested to make this known to them. The first lecture on "Prophecy Old and New," is on May 7, at 8 p.m. Tickets of admission may be had from the leading booksellers or from the Frauen-Rundschau, 5 Eyke von Repkowplatz.

WE congratulate Dr. W. Blake Odgers on his appointment as Gresham Lecturer in Law. He will deliver his inaugural Address at Gresham College, Basinghall-street, London, on Tuesday next, April 30, at 6 p.m. His subject will be "Sir Thomas Gresham and the Study of the Law." Dr. Odgers will describe the present state of English Law and compare it with the time of Sir Thomas Gresham (1518 to 1579). On the three following days, at the same hour, Dr. Odgers will lecture on "What Law is"; "Ownership," and "Rights over the property of Another." The lectures are free to the public, to men and to women.

"EIGHTY years a teetotaller and never a headache is the record of Mr. Charles Bell, of Redcar, the Tees-side temperance veteran." So said the Northern Echo on Saturday week, recording a meeting of the Stockton Temperance Society held in honour of Mr. Bell. On April 10, 1827, Mr. Bell was born, and he is well known among our churches in the North. "Dr. Diet, Dr. Quiet, Dr. Oxygen," he told the audience, had been the first three of the six physicians from whom he had profited most during his long life.

IN connection with the meetings of the International Council at Boston next September, we learn that already Messrs. Thos. Cook & Son have booked berths for eighty-five visitors from this country. The one hundred bookings necessary to obtain the reduced fares may now be regarded as a certainty, and we trust that the remaining fifteen or more will make speed to book.

WE have called attention more than once to the remarkable series of articles on "Creed Revision in Scotland," which has been appearing weekly in the Saturday issues of the Glasgow Herald ever since last Christmas. The series was concluded last Saturday, by a final article by Dr. John Hunter, of which we hope to give some account next week.

ROGER WILLIAMS AND RHODE ISLAND.—II.

ROGER WILLIAMS has been until recently one of the misunderstood characters of history. A man in advance of his age, he has suffered injustice, not only from contemporary chroniclers, but also from the unsympathetic strictures of later biographers. But justice is being done at last, albeit with tardy steps, and for him, as for Cromwell, there has been a reversal from condemnation to approval.

The comparison with Cromwell is indeed not undeserved. As Luther was the champion of the Protestant Reformation, and Cromwell of the Puritan Revolution, so Roger Williams, in his place and time, was the champion of Religious toleration. The three chief epochs in the history of Religious Liberalism are represented by these three men. Let them all receive honourable mention at Boston. We are more familiar over here with Milton and Jeremy Taylor as apostles of conscience and tolerance. But in the very same year as Milton's famous "Areopagitica," appeared a less-known plea from America, which no less fearlessly summed up the whole matter; and Roger Williams was its writer.

Roger Williams was an Englishman, and most probably born in London. He was the friend of Milton, and of Sir Henry Vane, another fighter for freedom, and of Cromwell as well. Of his early life we know but little. He was a pensioner of Charterhouse and a graduate of Pembroke, studied law under the great Coke, gave it up subsequently for theology, took orders, and became a chaplain in Essex. But he soon found himself opposed to the liturgy and ceremonies of the Church, and was forced to make his choice between acquiescence and conscience. "God knows what gains and preferments I have refused in Old England," he wrote afterwards "to keep my soul undefiled, and not to act with a doubting conscience." "And truly it was as bitter as death to me when Bishop Laud pursued me out of this land." He had already become a marked man and a Puritan; England allowed him no freedom. So, like the Pilgrim Fathers who had fled over five years before, he elected to go to America in the hope of finding a religious liberty denied him in his own country. A young man of six and twenty, he sailed away with his wife Mary on December 1, 1630, and arrived off Nantasket on February 5, after a stormy voyage of 65 days.

But his lines did not fall in pleasant places, and it was well that he could not foresee the dangers through which he would have to pass. The later Massachusetts colonists were very different, both in order and temper, from the Free Church Independents who founded the Church of the Pilgrims. Winthrop and Cotton had not renounced the English Church, nor the right of the State to punish errors and penalise free speech. The Church of the Puritans claimed and used intolerantly both ecclesiastical and civil authority. It was not a State-Church only, but a Church-State, a theocracy. When, therefore, the ardent and impetuous young divine received an invitation to succeed John Wilson at Boston, he promptly declined on the double ground that it was an unseparated church, and also claimed too much interference with conscience. For this he was denounced as contentious, and guilty of raising dissensions. But he was conscientiously contentious and could not do otherwise: freedom of conscience and speech were unheard-of claims.

He became for a short time "Teacher" at Salem, but on the General Court at Boston remonstrating, he removed to the freer religious life of Plymouth and spent two years as assistant to Pastor Ralph Smith. Then he was called back again by the Salem congregation, who had caught his love of freedom, and who ignored the mandate of the Boston Court who sought to annul his appointment. But Williams was summoned before the magistrates on the charge of maintaining dangerous opinions, the chief one being his contention that the civil power had no jurisdiction over conscience, and he was ordered to depart out of Massachusetts within six weeks. A sloop was even sent to Salem with orders to the captain to arrest him and ship him back to England. But when the officers reached the house, he had been gone three days. Secretly, and in haste, he fled into the wilderness to escape arrest, leaving behind his wife and children, until he could find them a home. The story of his wanderings must be given in his own words:—

"When I was unkindly and unchristianly, as I believe, driven from my house and land and wife and children, in midst of a New England winter, that ever honoured Governor Winthrop privately wrote to me to steer my course to the Narragansett Bay and Indians. I took his prudent motion as a hint and voice from God, and, waiving all other thoughts and motions, I steered my course from Salem unto these parts, wherein I may say Peniel, that is, I have seen the face of God. . . . which in this respect and many other providences of the Most Holy and Only Wise, I called Providence. I was sorely tossed for one fourteen weeks, in a bitter winter season, not knowing what bread or bed did mean."

He probably spent these fourteen weeks in coasting from place to place and holding intercourse with the Indian tribes. Ultimately, with four companions, he found a spot beyond the jurisdiction of both the Massachusetts and Plymouth Colonies, and upon the sloping hill side began the first settlement of Rhode Island. To this place, in gratitude for God's merciful providence to him in his distress, he gave the name of Providence.

During his two years with the Plymouth Church he had fraternised with the Indians and learned their language. "My soul's desire was to do the natives good," he explained, but the knowledge and friendship he thus gained was to save and defend Rhode Island. Having maintained that the land belonged to the native, despite any king's patent, he proceeded to purchase from their chiefs so much as he wished, and they, "in consideration of the many kindnesses and services he, Williams, hath continually done for us," gave him other lands without charge. These he divided with his associates in equal shares, although, like Penn, he might have kept them as his own. In the deed of confirmation he thus plainly expressed his intention. "I desired it might be for a shelter for persons distressed for conscience." His wife and children now left Salem to join him. During the next few years numbers of religious refugees from Old and New England fled for shelter to Rhode Island, among them Anne Hutchinson and her "Opinionists," and all found from Roger Williams not merely tolerance, but entire freedom of conscience. THE MINISTERS' INSTITUTE.

A HAPPY fortune in sunny weather favoured the meeting of the Ministers' Institute which was held at Manchester College, Oxford, on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday this week. There was an attendance of from fifty to sixty ministers, and the days of quiet fellowship together were greatly enjoyed.

After a common meal in the College Hall on Monday evening, there was a Communion service in the chapel, conducted by Dr. Carpenter, the Principal, and the Rev. V. D. Davis. On Tuesday morning the devotional service was conducted by the Revs. E. L. H. Thomas and E. A. Voysey, and, after the business meeting, the Rev R. Travers Herford read a paper on "St. Paul and Judaism." In the afternoon the members were entertained to tea by the Principal, after which the Rev. J. Worsley Austin read a paper on "The New Theology, Rev. R. J. Campbell, Sir Oliver Lodge, and the Bishop of Birmingham." In the evening the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas read a paper on "A Free Catholic Church." These papers were all followed by discussion. The Wednesday morning devotional service was conducted by the Revs. W. G. Tarrant and W. J. Jupp, and Professor Henry Jones, of Glasgow, then gave an address on "Immanence and Transcendence." In the afternoon the business of the Institute was concluded, and the meeting closed with a devotional meditation on "The Proem of the Fourth Gospel" and prayer by Dr. Drummond. The members of the Institute are greatly indebted to Mr. A. F. Kerry, the College organist, for his participation in the devotional services, and also, as in previous years, to Mr. Soundy, the College steward, for his admirable arrangements. The members expressed to Professor Henry Jones their gratitude for his most stimulating and delightful address, and also their thanks to the College authorities for the great privilege of meeting in Oxford. To the Rev. F. K. Freeston, the devoted secretary of the Institute, they felt, if they did not have an opportunity fully to express, the sincerest gratitude for all he had done to secure the undoubted success of the gathering.

THE MARTINEAU MEMORIAL.

A SERMON PREACHED IN THE OCTAGON CHAPEL, NORWICH, ON SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 21.

BY THE REV. V. D. DAVIS, B.A.

"The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms."—DEUT. xxxiii. 27.

THOSE are words of faith which come to us from the olden time, but declare truth that is ever new for each generation. They bear witness to the abiding faith out of which has grown for us life that is strong and true, ruled by the hidden law of righteousness, with a growing hold upon the unseen things which are eternal. We have a great inheritance of faith, seeing what the life of our fathers has been, strong in the unfailing strength of righteousness, the strength of the Eternal; and with righteousness made perfect in love, resting in the peace of God, given to the children of men out of the heart of the Eternal Goodness.

For this we have the witness of the prophets of old, the victory of faith in those who answered to the appeal to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with their God. And with them the supreme witness of the grace and truth of Jesus Christ. The words of life he spoke search the heart, and demand inward purity, sincerity of purpose, steadfastness even unto death to seek first the rule of God and righteousness in daily life, that so we may be strong in his strength. And at the same time we are bidden to follow in the way of simplicity and perfect trust, the humble and childlike heart, in pure unselfishness and lovingkindness. It is not only the words of life we have, but the kindling presence of the Friend and Teacher, his personal appeal, whose hand was laid in blessing on the children, in compassionate healing on sufferers from the misery of mind and heart even more than of the body, and in pure sympathy upon repentant sinners, to encourage and uplift, Friend of the lonely and sorrowful, the poor and oppressed, stern only with deceit, hypocrisy, and hardness of heart, the Good Physician and Captain of a true salvation, the great Chief of faithful souls.

He in his own person was faithful unto death, with a great love and uttermost surrender to the Father's will, holding at all cost to truth and right, that the better life of the Kingdom of God for all mankind might be vindicated, and not marred by any faithlessness of his, and the way opened for the humble and the faithful to enter in. He died, knowing only that he must be true, and that God was yet over all, and it was into the Father's hands that he surrendered his spirit. But out of that bitterness of the Cross and the shadow of death arose as never before in the hearts of men the glorious victory of faith. To those who had been nearest to the Master came the deep and passionate assurance of undying love, of truth and right as still the strength and security of human life, in spite of all that evil hearts and cruel hands might do. In the silence, out of the depths into which they had been plunged, came to them the conviction—the Spirit bearing witness with their spirit—that the Master was not dead, but victorious over death. And through them the message came to all mankind, for in that supreme experience, having been with Jesus, having seen what he suffered and what he was, they found that they also had hold upon the true life, and were to follow him and be his witnesses to the world. So it came that men believed, through the power of the love and truth of Jesus, in their great inheritance as children of God, and the new way of life was opened into which all might enter and learn the great joy of obedience and trust in the perfect will of God. Prophets of Israel first spoke the word, and in the life and death of Jesus, and his victory over death, simply by being what he was, by the grace of God, for his brethren's sake, the truth was manifest—"The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms."

And they who followed him, in every generation, put that truth to the test, and found that it was so. It is a deep conviction of life, upheld by the strength of the Eternal, with hidden sources of confidence and joy, of endurance and trust amid adversity and in conflict with evil, upheld and blest, through all the vicissitudes of mortal change, even to the final peace—rich in gifts of abiding love, as the Father gives them to His children, and so enriching not these passing years alone, but blending with the unseen and eternal in the greater fellowship of heaven.

Shall I say this to you to-day in the words of that beloved teacher whose name we hold in reverent and thankful remembrance, to whom an abiding memorial attached to this House of Prayer is now to be raised?

This is the birthday of James Martineau. A hundred and two years ago this day his mother, in the home in Magdalen-street, rejoiced in the gift of the new life, knowing indeed the Divine benediction, yet not knowing how precious it was to be to the world. Here the child grew up. To this House of Prayer the boy came with his parents, and experienced "some of his first awakenings of conscience and of spiritual faith." Here he grew to manhood, and in the fellowship of this congregation, when he had determined to consecrate his life to the ministry, and came home for the vacations of his college years, he had a part in the founding of the school which is now to have a new home in the building raised as a memorial to him.

He went forth and became a great teacher and inspirer of men. To him it was given to declare the living word of truth, the prophet's word of righteousness, the seer's vision of heavenly things. But while his life was lived and his work was done elsewhere, this venerable house had always a place in his affections. When it had stood for a hundred years, he came for its centenary celebration, and preached that sermon on "One Gospel in Many Dialects," with its beautiful vision of Christian unity amid all differences of interpretation, loyal to the one Master who revealed in his own spirit the true blending of moral perfectness, divine communion, and free self-sacrifice. Thus the Octagon witnessed the splendid ardour of his prime, and afterwards received from him messages of benediction in his old age.

It is rich, this old chapel, in beautiful and sacred memories, but none more beautiful and sacred than those which link the thought of James Martineau with its communion of work and worship. And we rejoice that yesterday his daughter laid the foundation stone of the Memorial building which shall bear witness to coming generations that this was his native place, and here is a living home of the religious spirit of faith and self-forgetting service which was so nobly manifest in him.

"The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms."

We think of him to-day whose teaching gave to those great words of faith such profound and living meaning, whose life touches us now with deep and thankful emotion, knowing that it was the gift of God to us, in its splendid powers, its great achievements, its beautiful spirit, mellowed to such wonderful grace and tenderness in extreme old age, humble always, with a deep humility, trusting, resting in the Eternal. For him, indeed, at evening-time it was light, and as he passed within the veil of light, we seemed to hear from the witness of many generations of those who had faithfully lived and peacefully died, the word of confident assurance that all is well, for underneath are the everlasting arms.

Let me recall to you on this day of thankful remembrance his own words, in which he spoke, as only he could speak, of our "Rest in the Lord":—

"In him alone, but in him for ever, there is Rest. In evil days, when just men strive in vain to beat back the hosts of wrong, and mad tyrannies gall the heart with shouts of triumph, the Sentinel of every world is on his sleepless watch, and knows how to protect it from surprise. He is the continuous thread of all our years, and his love throws in each pattern of beauty woven into their texture; and when the images of the past, the distant fields, the dear abode, the gracious forms, the vivid hopes, the earnest heroisms, of our young days gleam with a fairer light through the sorrows and failures of maturity, it is his breathing spirit that dissipates the cloud of time, and sends his reviving sunshine through. Only let us be at one with him, and our life gathers down upon it the strength of his infinite serenity. The simple thought that 'God is here'—that the august Ordainer of our trust and supporter of our faithfulness is present in the very hiding-places of the soul—contains within it the most powerful agencies of religion. Warning, sympathy, and rest are treasured in it to inexhaustible amount. Amid the fatigues of life's incessant struggle, under the sense that we can never sleep or all things will go wrong, refreshment is instantly gained when we ascend to the fountain of all affection, and touch the parching lips with the draft of life. In temptations to unfaithfulness witnessed by no human eye, let us but say, 'Ah! Lord, but thou art here,' and the failing purpose springs to its feet again. And under the encroachments of fretfulness or despondency from the frequent perverseness of men, what can so soon check the hasty thought, soothe the unquiet passion, and put a music of patience into the soul, as the look of that pure and loving eye from its depth of infinite calm? In the trembling of age and the stealthy approaches of the last sleep, the dear presence of an Almighty Guardian, to whom age is as childhood, and who unites the future with the past, fills the deepening shadows with a mild and holy light. Let him only be near, and the obscuring veil of mortal ill that sometimes seems to shut us in, and tempts us to believe in nothing but the sad rain, is soon withdrawn, like the cloud lifting itself from out the glen; and the sunshine first glorifies, then dissipates, the haze, leaving the mountain-range of immovable goodness and beauty clear against the everlasting sky. So pass the storms away, so deepens the heavenly view, to the soul that will but 'rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for him.' "

It is wonderful to us now to repeat those words, to recall the living tones in which they first were uttered, and the life of strenuous labours, of undaunted faith and deep affections, out of which they came. And it is with great thankfulness that we remember how rich is the treasure of such words that he has left to us, for the strengthening of our faith, for the moulding of a true spirit of devotion, for instruction, and a searching moral discipline, for our inspiration and delight.

You, my friends, who now have the happiness of being at home here in the Octagon, have a very special part in this inheritance. To you such words as these must speak with an added force of direct personal appeal, because you are now the living representatives of that Christian congregation in which Dr. Martineau first saw his ideal of an open religious fellowship, in the freedom of the spirit, pledged only to truth and reverent worship and endeavours after the Christian life. You now hold in your hands the great trust to maintain in this House of Prayer that living witness of the spirit, both in the communion and the joy of worship and the steadfast purpose of unselfish work. You are called, and it is a very happy calling, and a sacred trust, to justify the confidence he expressed in "the Christian congregation as the most beneficent of human institutions—the best guardian of the sanctities of life and the asylum of its sweetest affections"—a fellowship in which there shall be found "the conscience, the humanity, the purity, the nobleness, which are the cement of society and the backbone of national character."

And he went on, in that letter to the first National Conference of our Churches from which I am quoting, to speak of the three conditions to be maintained in such a living congregation: "Sympathies of godliness within the congregation; aggression on sin and misery without; and loyal affection for comrades under other banners." As to the second, he added: "No Christian society can subsist upon its own internal relations alone, and like a monastery shut out the confusion and the cries of the world around. We acknowledge with all Christendom that the missionary spirit is inseparable from the religious life, and that it is impossible for a people to train themselves in the school of Christ, yet remain quiet neighbours to the victims of passion, ignorance, and wrong. Where there is no sorrow felt for those to whom God is dead and the heavens are dark, no pity for those whose life is a flight from pursuing fate into the grim arms of 'the last enemy,' no longing to seek and to save the lost, how can there be either love of God or 'enthusiasm of humanity'? No Christian society gives any adequate expression to its essential character, unless from its heart goes forth some message of healing and entreaty to its neighbourhood. . . . Every visible place of worship needs a character, a significance, a spiritual physiognomy upon the spot. It should be more than brick and stone to the eyes that daily see it. Even from outside, let it look upon the passers-by with a gaze of tender mercy and solemn warning and recovered hope."

You are now adding to the manifest significance of this venerable House of Prayer new buildings, which will speak more fully of your faith and ready sympathies. They are to be his memorial, and you must make them speak in the quickening and persuasive tones of his voice. It will be for the strengthening of your work, the binding more closely of the ties of brotherly fellowship and Christian helpfulness. It is not a name only, but a spirit that is to be commemorated here—a spirit of life, strong with a divine strength in simple loyalty to duty, steadfast and earnest, humble, gracious, loving, in the fellowship of Christ's disciples, in the great human brotherhood, in the hidden communion of earth and heaven.

He whose name your new buildings are to bear has been to us a quickener of faith, deepening the significance of life, making it more beautiful, with a new radiance from the divine meaning in daily faithfulness and common things, with the joy and strength given to the humble, loving, and surrendered spirit. We remember him, and it is from the hidden glory and the purer depths of the Divine Communion that he now speaks to us: "The Eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms."

LITERARY NOTES AND NEWS.

An announcement appeared lately in the Athenæum to the effect that the 225th anniversary of the arrival of William Penn in America, his Frame of Government for Pennsylvania, and his treaty with the aborigines is to be commemorated by the foundation in Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pennsylvania, of a new department of study, which is to bear the interesting and appropriate title "Peace and Public Service." Last Thursday, April 25, the date of the Frame of Government of 1682, was to be kept as a William Penn memorial day. Dr. Moncure Conway, an alumnus of Dickinson College in 1849, was announced to deliver an address. We commend the suggestion to all colleges where military duties and strategy are subjects of study that they should give a place of equal honour to a department of "Peace and Public Service."

The death of Canon MacColl has removed a strenuous and interesting figure from the world of public affairs. His books are not likely to live. Even the longest of them were pamphlets written with incisive vigour for a purpose. He was equally at home in the intricacies of the ritual controversy, and in his passionate advocacy of the cause of all oppressed Christians living under Turkish rule. In his friendship with Gladstone, he thus touched both the ecclesiastical and the democratic sides of the great statesmen's character. In this remarkable combination of the devout ecclesiastic with the man of affairs, he represented a clerical type which has flourished more freely on French than on English soil.

Like Canon MacColl, Lord Acton illustrated the piquant combination of loyalty to Catholic dogma with devotion to popular liberties. The magnificent library which he collected, and which is now, through the generosity of Mr. John Morley, the property of the University of Cambridge, was intended chiefly to illustrate the History of Liberty, which he never wrote. The loss to historical learning, and perhaps equally to contemporary political thought, is one which cannot be made good. No one can use these tools precisely as the master-hand who collected them intended. But we may hope to glean some fragments of Lord Acton's thought in a volume of "Lectures and Essays on Liberty," which Messrs. Macmillan announce for immediate publication.

Mr. Frederic Harrison will give his spiritual autobiography to the world shortly. The book is to be called "The Creed of the Layman: Apologia pro Fide Mea." He tells in its pages the story of his own pilgrimage through various phases of faith to the rest of settled conviction, in the hope that it may be useful to some other seekers in these days of religious unrest.

There are few writers who are more worthy of serious attention just now than the Rev. George Tyrrell. He has the brilliance of Loisy, with an added spiritual depth. His "Much-abused Letter" is a wonderful piece of writing, as delicate in sympathy as it is beautiful in style. Messrs. Longmans have just added "Oil and Wine" to the uniform edition of his books. It was published formerly by Mr. Mayle of Hampstead, and in its new form is sure of a much wider circulation.

The book is a collection of short essays or meditations on religious themes. Whether they were ever spoken does not appear; but they have the candour and the penetrating insight of the practised teacher, who knows how to deal tenderly and strongly with religious difficulties and cases of conscience. In a new preface, Mr. Tyrrell states that from first to last he has written not from on high as a teacher, but as an inquirer on the same platform as his readers. The title of the volume he explains as follows: "It alludes not to the oil of consolation and the wine of spiritual stimulus, but to the unauthorised, irregular character of these ministrations of the Word."

Among recent cheap re-issues we are specially glad to welcome Cardinal Newman's Apologia, "The Story of my Heart," by Richard Jefferies, and "Select Epigrams from the Greek Anthology" (text only), edited by J. W. Mackail, the last a feast of good things for the classical scholar. All these dainty volumes are included in Longmans' excellent Pocket Library.

An important addition to exegetical literature has been made in the volume on St. Matthew by the Rev. W. C. Allen, in the "International Critical Commentary." Mr. Allen's name will be familiar to many readers as one of the essayists in Contentio Veritatis. Of much slighter texture, but with their own importance for the mood of the moment, are "The Immanence of Christ in Modern Life," by Frederick R. Swan, with an introduction by "J. B." of the Christian World, and "The Unchanging Faith," by Dr. J. Guinness Rogers. The former is bright with hope and eager welcome for the new thought; the latter is the swansong of a veteran, for whom the old is better. No two books could afford a better illustration of the two opposing tendencies, though neither of them is in any case the hasty product of the controversy of the hour.

W. H. D.

A GOSPEL COMMENTARY.*

If all the other volumes of the International Critical Commentary, are as good as this one on Matthew's Gospel, then the whole Commentary is valuable indeed. The writer explains, in an excellent preface, his conception of the task before him, and the means by which he proposes to perform it. The reader, who studies that preface, gains from it the assurance that the writer knows exactly what he sets out to do, and why he limits himself to a certain object, excluding others that might seem to call for attention. And the commentary itself confirms the impression made by the preface, because it shows everywhere the firm touch of one who knows his own mind, and writes down just what he sees to be necessary and no more. He does not make his commentary a receptacle into which to empty his note books, nor offer to the reader a mere catalogue of interpretations. He has recognised clearly that no commentary could exhaust the subject, and has therefore marked out one department of it for full and thorough treatment. The result is a book of great value, worthy of a scholar, a real contribution to the knowledge of its subject.

The purpose which the writer has kept in view is clearly defined by him in the preface. It is, to set before the reader the meaning which the text of the Gospel had for the man who wrote it. Why did he write what we find in his pages, and not something else? What was his conception of the facts he narrates or his statements he records? How did he come to write them? Did he take them from some older authority, or did he set them down as from himself? The commentary is a detailed answer to those questions; and it is hard to see in what way the treatment could be made more full and adequate than it is. Mr. Allen points out in the preface the successive stages in the process of arriving at the full meaning of one of the Gospels, for instance that of Matthew. There is first the work of determining the Greek text, the exact form of words originally written by the Evangelist. Next comes the work of the literary critic, who investigates the relation of this Gospel to other Gospels, and to any source or sources which may have been embedded in it. The result of this process is to show what the Evangelist wrote, and what his sources of information were. Then comes the commentator, who explains, from the standpoint of the Evangelist, what his Gospel contains, especially what was the conception of the person of Christ, which guided him in his work. The commentator has completed his portion of the whole process when he can say 'Here is the book written by the man commonly called Matthew, this is what he wrote, and this is what he meant by it.' Then comes the historian, who takes the Gospel as one only of his witnesses, and inquires whether the statements therein contained are historically true, whether the events happened, whether the alleged sayings of Jesus were actually spoken by him, and, if so, what he meant by them? Mr. Allen recognises that this theoretical division of labour cannot be fully maintained in practice, because the work of the textual critic is not yet finished, much less that of the literary critic. He has, therefore, not been able to exclude their special problems entirely from his pages; but he has reduced to as small an amount as he could the textual critical element in his commentary, and only in regard to literary criticism has felt obliged to allow it to take a much larger space than ought strictly to be given to it in a commentary. That is his apology for the masterly analysis of the relation of "Matthew" to "Mark" which is given in the introduction. At the other end of the process of interpretation stands the historian, and Mr. Allen hardly invades his province at all. "Here and there" (he says, pref. p. viii.) "I may have been tempted to express some view as to the historical character of some incident or saying, as apart from the general credibility of the source of which it forms a part; but, generally speaking, it has been my aim to consider the contents of the Gospel always in the first place from the standpoint of their meaning for the editor of the Gospel, and only secondarily from the point of view of their relation to the historical Christ. . . . No attempt has been made to discuss the question, whether the teaching here put into the mouth of Christ was as a matter of fact taught by him." The reason is that such a question can only be answered by the historian who is dealing with all the sources which are available for the reconstruction of the life of Jesus, and not by a commentator who is dealing with only one Gospel. If, then, the reader who takes up Mr. Allen's book does not find in it what he wants, or all that he wants, he cannot blame the author who has been at the trouble to indicate clearly what will and what will not be found there. Mr. Allen says (pref. p. xi.), "In writing the following pages, I have always had chiefly in view the needs, not of the preacher nor of the general reading public, but of the student who desires to have some understanding of the growth and development of the Gospel literature in the first century A.D., and of the meaning which this particular Gospel had for the Evangelist and his first readers. . . . and I have purposely avoided filling these pages with what seemed to me to be, needless iteration of information which is accessible to every student." I have thought it well to spend so much time on the preface, because it is, in a greater degree than is true of many prefaces, the indispensable key to the whole book, and is in itself an admirable exposition of the principles on which a commentary should be written. Turning now to the book itself, we find an introduction of some seventy pages, in which are discussed at length the questions of the sources of the Gospel, its plan and characteristics, its theology, its author, its date, its style and language, and its text. It is impossible to summarise the contents of these closely packed pages, or do other than admire the way in which the author says exactly what he wants to say, without hesitating or wasting words. It is not that he is a mere dogmatist, laying down his own opinion and disregarding those who differ from him; he pays careful attention to the views of other scholars, and shows that he is acquainted with the most recent literature of his subject; as may be seen from his list of authorities, (p. lxxxix fol.). A full series of indexes adds greatly to the usefulness of the book, and deserves the gratitude of the student. Where such a vast number is given of references to particular passages in a variety of books, it is only to be expected that some will be wrong. So far as I have checked them, however, I have found no mistakes; and anyone who has torn his hair over a wrong reference which he must hunt up and put right, will know what that means. The commentary itself (pp. 1—308) goes through the book, verse by verse, in order. The English translation of the Greek text is the author's own, made not with a view to elegance, but for the purpose of reproducing as exactly as possible the shades of meaning of the Greek. The reader must turn to the Commentary for himself to judge of the way in which the writer has fulfilled his task, how he explains this or that passage. It is clearly out of the question to indicate in a sentence or two the contents of such a minutely detailed exposition. I have not been able to make out why some of the parables are left almost without comment. On xxiii. 35 the Zachariah of the Gospel is identified with the Zachariah of 2 Chron. The treatment of this question is hardly sufficient, since no reference is made to the Zachariah who was killed in the Temple during the siege by Titus. It is to him that the Talmud refers in the passages cited in the commentary; and the presumption is strong that the reference in the Gospel is also to him. A Talmudic passage, on p. 46, is called "a distorted reminiscence" of Matt. v. 17. So if it is; but not so distorted as the translation represents it. As it stands, it is almost unintelligible. It would, no doubt, be possible to pick out other small inaccuracies, which are indeed almost unavoidable in such a work. But I prefer to commend the book as a whole, for a thoroughly sound and good piece of work, and one worthy of a high place in English scholarship.

CHURCH HISTORY LECTURES.*

DR. PLUMMER is favourably known as the author of two previous volumes on periods of English Church History from 1509 to 1575, and from 1575 to 1649. The present volume contains four lectures continuing the story through the times of Cromwell, the Restoration, and the Revolution, and will find a ready welcome among those who appreciated his earlier work. He has read widely, and gives us the results of his reading with an attractive freshness and pleasant echoes of classic authors. He now deals with a period of special interest to Nonconformists, and they will be all the better for understanding how the facts appear when looked at from the point of view of a sound English Churchman. It is well to realise how intolerant and cruel was the Puritanism of the Commonwealth, how inconsistent was the practice of Cromwell with his professions of liberality, how grievous were the hardships from which the Church of England suffered when, for a short time, a rival Church was installed in power. But the reader must bear in mind that though he has here a printed book, it does not profess to contain more than lectures, and the value of good lectures to the student is to guide his subsequent reading and not to be a substitute for the study of the real works on which judgment should be formed. Authorities are freely quoted here, but there is no mention of a book that deserves a place in the library of every student of English religious history, viz., J. J. Tayler's Retrospect with Martineau's Introduction. That is a book ripe with wisdom, while Dr. Plummer, as best, showeth forth knowledge. A fairer comparison, perhaps, is with Brooke Herford's Story of Religion in England, and merely in the matter of impartiality and guidance in forming a sound judgment, the advantage is clearly with Dr. Herford. For instance, Dr. Plummer says not a word of appreciation for the conscientious fidelity shown by the 2,000 ejected clergy in 1662, and no one would gather from his pages what a loss the English Church inflicted on itself by its action. He is content with the view of the modern Anglican that these clergy were for the most part unqualified for their posts. In fact, he regards all the sufferings of Nonconformists under the latter Stuarts as justifiable, or, at any rate, inevitable, retaliation for the previous persecution of the Church. Such a view ignores two facts: (1) the earlier persecution of the Puritans before they rose to power, and (2) the intermingling of religion and politics in actual civil war. He does, indeed, acknowledge the part taken by the Presbyterians in bringing about the Restoration, which ought to have introduced a new era of toleration and comprehension. By that time there were many who had shaken off the old idea that there could only be one true Church, which it was the duty of every good man to uphold by every possible means, and if Charles II. had been true to the declaration he made at Breda, England might have been saved the loss of a century of national life. One final caution. Notwithstanding the title, the reader will find very little about the history of the Church in Dr. Plummer's lectures. They are almost entirely occupied with the political history of the period treated. We are told why it was impolitic as well as the crime of murder to cut off the head of Charles I., and much more of a like nature, but of what good Churchmen were doing during these 53 years for religion we hear hardly a word. Surely, available information is not so scanty as we are here led to suppose! At any rate, we should be sorry to believe that an adequate history of the English Church is given us in these pages. But they are full of bright and suggestive thought, and well repay perusal.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY

FOURTEENTH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

NOTWITHSTANDING a series of misfortunes which, at one time, threatened to mar the success of the Society's annual musical festival, that held at Essex Hall last Saturday was as enjoyable as any of its predecessors. Mainly owing to the somewhat severe character of the test piece which had been set, only seven choirs had entered for the competition, as compared with eleven in 1906; and of these Limehouse was compelled to withdraw within the last fortnight owing to the removal from the school of several members of the choir; while owing to the death of the Rev. F. W. Stanley during the previous week the Brixton Choir were also unable to compete. The same cause necessitated the absence of Mr. John Harrison, who was to have conducted the United choirs at the evening festival, and an entirely new programme had to be substituted at the last moment. Notwithstanding these misfortunes, however, there can be no question as to the success of the festival.

The five competing choirs were:—

Stratford; conductor, Mr. Harry Maguire.

Newington Green; conductor, Miss Maud North.

Highgate; conductor, Miss Amy Withall

Stepney; conductor, Miss E. Harris.

George's Row; conductor, Miss Amy Withall.

The choirs sang in the above order, which had been determined by lot. Each sang, without accompaniment, the test piece "Blossoming time," by Francesco Berger; and then a piece of their own selection. Mr. Ion Pritchard, the president of the Society, presided; and Mr. L. C. Venables acted as adjudicator.

After the competition the children were provided with tea, to which also a certain number of the visitors stayed, and at six o'clock all assembled again for the evening concert, in the course of which the adjudicators' award was to be made known.

After the opening hymn, "Come, sing with holy gladness," in which all joined, the President briefly welcomed the children and visitors, and referred to the sad cause which had necessitated the absence that day of the Brixton Choir, and their good friend Mr. Harrison. At his suggestion a message was sent by the other choirs to the Brixton choir to sympathise with them in their sorrow. Mr. Venables then gave his award. He opened his remarks by apologising for the severity of the test piece, which had been set by him under the misapprehension that an accompaniment was allowed, and which, without an accompaniment was a very hard test indeed. He regretted if this had deterred any choirs from entering; but, at any rate, those which had taken part deserved all credit for their pluck, and in a very real sense were to be regarded as a "survival of the fittest." He warmly praised all the choirs for their excellent singing, the difficult test piece having been well rendered by all. He stated that the competition had been an unusually close one, and that he had been very pleased with all. He went through the performances of each choir in detail, praising their good points and criticising in a very friendly spirit where he saw points which needed correction. He stated that he had had very great difficulty in deciding between the two first choirs. Newington Green had earned the greatest number of marks in the test piece and Stratford in the "Selected piece." Adding the two together he found that Stratford had one more mark than Newington Green, 50 as against 49, out of a possible of 60. Therefore, he awarded first place to Stratford and second to Newington Green, with Stepney a close third. A most interesting and helpful award was the unanimous verdict. In presenting the certificates to the conductors of the two winning choirs, Mr. Maguire and Miss Maud North, Mr. Pritchard congratulated the Stratford choir on winning the banner for the first time, and said that he was very glad to think of the way it had gone the round of the schools, no less than eight of whom had now had it.

An enjoyable programme of music followed. Mrs. Pearce, Mr. E. J. Grutchfield, and Mr. W. Savage Cooper, sang; and Mr. Ivor James played a couple of 'cello solos. The United Choirs, conducted by the Rev. John Toye, who had kindly taken Mr. Harrison's place at the last moment, sang three part songs very well indeed; one of which, the "Sabbath Bell," was exceedingly pretty. And the Stratford Choir sang their selected piece, "O wert thou in the cauld blast." At the close the banner was presented to the victorious choir in the person of its smallest member; and the festival concluded with the hymn, "God that madest earth and heaven," followed by the benediction pronounced by the Rev. John Toye.

FAREWELL AT NEWCASTLE.

A MEETING of the congregation of the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle-on-Tyne, was held on Wednesday evening, April 17, to make a farewell presentation to the Rev. Frank Walters, as the close of a ministry among them of twenty-two years.

Sir JOSEPH BAXTER ELLIS presided, and spoke highly of the services Mr. Walters had rendered to them. He was known far beyond that church as a man of rare literary culture, and he had done a great and noble work.

A letter from the Right Hon. Sir Thomas Burt, M.P., which was read at the meeting, expressed regret that Mr. Walters was leaving Newcastle. It offered a warm personal tribute to Mr. Walters, and said the loss was a public one.

* "English Church History from the Death of Charles I. to the Death of William III." Four Lectures by Rev. Alfred Plummer, M.A., D.D. (T. & T. Clark. 3s. net.)

Mr. Geo. G. Laidler then presented to Mr. Walters, on behalf of the congregation, a cheque for £130. Mr. Walters, he said, came to them from Glasgow only after a good deal of pressing, and he made the change without bettering in any way his financial position. He had been their faithful and dear minister. He had rendered great service both inside and outside the church. He had made a name as a teacher of the pure and simple gospel of Jesus Christ, whilst he was equally well known outside the church not only as a great Shakespearian scholar, but as a student of literature, and especially as an exponent and interpreter of poetic literature. They fervently prayed for his future welfare, and hoped he would find congenial employment.

The Rev. FRANK WALTERS, who spoke with much emotion, said that he made no allusion to his resignation last Sunday partly because he could not trust himself to do so, and also because the committee of the church understood the reasons of this separation so much better than he did himself that all explanations might be left to them. He said that in the very kindest spirit, because he was sure that any explanations they could give as to this separation would be given in the tenderest and kindest manner in relation to the former minister of the church. During the last four months, since his resignation, he had had proofs of the unswerving loyalty and devotion of the congregation both to his person and his ministry, both by word of mouth and also by the most tender messages, but it was his chief duty that evening to thank them for their generous parting gift. In that season of his deepest depression and profound anxiety it brought relief to his mind because it assured him that his convictions of the affection of his people had not been altogether without foundation. Yet it would be sheer affectation to deny that such a gift as this was welcome to a poor man with a family dependent upon him and whose only capital consisted in his brains and his books. Many people came to this great city to make their fortune, and when they had made it, left to enjoy their independence elsewhere. He came to Newcastle twenty-two years ago not to earn his fortune. He came to discharge deeds of service that were asked of him, and after twenty-two years he went away as poor as he came—and in the evening of his days—to begin his life all over again. He bade farewell to many dear friends, not knowing what his future destiny was to be. Well, they had had him so many years. They had had him body and soul. Nerves and heart and brain had been consecrated upon the altar of that church. There was not a department of church life with which he had not kept in the most vital touch. He had attended sewing meetings with the same regularity with which he had attended the Sunday services. He had trained the children, the children they had sent to him, in the principles of religion, and he had tried to quicken their interest in all that was pure and good in literature. He had been with them in their seasons of domestic grief, and performed the last rites over the blessed dead. He had linked the hands at that altar of man and maid in the marriage bond, and pronounced a benediction 'on the new-born babe. He thanked God for all the opportunities of sacred service He had given him in connection with that church. Twice he had sought relief from his incessant toil, but they had almost forced him back to the pulpit, and if he had stayed too long the responsibility was theirs. But at last the hour had come, and he was deeply grateful for their generous gift, not merely for its monetary value, but as a parting memorial of sacred hours.

OBITUARY.

MISS HANNAH BROOKS.

THE death of Miss Hannah Brooks, of Stalybridge, on Wednesday, April 10, brought to a close a life of strenuous and faithful service. For nearly forty years she was head mistress of Hob Hill School. Equipped for her work of teaching with exceptional intellectual ability, she also brought to it a keen desire to excel, and a devotion to her task that almost amounted to a passion. By this combination of qualities she succeeded in raising her school to the highest place in local regard, while her influence in the district during the last forty years has been immeasurable. Miss Brooks remained at her post almost to the end, and died at Colwyn Bay, where she had gone to recruit her health. Amidst many signs of respect and regret the body was interred at the old chapel, Dukinfield, on Monday, April 15, the Rev. W. G. Price officiating. On the following Sunday evening a memorial service took place at the Canal-street Church, Stalybridge, when a large number of friends and fellow teachers of the deceased assembled in her memory. The sermon was based on Eccles. ix. 10, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE FLOWERS.

WHEN, during the cold winter months, we ask sometimes :

"O wind,
If winter comes, can spring be far behind?"
how many pleasant things seem to rise up before us of what shall be when the lengthening and warm spring days have come—the daffodil and primrose time. And after these the hot summer days, sunshine all day long, when there is a wealth of flowers in our garden borders and in the woods and lanes throughout this pleasant English land.

What would spring and summer be without the flowers, do you think? Our friends they seem, giving us so much pleasure by their beauty, their grace, their colour, and their fragrance. They look on us surely, in a kindly gracious way, as though they would say, "To give you pleasure we are here."

"God might have made the earth bring forth

Enough for great and small;
The oak tree and the cedar tree,
Without a flower at all.

"Our outward life requires them not;
Then wherefore had they birth?
To minister delight to man,
To beautify the earth.

"To comfort man, to whisper hope
Whene'er his faith is dim;
For He who careth for the flowers
Will much more care for him."

On our country walks, or wandering about in our gardens, how much of beauty, of graciousness, and of fragrance, do the flowers give away to us! The bluebells spreading their sweet-scented bells round and about the stems of the trees in the wood, the yellow primrose banks, the golden daffodil fields of spring, the roses of summer—what rich gifts they scatter on passers-by, so quietly, so graciously, that we feel it is good to stay with them for awhile, to be, as it were, under their sweet influence!

At all times the flowers are our welcome guests. At merry happy seasons we like to have them with us, and we decorate our rooms with them; we take them to those who are suffering and sorrowful because we know they are able to comfort and cheer; and we lay their sweet blossoms upon our dead.

Flowers and their scent are closely associated with our memories; they recall to us wonderfully past times and places, sometimes sad memories, but more often glad ones.

The thought of the glory and beauty of the flowers makes richer our book of remembrance. So Wordsworth wrote of the daffodils:—

"I wandered lonely as a cloud
That floats on high o'er vales and hills,
When, all at once, I saw a crowd,
A host of golden daffodils,
Beside the lake, beneath the trees,
Fluttering and dancing in the breeze.

"They stretched in never-ending line
Along the margin of the bay;
Ten thousand saw I at a glance,
Tossing their heads in sprightly dance.

"I gazed, and gazed, but little thought
What wealth the show to me had brought;
For oft when on my couch I lie,
In vacant or in pensive mood,
They flash upon the inward eye,
Which is the bliss of solitude.
And then my heart with pleasure fills,
And dances with the daffodils!"

If one of the smallest of flowers, from its mossy nook, and almost hidden in the midst of its own green leaves, can fill the air around it with fragrance so that each passer-by is refreshed by it, and feels glad to know that he is not far from the violet's home, may not we, grown-up people, and boys and girls, make the small plot of this earth that is round about us beautiful and fragrant by kind and gracious words and ways, so that all who pass by may feel it is good to be near us?

Possibly, through a lifetime we may be called upon for no act of heroism, but kind and courteous words and ways are always required from us towards those who come our way, high or low, rich or poor, good or evil. If you try to remember this, you boys and girls throughout our land, like the flowers you will make the earth more beautiful and sweeter to dwell upon.

WELL AND TRULY LAID.

THE stone-laying of the MARTINEAU Memorial at Norwich was happily accomplished last Saturday afternoon, and the proceedings were very well reported in the Eastern Daily Press on Monday morning. Of that report we have been glad to avail ourselves largely in the following account. The attendance of friends from a distance was not considerable, though many messages of greeting and sympathy were received. There will doubtless be a much larger gathering when the buildings are opened, which will be, it is confidently expected, before the end of the year.

"The pride which Norwich people take in the great thinker and philosopher to whose memory the congregation of the Octagon Chapel are raising their memorial, is not a pride of partisanship in disputed matters of theological controversy. The feature of the gathering on Saturday was the catholicity of its representation of all schools of religious thought. It was not association with JAMES MARTINEAU's point of view that brought such a gathering together; but the desire to do honour to a great man whose work lay in the highest region of human thought. Underlying all the religious differences of men there is the unity of the Church Universal, a unity in which all those who seek to make human life bear witness to the Highest are linked, however diverse may be the forms in which their seeking manifests itself. It is to that universal Church that MARTINEAU, like most of the greatest men in religious thought, belongs. He was concerned, not with points of denominational differences, but with the great affirmations of the spiritual life of our race; and men of all creeds can learn of him. It is a fitting thing that Norwich should have this permanent memorial of one of her most distinguished sons. 'As to what I have done in a long career,' he once said, 'it has been the simplest thing in the world, simply to say precisely and always that which I thought and believed and felt to be true; to hold back nothing, to profess nothing, to measure nothing by a standard other than was perfectly and absolutely sincere.' To get that thought into the lives of men would be MARTINEAU's best memorial."

It was a very happy circumstance in the commemoration that such warm tributes from representatives of other churches were received. The letters from Dr. JESSOP and Archdeacon PELHAM, which will be found in the report, and the presence and speech of Dr. BARRETT, the senior Nonconformist minister of Norwich, who has just completed forty years of service in the chief Congregational church in the city, are proof, at any rate, that Norwich was aware of the significance of the occasion; and what Mr. Councillor COPEMAN said was a tribute only due to the spirit in which the congregation are devoted to the schools and other social work, which will now soon have a fitting home in the Memorial buildings.

The beautiful old Octagon Chapel, with its noble tradition of religious freedom, and its memories of generations of devout and honourable life and good citizenship—memories of Dr. JOHN TAYLOR, of ENFIELD, of MADGE, and the MARTINEAUS, the MOTTRAMS, the BOLINGBROKES, WITHERS DOWSON, and many others—makes a great appeal to the living congregation of each new generation. Its very aspect in the quiet hour of worship speaks of the pure spirit of prayer and aspiration, and invites the home-feeling in the simplicity of brotherly communion. And now in the new buildings there is to be added on the spot the visible acknowledgment of a resolute purpose to gather in the young, to share the good gifts of the higher life, to make a place of happy meeting for the friendless and solitary, to strengthen bonds of social union, to train mind and heart for social effort, and send forth willing helpers to take their part in various kinds of beneficent work in the city. All this is implied already in the ideal of the living church in its old home in the House of Prayer. But now the borders are to be enlarged, and the fuller opportunity offered for friendship and the many ministrations of sympathy, encouragement, and brotherly kindness in daily life. This is a work to which, as we suggested last week, Dr. MARTINEAU would have given the warmest encouragement and in which he would have taken great delight, as an earnest attempt at the fulfilment of his own ideal of a complete congregational life. The buildings which are to be the home of such endeavours will stand worthily as a memorial bearing his honoured name.

We had hoped that the stone would be laid free from debt, but that was not so. One cannot be sure of the whole cost until the building is finished; but friends who may still be glad to have a part in this memorial should know that some £300 may certainly be given—and surely will be given before the opening day.

THE MARTINEAU MEMORIAL.

STONE-LAYING AT NORWICH.

SATURDAY last was a fortunate day for Norwich, for the morning came with pleasant sunny weather, and in the afternoon the foundation-stone of the Martineau Memorial buildings at the Octagon Chapel, in Colegate-street, was happily laid by Miss Gertrude Martineau. It mattered less that on Sunday, which was the anniversary of Dr. Martineau's birth, a hundred and two years ago, when special services of commemoration and thanksgiving were held in the Octagon Chapel, it rained quietly nearly all day.

The buildings, of which Mr. Howard Chatfield Clarke is the architect, are to be for congregational and school use, and will be opened, it is hoped, in November. Their general plan was described in last week's INQUIRER.

The proceedings on Saturday afternoon began in the chapel, where Mr. G. A. King, chairman of the congregation, presided, and there was a large gathering of members and friends, including Miss Gertrude Martineau, Mrs. Russell Martineau, Mrs. Basil Martineau (Miss Edith Martineau was in Italy, and was unable to be present), Miss Clara Martineau (Birmingham), the Rev. P. M. Higginson, Miss H. E. Higginson, Miss Edith Higginson, Miss Dora Higginson, Mr. Charles Higginson, Mrs. George Webb, Mrs. Shaw Nightingale, Miss E. A. Carter, Mr. I. S. Lister, the Rev. Dr. Barrett, Mr. H. J. Copeman, Dr. Cooper Pattin, the Rev. T. Sinclair Phillips, the Rev. J. J. Brooker, the Rev. Alfred Hall (minister of the Octagon), the Rev. John Birks, and the Rev. V. D. Davis.

The service opened with the hymn written by Mr. King for the occasion—"Lord of all life, above, below"—(and printed in last week's INQUIRER), with the verse,

"Here to an honoured name we raise
A building fair, where prayer and praise
And earnest work of hand and brain
To noblest uses shall attain."

This was followed by Dr. Martineau's prayer, "O God, who art and wast and art to come," and the lesson, from 1 Cor. iii., read by the Rev. P. M. Higginson.

The chairman then called upon Mrs. James Mottram to read some of the letters of apology for absence. She announced a large number, including letters from Archdeacon Crosse, the Revs. W. H. Cooke, W. Busby, C. E. O. Griffiths, A. J. Pearce, and G. P. Clarke, Mr. George White, M.P., Mrs. James Stuart, the Misses Colman, the Right Hon. W. Kenrick (President of Manchester College, Oxford), Mr. Grosvenor Talbot (President of the B. and F.U.A.), Dr. Blake Odgers, K.C. (President of the S.S.A.), and Mr. Ion Pritchard, Principal Gordon (a former minister of the Octagon), the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, Mr. David Martineau, Miss Constance Martineau, Mrs. I. M. Wade, and Miss Norton.

The Principal of Manchester College wrote:—

109, Banbury-road, Oxford, April 19, 1907.

To the congregation of the Octagon Chapel, Norwich, on occasion of the laying of the foundation-stone of the Martineau Memorial Hall and Sunday schools.

Dear Friends,—Accept my sincere congratulations on the successful accomplishment of another stage in your enterprise, as you gather to-morrow round the foundation stone of your new building, and witness that it is well and truly laid. The completion of your purpose will need much courage, patience, and self-denying steadfastness. May the "good hand" of God be upon you, to bear up through the labours that are to come. Dedicated to a revered and beloved memory, the buildings which you now rear will pledge you, not so much to a great name, as to great principles. Your venerable chapel had long been the home of high conceptions of truth and freedom and catholic union in religion before James Martineau was born, and you only emphasise your intention of carrying them forward into generations to come by linking your hall and schools with his word and work. You will never, therefore, let the teaching which will be given here degenerate into a sectarian orthodoxy; you will remember that he taught us to find the witness of God in the spirit within, and this must needs express itself in divers forms, and shape itself anew from age to age. In the instruction of the young, and all the many forms of service to your congregational life, for which this place will be employed, you will make this the abiding foundation of the whole, the spiritual rock on which alone a living Church can stand. Of this principle you are the guardians in your ancient city. Throughout East Anglia many of the lonely and struggling will look to you for help and cheer. From the aid and sympathy which you have gathered may you be able to give strength and encouragement to others. Your beautiful edifice will then be reared for a wider circle than the young of your own homes, or the members of your own local fellowship. May it proclaim abroad the truth to which Dr. Martineau consecrated his life—a truth now, thank God, winning wider recognition and more emphatic utterance—the truth of "the living union of God with our humanity."—Believe me, faithfully yours,

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

Mrs. Mottram also read the three following letters. Dr. Jessop was formerly for twenty years head master of King Edward VI.'s School at Norwich, to which Dr. Martineau went as a boy. The Ven. Archdeacon Pelham is the son of the late Bishop of Norwich.

Gea Cross, Hyde.

Dear Mrs. Mottram,—It is a great disappointment to me that a previous engagement prevents my accepting your kind invitation to the stone-laying to-morrow. It would have been to me a pilgrimage to a shrine rendered doubly sacred by the memories of boyhood, and by their influence on my after-life. The Octagon stands for me to this day as the home of the earliest and strongest religious impressions that I have known; and I owe to it more than I can tell. There were laid the foundations of the faith which has been my life; and to the religious spirit in which I was nurtured there I had always felt that any call I had to the ministry was due.

When to this is added the association of my great teacher, Dr. Martineau, with the proceedings of to-morrow, I have cause to lament my inability to be with you greater than I can express.

If I found at the Octagon the first inspiration of my boyhood's religion, I owed to Dr. Martineau the establishment of its faith upon a rock which could not be moved.

I sincerely hope I may be allowed to attend the opening of the school, and to hear then the announcement that we shall enter its doors free from debt. If that is so, it will be due to your own indefatigable labours.—With kind regards, yours sincerely,

H. ENFIELD DOWSON.

Scarning Rectory, East Dereham.

Dear Mrs. Mottram,—Will you do me the honour of accepting the enclosed small cheque as a subscription to the memorial to Dr. Martineau, and as a token of my deep reverence for the memory of the illustrious thinker and teacher, to whom I am under profound obligations?

AUGUSTUS JESSOP.

18, Chapel Field, April 10, 1907.

Dear Mrs. Mottram,—I am sorry that absence from Norwich will prevent me from accepting your kind invitation to be present on Saturday, April 20, at the laying of the foundation-stone of the memorial to Dr. Martineau.

I have read his Life and Letters with great interest. We owe him a deep debt of gratitude for his clear thinking, his high ideals, and his fervent piety.—Believe me, yours sincerely,

SYDNEY PELHAM.

Mr. G. A. King then gave a short address. He said there were two events connected with the history of that congregation which naturally stood out as most memorable. One was the building of the first meeting house, in 1687, under Dr. Collings, and next the building of the present meeting house, under Dr. John Taylor, in 1756. And now, after the lapse of just over 150 years, they felt that another memorable occasion was with them. They were there to commence the laying of the foundation of a building that would be used not only as Sunday-schools, but also as an institution for social and recreative purposes, and the name that was to be associated with that building was the name of one who, a century and two years ago, was born yonder in Magdalen-street, who lived to become one of England's greatest and profoundest thinkers, and a noble type of the influence of spiritual religion. For a while James Martineau worshipped in that place, and aided in the formation of the Sunday-schools they were continuing that day. But, beyond all this, his consecrated life had had its influence far beyond the narrow limits of his native city, and his "Hours of Thought" and his "Endeavours after the Christian Life" had touched, and continued to touch, sympathetic chords in the hearts of many thousands of men and women, not in Great Britain alone, but the world over, and they, too, had been inspired to think and to endeavour. Those who had so kindly responded to the friendly invitation to assist them in that happy event had not all been able to accept the conclusions to which James Martineau came. They differed profoundly, perhaps, from his position, but the Great Shepherd had many folds. They all worshipped and believed in the same common Father, they tried to shape their lives by the Divine standard that appeared in Jesus, and if there was anything of good in them it was by the inward moving of that Holy Spirit of love that enabled them to see through the outward thing into the inward reality, and to acknowledge the common brotherhood. In the name of the Octagon congregation, he welcomed them there that day. The stone which Miss Gertrude Martineau was about to lay was a memorial of something done, an outward and visible sign and testimony of foundations in the unseen, laid strong and deep. They rightly associated Dr. Martineau with that work, but he belonged to the Church Universal. He once said, "As to what I have done in a long career, it has been the simplest thing in the world, simply to say precisely and always that which I thought and believed and felt to be true; to hold back nothing, to profess nothing, to measure nothing by a standard other than was perfectly and absolutely sincere." In that same spirit they were now trying to do their work.

Mr. King then led Miss Martineau out to the new buildings, where the memorial stone was to be laid, and she gave the following address:—

MISS MARTINEAU'S ADDRESS.

THIS day brings very near to us the fulfilment of many ardent hopes, and spreads out before us many precious memories. And not memories only; for a cloud of witnesses surrounds us of the great and good who lived in harder times than ours, and whose faith grew strong through troubles and warfare, such as do not fall to our lot in these days. I often think that we are now too comfortable, and that if we had more to suffer for our faith we might clasp it more firmly, and give our lives for it with great ardour.

Amongst the cloud of witnesses around us stands out most clearly to our sight just now the one whom this building is to commemorate. And I cannot but call to mind now the simple gratitude and surprise with which my father always received any tribute of honour that was offered to him.

All through his long life he looked back with the tenderness of a son to this beautiful city where his childhood was spent; and he used to speak of the "dear old Octagon" as a beautiful influence of his early years. Of Mr. Madge he always spoke with great affection; of his "purity and simplicity of heart," his depth of conviction, his winning speech and voice.

A few little stories survive of the little band of Martineau children who began to attend the Octagon services, which make them live before us. One, of Harriet, who watched the skylight to see an angel come down. Another of Rachel, who, being a very lively and talkative child, was warned by her mother before going to chapel for the first time, that she must be perfectly quiet, as no one spoke in chapel. When the minister began his sermon, she turned from him to her mother with looks of unutterable displeasure; and when they went out after service she broke forth with "Mamma! who was that naughty man who talked all the time?" And there was little James, who shocked his notable mother by looking at the congregation through the holes in his small pocket-handkerchief. And lastly there is the story often told, though not always correctly, of the day when James did not go to chapel, and when his mother came home told her that he had read all the book of Isaiah whilst she was away; and when she reproved him for his exaggeration, he answered, "But I have, mamma; skipping the nonsense, you know."

I believe it was in my father's college vacation, some 86 years ago or thereabouts, that the establishment of Sunday-schools for the Octagon Chapel was first talked over in the Magdalen-street home. What a special interest, therefore, would he have taken in the buildings which you are now raising here as a worthy home for your Sunday-school. All through his busy life he took an active part in the management and teaching of such schools, and many of the old teachers still live to remember the spirit and guidance which pervaded the Sunday-school of which, for years, he was superintendent.

I hope these schools will also supply the older young people amongst you with opportunities for education beyond the school age, and for something higher than mere amusement. Very often, I think our young people are not sufficiently awake to the inadequacy to their future careers of the education with which they leave school, not to speak of its inadequacy to their characters, which they cannot be expected to realise. There are places where excellent classes for improvement are almost neglected, and only the amusements of the institution are frequented. Though I fully sympathise in the amusements, they should not occupy the whole of the spare time. In Scotland we find much more desire for this sort of improvement of the older young people than we do in England. Young lads, labourer's sons, who leave school to go to work in the summer, go back to school all the winter, and, even in the village schools learn algebra, geometry, Latin, and often French, sometimes staying at winter school till they are 20 or over, and then go to college. In our small district of Aviemore three village boys have become ministers, and one of them had been reading some of my father's books; two are trusted bank clerks, one is in the London Post Office, and others have passed through examinations into other branches of the Civil Service. A young man who had a very small and poor farm came to the village library and asked for some book "by which a young man may improve himself"; and to such good purpose did he improve himself that on going out to California he got work on a large ranche; then taught himself geometry and trigonometry, and all that was required for surveying; wrote home for a theodolite and other necessary instruments for which he sent payment, and became a good surveyor, reclaiming useless lands for his employers and becoming in time the manager of two large ranches. All this came from his early aspiration to "improve himself." I hope something of this spirit and desire for improvement may be conspicuous amongst the girls and lads who frequent this building, and that it may be a sort of home where their best desires can find help and satisfaction. If we could only find the way to open the eyes of our young people, whilst they are still young, to a glimpse of the vast stretches of things possible to them to learn, and which would open out to them in learning, how greatly would they increase not only their usefulness in life but their joy in living! The world would be to them a greater and more beautiful dwelling-place, and their trained minds would make them better fitted for dwellers in it, and better men and women, and better citizens. Then we should have "gentler manners, purer laws."

As for the religious education which our children will receive in these schools, have we not a far simpler task than our brethren in many other churches? For what is it in which we have to train our children? It is in no theology, new or old, but in just the religion by which Jesus himself lived and taught; which served him in all his joys and sorrows and sufferings, and brought him, as it may bring us, only nearer and nearer to God, through all the vicissitudes of life. There were no difficult and abstruse doctrines in his faith, but simple love and trust in a heavenly father and a loving God, in whose constant presence he could do all things, and bear all things needful. This faith, which sufficed for the holiest amongst us, may surely serve for all of us; and in striving to be faithful to the purity, depth and universality of that simple religion, we would all humbly pray to be included in Christ's invitation: "Suffer the children to come unto me, and forbid them not."

Just 51 years ago my father preached in the Octagon Chapel on occasion of its centenary. He ended with these words, which we may well recall now: "Let believers only be true to the grace they have and more will be given; and enter where they may the many-gated sanctuary of the Christian life, they will tend ever inwards to the same centre and meet at last in the holiest of all. Keeping a reverent eye fixed on the Person and Spirit of Christ, they cannot but find their partial apprehensions corrected and enlarged; for His divine image is complete in its revelation, and rebukes every narrower gospel. Moral perfectness, Divine communion, free self-sacrifice—all blend in Him—indistinguishable elements of one expression. In that august and holy Presence our divisions sink abashed, and hear, as of old, the word of recall, 'Ye know not what spirit ye are of.' Or if, through our infirmities, that gracious form appearing in the midst as we discourse among ourselves and are perplexed and sad, do not suffice to open our eyes and make us less slow of heart to one another, and to Him; at least in that higher world, whither our forerunners are gone, his loving look will perfect the communion of Saints. There at length, the guests of his bounty will find that, though at separate tables, they have all been fed by the same bread of life, and their lips touched with the same wine of remembrance. There, the voices of the wise, often discordant here—of Taylor and Wesley, of Enfield and Cowper, of Heber and Channing—will blend in harmony; and the notes of the last age will not be the least in that mighty chorus which crowds the steps of eighteen centuries, and converging to their immortal Head, sings the solemn strain,

'Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty! Just and true are all thy ways, thou King of Saints!''"

THE STONE-LAYING AND ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

At the conclusion of the address, Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke, the architect, presented to Miss Martineau a silver trowel, bearing a commemorative inscription, and Mr. B. E. Scarles, the builder, presented a mallet made of wood which was formerly in the Octagon. Miss Martineau then performed the ceremony, and declared the stone to be well and truly laid, after which the Rev. Alfred Hall offered the prayer of dedication.

Offerings were then laid upon the stone, including some contributions previously promised, and the fresh gifts amounted to about £150.

The conclusion of the proceedings followed in the chapel.

The Rev. Alfred Hall, in moving a vote of thanks to Miss Martineau for her presence and for the kindly sympathy she and many other friends had shown towards the movement, said the building would be raised to perpetuate the name of a very revered man, but a greater honour fell to the Octagon congregation through its erection. He esteemed it an unspeakable privilege that the lofty spirit of James Martineau was associated with that house of prayer, that there his ever-aspiring soul first sought communion with God, whom he loved and served. Of the men who had never seen Dr. Martineau there was not one who looked up to him with greater reverence, or owed him a deeper debt of gratitude, than he himself. Dr. Martineau had cleared away many intellectual mists for him. As a spiritual philosopher Dr. Martineau took a foremost place. As soon as he appeared on the scene it was recognised that there had appeared a champion of religion who was a match for all comers—and there were giants in those days, noble giants, deservedly honoured names, who tried to remove the ground of belief in God. If Dr. Martineau's works were more widely read many of the doubts and illusions that were perplexing people to-day would be at once removed. It was becoming the custom to deny the immortality of the soul. No one had a right to do that unless he had first of all read those classic pages at the end of the "Study of Religion." As an ethical teacher Dr. Martineau was recognised by the oldest of our Universities. He noticed that Sir Oliver Lodge had given as a definition of sin, "Sin is the deliberate and wilful act of a free agent who sees the better and chooses the worse." Immediately he was reminded of the rule that resulted from Dr. Martineau's ethical theory—"Every action is wrong which in the presence of a higher principle follows a lower," and he wondered whether the scientist was indebted to the philosopher, or whether he, thirty years after the time of Martineau, after extensive research into the realms of spirit and matter, had reached the same conclusion, independently. As a critic Dr. Martineau took the first place. He knew not where they would find a finer example of criticism than in the essay in which Dr. Martineau dealt with Matthew Arnold's tirade against Nonconformity. In the lecture, "Why Dissent," and in the "Study of Religion," and generally in dealing with his opponents, Dr. Martineau showed no acrimony, no bitterness of spirit; conscious of the strength of his position, he had no occasion for anger or undue passion, and could treat the arguments brought forth from the opposite camp with good humour. As a stylist, Dr. Martineau was a worker in beautiful and delicate mosaic, aptly fitting words and thoughts. As a scholar he received recognition from the universities of five different countries. But he was greatest as a man of God, as one who worshipped the loving Spirit that holds relations with mankind. He was pained because of his dissent; he was an unwilling Dissenter, and he made very strenuous efforts in his time to unite the Church on spiritual instead of doctrinal foundations. The new building would be a testimony to the people of Norwich, and to those who visited the city, that a great prophet arose in their midst, a prophet who spoke boldly for the truth, and who carried hope to many who were doubting. They were grateful to Miss Martineau for having come down to make these things more widely known and to share the high hopes of that congregation—for their hopes were never higher than at the present time. He believed he was accurate when he said that one-third of the members of that congregation were under the age of thirty, so they had every reason for looking forward. On that day, in commemorating the past they were preparing for the future.

Mrs. Mottram seconded the resolution, and said:—It is difficult to say with what deep pleasure I avail myself of this opportunity of thanking Miss Martineau for her presence with us to-day. It is a most happy thing for us, as a congregation, that through her visits of 1905 and that of to-day, and through this movement to raise a memorial to her father, we have resumed our relationship with the Martineau family. That thought takes us a long way back—to the founding of our Sunday-schools in 1823. In Dr. Martineau's own words, "To have had forefathers renowned for honourable deeds and belong by nature to those who have bravely borne their part in life and refreshed the world with mighty thoughts . . . is as a security given for us of old, which it were false-hearted not to redeem." It is not to be supposed that, when Dr. Martineau sought to gather a few young lads around him on a Sunday, asking the help of my husband's father amongst others to that end, that he, and those who helped him, foresaw the extent or far-reaching effect of what they then sought to do. But, to quote Dr. Martineau again: "A moral impulse, unlike a physical force, is not exhausted, but augmented by every effort it puts forth; not only does it part with no portion of its power, but it receives a fresh intensity." Such a moral impulse he had when he drew those lads together, and one result of it has been that hundreds of scholars since 1823 have thanked God for the Octagon Sunday-schools, while another is that we stand here to-day finding ourselves inspired by a re-birth, through us, of that moral impulse. We stand here witnesses to the elemental fact that though God buries His workers, His work goes on, and recognising that it is on our shoulders that the task of carrying it on in this place is laid. And surely there never was a more hopeful time for the worker than that which has now dawned. "The paths to nobleness, the opportunities of service, the calls to daily heroism open unendingly before each living soul. . . . God is burning our ships behind us; He is destroying the old, rough instincts of the human race, and replacing them with hopes and ideals which urge us, as never before, toward a fuller, grander, better life."* In such faith lived and worked the great teacher whom we seek to honour by raising these school buildings to his memory, and that his daughter is here with us, to link his work and spirit with ours, is, indeed a blessed omen for the future of that work, and a matter of the deepest satisfaction to us all. I have the sincerest pleasure in seconding the resolution of thanks to her for her presence to-day.

Miss MARTINEAU, in acknowledging the vote, said it was an honour to be able to do anything, however little, for that congregation, and it was a great pleasure to her to take up the old threads again.

Mr. A. M. STEVENS, secretary of the congregation, then moved, and Mr. W. H. SCOTT seconded, a resolution of thanks to the visitors, coupling with it the names of the Rev. V. D. Davis, the Rev. Dr. Barrett, and Mr. H. J. Copeman.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS said they knew how great a pleasure it was to him to be there, as a child of the Octagon, though it was difficult for him to realise all the representative capacities in which Mr. Stevens had spoken of him. He referred to the practical interest the British and Foreign Unitarian Association had shown in that Memorial, and THE INQUIRER also, in its way; and he ventured also to claim to represent Manchester College there, for both his father and he had been students of Dr. Martineau's in the College, and it was impossible to express the greatness of the debt they owed to him.

The Rev. Dr. BARRETT said he desired to express his thanks to those who so kindly invited him to be present on that occasion, when they were met for the purpose of raising a memorial to one of the most illustrious Englishmen of the past century. My theological position, Dr. Barrett went on, differs, as you know, widely and profoundly from that occupied by the late Dr. Martineau, and he would have been the first to have acknowledged that the gulf which separates one who, like myself, believes the Deity of our Lord to be the corner-stone of the Christian Faith, from himself is too wide to be bridged by any personal regard, however deep and real. At the same time, it is not less a pleasure than it is a duty for me to say that amongst all the great thinkers of the Victorian era Dr. Martineau was one of the very greatest. In an age when an agnostic philosophy was desolating the human heart he vindicated that one belief that lies at the root of all religion—belief in a personal and moral God—with a fulness of power and earnestness seldom equalled and never surpassed. In an age when utilitarian ethics threatened to make morality only another name for a refined selfishness, he established the glory and supremacy of the moral nature of man, and in his great work on Ethics traced all morality to its eternal source. In an age when materialism asserted its claim to be the only solution of the problems of existence he stood for all that is highest and most spiritual in thought. He was what the late Dr. Dale called him—the greatest spiritual philosopher England has ever possessed. My own obligations to Dr. Martineau as a thinker and a teacher are too many and too heavy to be adequately expressed, and on these grounds it is that I desire to join with you to-day in doing him honour. And yet, after all, the man was greater than his work. He not only left an imperishable mark on the thought of his age, but he left behind, what is even more precious, the memory of a life prolonged far beyond the usual span, devoted to the highest and noblest ends, a life of strenuous and unremitting toil, of pure and unselfish goodness, an example to all men of the dedication of life to the service of God and of man. Thank you for allowing me to offer this poor tribute to the memory of one of the greatest and the best of men.

Mr. H. J. COPEMAN, to whom Mr. Stevens referred as a member of the City Council to whom they were indebted for much valuable public service, said that he felt it an honour on that occasion to represent the general body of citizens. They appreciated the work done by the pastor and people of the Octagon in their schools and in educational and social efforts, and on that account were glad to be present and take part in that commemoration.

At the conclusion of the proceedings the company adjourned to the Octagon Institute, where tea was served and a very pleasant social hour was spent.

THE SUNDAY SERVICES.

On Sunday, after a communion service conducted by the Revs. Alfred Hall and V. D. Davis, the morning service was held. The Rev. P. M. Higginson took the first part of the service, and the Rev. Alfred Hall read the lessons. The anthem was "Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it," and the Rev. V. D. Davis preached the sermon, which is printed in our present issue.

The evening service was conducted by the Revs. P. M. Higginson and V. D. Davis, and the Rev. Alfred Hall preached the sermon, from the text Hebrews xii. 1, "Therefore let us also, seeing we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, lay aside every weight, and the sin that doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us."

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.—The Rev. W. Addis, M.A., having resigned the headship of the College residence, the Rev. L. P. Jacks, M.A., has accepted the charge, and will enter upon it at the close of the present session. Mr. Addis remains Professor of Old Testament, and has been also appointed Classical Tutor. This is simply a formal recognition of work which Mr. Addis has hitherto done unofficially, with the greatest benefit to successive generations of students.

THE RELIGION OF UNITARIANS.

JOHN HAMILTON THOM.
1808—1894.

"HE who ministers here is no priest of any altar made with hands, but a prophet of Him who is a Spirit, and communes with those whose worship is in spirit and in truth." So Dr. Martineau wrote at the conclusion of his Memorial Preface to the volume of sermons "A Spiritual Faith," by his friend John Hamilton Thom: How true that judgment was a thoughtful reader of those sermons will quickly see, and even more profoundly will it be felt in a study of the two volumes of "Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ," which Mr. Thom himself published in the latter years of his long life. Of the first of those two volumes (which may now be had for half-a-crown each: Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand), Dr. Martineau wrote in 1883, on its publication, to Catherine Winkworth: "I know of no book of this century that is to be compared with it for wealth of spiritual wisdom and beauty." And we say again, as we said last week of Martineau, if anyone would understand the religion of John Hamilton Thom, let him read the two volumes of the "Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ."

There was an earlier volume, "Christ the Revealer," in which Mr. Thom's fundamental position was very clearly stated. "Though the Son reveals to us the Father," he said in the sermon on "Inspiration and Miracle" in that volume, "yet in the first place it is some portion of the Spirit of God in us that attracts us towards its fulness in His Son."

And again:—"Those to whom the suggestions of God in them come with the power of realities, who have the same faith in their inspirations that other men have in their perceptions, to whom the voice of their conscience is the whisper of the Holy Spirit, and an aspiration after good a blessing promised of God, which man has but to stretch forth his hand and reach, working and waiting in faith—these are the spiritual Heroes, the Prophets and Saviours of the world. They speak out, and act out, and live in, the testimonies from God which they find within their souls. They believe that Man is the child of God, and that the Father is in communication with His children."

"Christ is the great quickener of Faith because it possessed himself entirely. His Life is the pattern of a life of Faith. The Christian means of strengthening Faith is to see its power in our Lord. Only, remember that even when we are drawn towards Christ, it is still the attraction of God that we obey. It is our Father's Spirit that we recognise in His truer Son. We are drawn towards its fulness because in a measure it is living and moving in us also. We are not mere students of the inspiration of another, but sharers in it: we ought not to be mere imitative followers of his manner of life, but more and more fed from the same fountain, growing from the same roots. We must have the living God in ourselves. Christ is our Mediator to show us the Father, to draw us personally into his own relations with God, that our souls may feel the eternal Spirit with none between: He would be no Mediator if he arrested us with himself, and kept us back from God. Sons of God, we must have personal communion with our Father, else are we exiles from His presence and know Him only by report. This would be the very antithesis of Christianity, of the life of a Son of God,—to banish God from the soul and substitute a Mediator. 'Father, I pray that they all may be one as we are,—as Thou, Father, art in me, and I in Thee,—that they may be one even as we are one.' We are saved by Christ when he stirs the kindred life in ourselves, when we are ruled by God's Spirit as he was, and have faith in God's inspirations as he had. God Himself is the living Spring of our goodness, and true discipleship consists in a like fidelity to our own inspirations, that we should be not outward copyists, but men full of inward love, faith, and courage."

Similarly in the second volume of the "Laws of Life," in the sermon on "The Fatherhood of God," Mr. Thom wrote:—

"The essential principle from which religious life proceeds is that God has given us a spiritual nature kindred to His own, so that our perceptions of right, our love and pursuit of goodness, our reverence for holiness, are in their essence identical with the affections and principles that exist and reign in Him. If this were not so, to call God our Father would be to use words meaningless or false. A Parent is one who imparts his own nature."

"I have used the word 'Inspiration' to express the communion of God's spirit with our own. We feel that He is in communication with our Conscience to prompt us to goodness, to filial and brotherly acts of service, and to impress the authority and sanctity of His Will upon us when we are inclined to shrink from its severity. At critical times in our life, under the sense of failure, weakness, and disappointment in the discovery of some root of evil in those with whom we are allied, or to whom we have given our love, or of some dread hollowness in ourselves: then, when all security seems to be drifting away, and the foundations of our being to be breaking up, if we turn for refuge to the faithfulness of God, the Father and Inspirer of the nature which seems to be betraying us, in that moment of light, the light of the knowledge of the Holy One, all our trusts revive in the clear discernment of the soul that the faithlessness is with ourselves, that we have fallen away from Him, not He from us. This is inspiration: when a peace that passeth understanding, which does not belong to the circumstance, but comes from Him who is above the circumstance, 'is shed abroad in our hearts.' It is deplorable that even in the Christianity which exists amongst us, false views of the Mediation of Christ tend to obstruct personal communion with the Holy Spirit, to enfeeble the sense of the direct access of God to the spirits of His children."

A man must know for himself. The Spirit does bear witness with our spirit. That was the constant burden of Mr. Thom's teaching. Thus he wrote once of prayer and public worship:—"I do not come to the church for the supply of anything that is peculiar to my own sense, not even for the spiritual help which in my individual circumstances and formation I may most urgently need and crave: for all that is intimately and intensely personal; I must look to the personal action of God's Spirit, to Him who alone understands me, and in whom alone my weaknesses can be turned into strength. Public worship can never supply the place of our individual intercourse with God. But it gives us confidence to resort to it. . . . But though public worship cannot pray from an individual's heart, or for an individual's wants, it gives him strength to pray for himself. It is the witness of humanity that he is under no delusions in believing that God has secret dealings with his spirit—it is the witness that all men feel what he feels; that the most mysterious communication of his nature is nothing peculiar to him—that the foundation fact of human nature is its living communion with an invisible God."

And one more passage we will give, from the Farewell Sermon of 1867, at the close of Mr. Thom's ministry in Liverpool:—

"Spiritual Liberty manifestly requires some immediate fellowship with God. Nothing else could protect us from man's authority, and give us self-subsistence. If we cannot appeal to a higher witness, how are we to stand against the witness of men, speaking in the name of traditions and of the wisdom of the Past? To this end we must have absolute reliance on the teachings of God in us. God is a Spirit: and we are spirits: and to the spirit He makes Himself known. Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God. These are the elements of religious Life."

Much more we might have quoted to show the wonderful spiritual insight and the heart-searching power of Mr. Thom's ministry. This, we trust, may suffice to send many new readers to his books.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Bolton: Halliwell-road.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were conducted on Sunday last, April 21, by the Rev. C. J. Street, of Sheffield. In the morning and afternoon there were large congregations, and in the evening the chapel was crowded to its utmost capacity. The scholars sang very effectively their special hymns which, together with the anthems rendered by the choir, added to the enjoyment of the services. The collections, amounting to £30 13s. 1d., were nearly double the average for this anniversary. Mr. Street's visit was greatly enjoyed, and the day's services were altogether inspiring.

Bootle.—The annual meeting of the members of the Free Church was held on Thursday evening, April 18. The business meeting was preceded by a reception kindly given by the chairman of the church, Mr. W. J. Pidgion. The treasurer, Mr. F. Firth, who is unfortunately unable to continue in the office owing to ill-health, presented a most satisfactory statement of accounts, and his successor, Mr. Spencer Yates, commences the year with an entirely "clean sheet." The committee's report dealing with the various institutions connected with the church, showed that steady progress was being made, and that a good average of interest and vitality had been maintained all round, whilst a new venture, a Social Problem Circle, had held an excellent first session. The committee especially desired to congratulate their minister, the Rev. J. M. Mills, upon "the unfailing variety, freshness, and excellence" of his preaching. In address by the minister, followed by some remarks from the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, with a cordial vote of thanks to the chairman, concluding a very interesting meeting.

Evesham.—On Sunday evening, April 21, a special dedication service was held, at which thirteen new members were received into the church. Appropriate hymns were sung, and an address given by the Rev. G. H. Phelps on "The Transfiguration of Life." Mr. A. H. Martin, chairman of the committee, also spoke a few words of welcome to the new members. This service was the culmination of the work of the Guild, which was formed in the autumn, and in connection with which the minister has conducted a series of week-night services, which were a sort of preparation class. On the 24th inst. Mr. Phelps started for America, to occupy the pulpit of the Rev. Hobart Clark, of New Brighton, N.Y. Mr. Clark takes up his duties here on May 12, and is to remain to the end of July.

Gateshead.—The anniversary services were held on Sunday, April 21, when the Rev. W. R. Shanks, of Holbeck, Leeds, preached morning and evening to large congregations. On Monday evening the annual tea and meeting was presided over by Mr. Charles Carter, in the unavoidable absence of Sir J. Baxter Ellis. The Revs. W. K. Shanks, W. H. Lambelle (Middlesborough), and G. A. Ferguson, and other speakers took part, and the meeting was marked by much enthusiasm.

Manchester: Longsight.—At a specially convened meeting of the members of the congregation of the Free Christian Church, held on Sunday evening, April 21, the resignation of the Rev. H. J. Rossington, M.A., owing to his having been appointed minister of the First Presbyterian Church, Belfast, was accepted with regret.

Manchester: Pendleton.—The church anniversary services were conducted on Sunday, April 23, by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, of Bolton, both services were largely attended, especially the evening, when the church was crowded. Special music was rendered by the choir.

Newchurch.—The Rev. James Shaw Brown, began his ministry on April 6, and the church secretary writes to say that his new address will be Thistlemount-terrace, Waterfoot, nr. Manchester. Mr. Shaw Brown is an ex-Congregational minister, at present taking a year's further study at Manchester College, Oxford. He was for some years assistant to the Rev. Dr. Hunter, at Glasgow, with charge of the institutional branch church at Partick. In 1903, he accepted a call to Mansfield Congregational Church, but resigned the charge last June. He went up to Oxford in October, and has still the summer term there to complete.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual conversation was held at Dukinfield on Saturday last, and was very successful. About 200 sat down to tea. A meeting of the Committee was held immediately afterwards, at which the question of holding a musical festival was discussed. At the evening meeting 300 persons were present. Illustrated books, photographs and pictures were laid upon the tables in the room for the use of teachers present. Almost all the 14 schools of the Union were represented. The President (Rev. B. C. Constable) occupied the chair at the opening, supported by Miss Dornan (Vice President), Mr. A. Slater (Hon. Secretary), and Rev. W. Holmshaw, who attended as representative of the Manchester District Sunday School Association. The other ministers present included Revs. E. Gwilym Evans, H. Bodell Smith, W. G. Prie, J. A. Pearson, Jenkyn Thomas, and J. E. Stead. Miss Dornan presided over the latter part of the proceedings, and offered a hearty welcome to Mr. Holmshaw, who delivered a practical address on the joys and disappointments of a Sunday-school teacher's work. An interesting musical and dramatic programme was given by the Dukinfield friends, each individual item being exceptionally well rendered. Hearty votes of thanks to all concerned were given and responded to, and a pleasant meeting closed with the singing of the evening hymn and Benediction.

Pontypridd.—The fifteenth anniversary meetings of the church were held April 13 & 14. The Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, lectured on Saturday night on "The New Theology and the Old Religion." The secretary of the English Congregational Church, Alderman W. R. Davies, solicitor, presided. The Rev. Simon Jones, of Swansea, delivered a Welsh sermon on Sunday afternoon, and the Rev. Joseph Wood preached in the evening on "What think ye of Christ?" The church was well filled both on Saturday and Sunday. On Thursday, April 18, a social meeting of the congregation was held, to bid farewell to the Rev. Simon Jones, on his removal to Swansea. Mrs. John Lewis, on behalf of the church, the Sunday-school, and the adult class, presented him with a number of books, including Martineau's "Hours of Thought," "Essays and Reviews," Hobhouse's "Evolution in Morals," and Bousset's "Jesus," and in doing so stated that Mr. Jones would carry away with him the best wishes of the congregation. Mr. Simon Jones returned thanks, and on behalf of the committee and himself presented a few books and a sum of money to Mr. Harry Parfitt, secretary of the Sunday-school, who was about leaving the town for Canada.

Stockport.—A very interesting service was held in the church last Sunday afternoon for the purpose of unveiling a brass tablet, erected in the church, and an enlarged photograph, to be hung in the schoolroom, in commemoration of the late Miss Sarah Hirst who was a faithful teacher and devoted worker in the school for 55 years. The Rev. T. P. Spedding, a former scholar and teacher, and the Rev. B. C. Constable, the minister and superintendent, delivered addresses, and spoke in glowing terms of Miss Hirst. Mr. O. E. Heys, of Stockport, a former superintendent, who had known Miss Hirst for many years, read the lesson; Miss Mary Lee and Mr. Walter Humphreys, both old scholars and teachers in the school, each gave out a hymn, and Miss Eliza Johnson, who had known Miss Hirst all her life, performed the ceremony of unveiling. The tablet is mounted on a slab of black marble, and its inscription reads as follows:—"In affectionate memory of Sarah Hirst, born 18th October, 1829, died 26th September, 1905. For 55 years a faithful teacher and devoted worker in the Sunday-school of this church. Erected by members of the church and school, 1907." It is proposed to have an annual Miss Hirst Prize or prizes in the school. The collection towards the fund for this amounted to £4 2s. There was a large congregation.

Yarmouth.—A sale of work organised by the Old Meeting ladies' society was held in the school-room on Friday, April 19, in aid of the funds of the church. Mr. W. H. Scott, president of the Eastern Union, presided, and the sale was opened by Mrs. Scott. The chairman spoke of the progress of liberal religious thought, and the Rev. John Birks, in welcoming the visitors from Filby and Norwich, spoke of the pleasant opportunity for co-operation and friendly meeting such a sale afforded. They hoped to raise at least £20, as they had done last year for their church funds. The Rev. Alfred Hall responded to the resolution of welcome to the visitors.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WHITWEEK MINISTERS' MEETING.

SIR,—Will you kindly permit me the use of your columns in order to call the attention of your ministerial readers to the arrangements that have been made for the usual gathering in Whitweek? The London Unitarian Ministers' meeting invite all their brethren who may be in town for the meetings, to a conference on the Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock, and to a friendly cup of tea at 5.30. The reader of the paper will be the Rev. R. W. Boynton, of St. Paul, Minn., who will speak on "The Knowledge of God." At the present time it should be especially interesting to hear how the problems we are all called upon to face are being met by one of the younger men in the far West of America.

HOW TO KEEP SERVANTS.

Most servants leave because they think they have too much work to do. If you wish to lighten their burden and save them labour buy the "Dalli," or "Dallinette" (a smaller "Dalli"), because these irons can do double the work in half the time, and do it in comfort. No going to and fro from stove to ironing table. To use them is the best, most simple, and most comfortable way of ironing. Self-heating with non-inflammable fuel without noxious fumes, therefore no risk from fire. Healthier and safer than any other iron.

The "Dallinette" is a smaller "Dalli." Really excellent for light work and travelling. For general household work use the "Dalli." Having a larger ironing surface and greater heating capacity, every description of ironing can be done with it.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

FRIENDS in and about London are requested to remember the annual meeting at Essex Hall next Wednesday evening of the London District Unitarian Society, when the President, Mr. John Harrison, is to take the chair at 8.15. And also the annual meeting of the London Domestic Mission, which is at Unity Church, Islington, this year, on Tuesday week, May 14, when Mr. Charles Jones, of Liverpool, is to preside.

Mr. JEAN RÉVILLE gave his inaugural lecture as Professor of the History of Religions in the Collège de France, on Wednesday, April 17, thus succeeding to the Chair held with so much distinction by his father, the late Professor Albert Réville, for twenty-six years.

Of the Rev. L. P. Jacks, Editor of the Hibbert Journal, who is at present in that interest in America, we hear from the Christian Register of April 18, that he "was in Boston last week, and was a welcome guest at various Unitarian festivities. He preached in the First Church in Cambridge on Sunday, April 7, and spoke at the Parish Club of that church on Tuesday evening together with Dr. S. A. Eliot and C. W. Wendte, who explained the plans of the International Council. On Monday Professor Jacks attended a meeting of the Boston Association of Ministers, and on Wednesday was the guest of the Unitarian Club at the Hotel Vendome. He preached at the South Congregational Church (Dr. Hale's) last Sunday. On Monday, April 29, he will give an address to the Ministerial Union in Channing Hall on "The New Idea of Catholicity."

A MEETING to commemorate the life-work of Mrs. Josephine Butler was held in the Caxton Hall, Westminster, on Monday, Professor James Stuart in the chair. The resolution, recording admiration for Mrs. Butler's work, and the need for carrying it to completion, was moved by Mrs. Fawcett, and seconded by the Bishop of Southwark. Mr. Augustine Birrell, who spoke as a relative of Mrs. Butler's, said that he had been early taught to admire her, and in later life he learned to love her for her dauntless courage, her magnificent energy, zeal, and devotion. She had to meet fierce and cruel opposition, but no touch of bitterness was ever to be noted in her speech or manner. She kept the same simple, loving, heroic human heart to the end. Other speakers in support of the resolution were Mrs. Bramwell Booth, on behalf of the Salvation Army, M. Henri Minod, of Geneva, Dr. William Carter, of Liverpool, Mrs. Creighton, and Mr. Percy Bunting.

THE Wesleyan Methodists will probably give us a lesson presently on how to bear ill-fortune. A decrease simultaneously in the number of full members, of members on trial, and of junior members, is a rare experience in the Wesleyan body. The decrease this time is not only all along the line, but it is very wide spread in regard to locality. London, South Wales, Yorkshire, Cornwall, all account for the decrease which affects twenty-two districts. Nine circuits show each a decrease of over 100; West London and South London heading the list. There will doubtless be the proper amount of explanations that do not explain, and suggested remedies that do not help. But the Wesleyans have had a long and varied experience in Church managing, and in missionary operations, and we may confidently expect that the fact of the decrease will be taken very seriously; and that a great deal more time and effort will be spent in amending what is weak and faulty than in apportioning the blame. Confidence in himself and in his mission, the certainty that he had a great work to do, and must do it, never failed John Wesley; it carried him through trials without and within. His followers have inherited not a little of his persistency.

ANOTHER London memorial of the great evangelical revival of the eighteenth century is in all probability shortly to disappear. The news comes to us in the brief announcement that the Tabernacle in Finsbury, so closely associated with the preaching of George Whitefield is to be sold by auction. One part of the sale price will be devoted to carrying on "mission" work in the old district, and with the balance it is hoped to erect a congregational church at Alexandra Park. There is some talk of taking Whitefield's old pulpit to the new church.

At the public meeting of the Liberation Society in the City Temple on Wednesday evening a letter was read from Mr. Lloyd-George, who was to have presided, in which he said that the Prime Minister had definitely promised to take up the question of Welsh Disestablishment at an early date.

A FIRST glance at the pictures in the Academy, which opens to the public on Monday, is enough to show that this year's exhibition promises abundant pleasure, and perhaps less misery than usual. Our notes on the exhibition as a whole we must keep for next week, and only record here the special personal interest of pictures by artists known to many of our readers. Mr. Follen Bishop has a pleasant bit of autumn landscape in the Water Colour Room "Shadow Dark and Sunlight Sheen" (1040). Mr. Ernest Briggs has "Evening at the Falls of Lochay" (1010) and a striking portrait of his brother, the late Arthur Currer Briggs, as Lord Mayor of Leeds (1037). There is a glimpse of Wales, "On the Moors Above Trefriw" (1111) by Mr. Isaac Cooke, and the tower of "Magdalen College, Oxford," seen from a garden, and appearing above the trees (1114) by Miss Frances Drummond. Mr. Savage Cooper is to be congratulated on his "Sweet Lavender" (818), with holyhocks in a beautiful sunny garden, and Mr. Wetherbee, especially on his picture in the first room, "For ever wilt thou love, and she be fair!" (16),—a bit of poetry in a fine setting. "Phyllis" (803), is another of his glimpses into Arcady. Mrs. Forster Morley's "Thistles" (666) is a bit of pure nature, with the blue sea appearing over the long grass of the level shore.

The May number of the Coming Day has the address recently given by the Rev. J. Page Hopps in Belfast, before the Ulster Unitarian Christian Association, and two Little Portland-street Discourses, on "Vicarious Suffering" and "Not by Bread Alone."

ROGER WILLIAMS AND RHODE ISLAND.—III.

To Roger Williams belongs the praise, not only of advocating a principle in advance, but of fearlessly putting its successive applications into practice. Starting with the purpose of toleration for difference of religious opinion, he passed on to the aim of taking brotherly treatment to the heathen Indian, then enlarged his purpose again to the founding of "a shelter for his distressed countrymen," and at last, ere many more years had passed, into the holy object of setting up "a lively experiment, that a most flourishing civil state may stand, and best be maintained, . . . with full liberty in religious concerns."

Moreover, he was soon to earn the blessing of the persecuted by blessing his very persecutors. One of the hostile Indian tribes had attacked some Massachusetts traders, been guilty of murders, and now attempted to form a league with other tribes and so drive out, or exterminate, the English. In fright at this dreaded prospect, the magistrates begged the banished Roger Williams to mediate with the hostile Indians. He complied at once, started upon this hazardous task, and with such success, that he not only prevented the league of offence, but secured a league of peace in its place. Referring to this dangerous enterprise he modestly says:—

"The Lord helped me immediately to put my life into my hand, and scarce acquainting my wife, to ship myself alone in a poor canoe, and to cut through a stormy wind with great seas, every minute in hazard of my life, to the Sachem's house. Three days and nights my business forced me to lodge and mix with the bloody Pequod ambassadors, whose hands and arms, methought, reeked with the blood of my countrymen, murdered and massacred by them, and from whom I could not but nightly look for their bloody knives at my own throat. God wondrously preserved me, and helped me to break to pieces the Pequod's negotiation and design; and to make and finish, by many travels and changes, the English league with the Narragansetts and Mohegans." If he had done nothing else but this he would have been entitled to the lasting gratitude of New England; and he overcame evil with good. Yet, despite such anxiety, and the constant responsibility of the Colony, he was all the time working laboriously to support his wife and family; he earned his own livelihood. "Time was spent day and night, at home and abroad, on land and water, at the hoe and at the oar, for bread." Further immigrations from the intolerance of Massachusetts made it necessary to confirm the civil compact made between the original settlers. There was no giving way, but the same definite provisions concerning liberty of conscience. "We agree, as formerly hath been the liberties of the town (Providence), so still to hold forth liberty of conscience." And again: "It is ordered that the law of the last court made concerning liberty of conscience in point of doctrine be perpetuated."

Thus, by degrees, the little settlement of refugees grew into an organised community of importance. But it was not yet to be a recognised colony. On the formation of the Confederacy of "The United Colonies of New England" in 1643, Rhode Island was excluded on the alleged ground of having no charter. As they had, therefore, no title to their lands beyond that obtained from the natives, and as there was still danger of encroachments from Massachusetts, Roger Williams went to England to procure a charter. The time was favourable for him. The King had fled from London, and Laud was in the Tower. Cromwell and Vane were pleading for toleration in the Long Parliament debates on religion, and, probably through their influential aid, the charter was granted. Milton, Baxter, and Owen also had intercourse with him; episcopacy was at a discount, and independency in the ascendant. "I regard," says Masson, "the arrival of Roger Williams in London as the importation into England of the very quintessence or last distillation of that notion of Church independency which England had originated, but Holland and America had worked out." But the principles of Roger Williams were more comprehensive than those of the Independents, and, moreover, had proved themselves in practice.

Six years later he had again to come to England, as there was danger of the charter being undermined. After a stay of two years and a half he returned with his mission accomplished, and in time to avert again a threatened Indian war. He is made president of the united colony, urges a pacific Indian policy, refuses to persecute the Quakers who were cruelly treated in the other colonies, secures a new charter from Charles II., remarkable for both its civil and religious guarantees, adopts the constitution of the United States, then passes on the governorship to Benedict Arnold, and takes a minor part in public affairs.

One of his last acts was characteristic of all the rest. The town of Providence having proposed to divide up the common lands among the inhabitants, he pleaded with them to leave these lands common for future settlers who might be driven or come unto them to partake of their freedom, "for all experience tells us that public peace and love is better than abundance of corn and cattle. I have only one motion and petition, which I earnestly pray the town to lay to heart, as ever they look for a blessing from God on the town, on your families, your corn and cattle, and your children after you. It is this, that after you have got over the black brook of some soul bondage yourselves, you tear not down the bridge after you, by leaving no small pittance for distressed souls that may come after you." He gave away his own lands and other estate to persons in want, and caring nought for material interest, passed away in poverty.

Roger Williams was buried in a spot which he had selected close by the place where he landed first in Providence forty-seven years before his decease. But his works do follow him. Although not recognised by his contemporaries for his full greatness even in his own Providence, and albeit a prophet without honour elsewhere, later ages are doing him justice at last. All great reformers make diverse impressions, and deserve lenient extenuations. Savonarola, Luther, Cromwell, for example; we pay homage to them all, yet how variant, how opposite, has been the verdict. But the perspective of distance has been favourable in each case, and so will it be with Roger Williams. A Free Conscience, A Free Church, a Free State—for these he stood against the world, and these, under God, he secured. He suffered, but he conquered, because he was a man of supreme faith and courage, a man of ideals and principles, a humanitarian of great heart and merciful spirit, a fearless reformer for God and the right. And thus, though he did not see the result from the start, or contemplate the end from the beginning, the way opened out wider and wider until he became a great pioneer and founder. Rhode Island is his monument for evermore. Such heroes and saints stir our faltering wills to follow humbly in their steps. Under the spell of their example we take up our task afresh, our mission, in our time.

"We take up the task eternal, and the burden, and the lesson, Pioneers! O Pioneers!"

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me a little space to draw attention to the coming annual meeting of the Central Postal Mission on Whit Thursday afternoon, full particulars of which are advertised in your columns.

After the formal business, Miss Rawlins, of the Liverpool Postal Mission, will give some account of that branch of the work, and the Editor of Unity will speak on "Unitarian Propagandist Work in Connection with the Press."

The ladies of the central committee extend a cordial invitation to tea to all who can remain after the meeting, when there will be opportunity for friendly talk.

FLORENCE HILL,
(Hon. Sec., Central Postal Mission).
14, Perrin's-court, Hampstead, N.W.

A GLANCE at the objects of the charitable bequests of the last four years enables us to gain an impression of the force and direction of the stream of charity, although, of course, the gifts of the living are far greater and more varied than those of the dead. In the years 1903-6 inclusive these bequests have numbered 1,148. The largest class, that known as "relief in money or kind," or more shortly as "doles," contains 274 bequests. But the gifts to hospitals, 268 in number, are not far behind, and in value greatly exceed. Then we find 206 bequests for the Church of England, and 113 for other religious bodies. Pensions and almshouses, which were once the most popular of all objects except the doles, account for 81, and there is a small but interesting class of 51 bequests for "Public Purposes." The total amount of property thus bequeathed is above £2,600,000, a sum, the size of which is accounted for by the rapidity with which millionaires have been dying these last few years.

LITERATURE.

SOURCES OF THE LIFE OF JESUS.*

SOME references have already appeared in THE INQUIRER to the series of popular booklets on Religious History, which, under the title Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher für die deutsche christliche Gegenwart, and under the editorship of Lic. F. M. Schiele, of Tübingen, has gained a wide circulation, and is making a deep impression in Germany. The series includes at present nine essays on different aspects of the New Testament; half-a-dozen on the Old Testament, and others on Comparative Religions, Church History, and the Philosophy of Religion. Bousset's "Jesus," a double number in the New Testament set, has already appeared in English in Williams & Norgate's Crown Theological Library. Wernle's Die Quellen des Lebens Jesu is now issued in a translation from the competent pen of our friend Mr. Lummis. Wrede's "Paul," by the same translator, will be out very soon, and English versions of others are in contemplation. We wish they could be issued in this country as cheaply as in Germany. The price there has been raised, but in paper covers the single numbers still cost only sixpence.

The wonderful and encouraging revival of interest in theology in our own country has an interesting parallel in Germany. There, as here, the attraction is towards restatement and reconstruction; but there, as is not the case here, the impulse comes from trained and accomplished scholars. The world's debt to German theologians is incalculable: in particular, their work on the Old and New Testaments is one of the most remarkable achievements in the brain-work of the last century. But, till lately, German theological study has been specialist, technical, and elaborate, the work of experts for experts. The series of booklets to which we draw attention is one sign of a conspicuous change. The authors are specialists, some of them of the very first rank. But the specialist now addresses himself directly to the people, and subordinates his processes to the clear statement of the results of his laborious craft.

This change is due [to the deliberate policy of the "Liberal Partei," which is now the most active and influential element in the religious life of Germany. The orthodox groups of the Confessionals and the Positive Unionists are more obscure than our Anglicans and Evangelicals, and though the prestige is with them, and they hold the seats of the mighty in University and Church, in the changed conditions of things they have nothing to say that is not old and stale. The Landeskirchliche Partei is not unfriendly to theological reconstruction, but it is committed to a type of Protestant Evangelicalism which, though it offers "a feather bed for falling Christians," has little comfort for those who have already fallen. On the other side are the Liberals and the Radicals. The Radicals are few and not weighty. It is the Liberals who are the men of the moment. Their strength is great and growing, and their policy is skilful and effective. The leaders are for the most part University professors and tutors; and by lectures, publications, and personal influence, they are spreading their theological views among the students, preachers, and people. The Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher, are only one evidence of their activity. Under Professor Johannes Weiss, a group of them is issuing a fresh translation, with introductions and commentaries, of the New Testament writings. Weinle's Lebensfragen series is the product of another co-operative literary mission. Detached volumes of note and influence like the lives of Christ by Otto Holtzmann and P. W. Schmidt; von Soden's History of Early Christian Literature; and in another order, Frenssen's Hilligenlei, are all to be credited to the same school.

The method of the Liberals in theology is what, for want of an unprejudiced word, we must call "scientific": that is to say, they approach the problems of religion not as interpreters of an authority or expounders of a tradition, but as investigators of historic fact, working by the mental conceptions of the modern world. Magical and miraculous supernaturalism drops out of all their results; cause and effect and the influence of environment are their governing ideas; but the significance of human personality, the value of the moral and the spiritual life, are the first and last concern in all their inquiries.

English critics have described their conclusions as "frankly Unitarian." A better clue to the correct estimation of them is in the remark of Dr. Sanday at the Church Congress eighteen months ago: "It might be said that the general position is like that which we associate with the better Unitarianism." By the "better Unitarianism," I should suppose him to mean the Unitarianism which retains Jesus in the forefront of its teaching, as distinguished from a worse Unitarianism which, like the German Radical Partei, rather prides itself on reducing Jesus to one among a number of the instructors of a dead yesterday. But this worse type of Unitarianism, though it is not rare in the Unitarian pew, has little influence nowadays in the Unitarian pulpit: and most of us will welcome heartily the work of the German Liberals as a valuable and important help in some of the things we have tried to say and do.

But with a reservation. The centre of gravity in the German Liberal movement is the significance of Jesus for modern life. Behind all this literary activity there is a passionate belief that the human Jesus matters intensely to us: out of this belief springs this new endeavour to recover the real Jesus from the misconceptions which warped the narratives of even the very earliest evangelists. "Our ideal is the Christian personality," writes one of the leaders: "we are of the conviction that our goal, the richness of our personal moral life, can only, or at any rate, best be reached through a contact with the personal life of Jesus." This contact they hope to establish through the recovery, by the processes of scholarship, of the veritable words of Jesus himself. "What is crucial in those words," says Wernle, "is trust in God, purity of heart, compassion, humility, forgiveness, aspiration—these and nothing else. This is the Will of God, as epitomised in the Sermon on the Mount; he who does it is Jesus' mother and sister and brother. And if Christendom has forgotten, for almost two thousand years, what the Master desired first and before all things, it shines forth again out of the gospel to-day as bright and wonderful as if the sun were but now newly risen, to drive away with its conquering beams all ghosts and shadows of the night." Here we have at once the strength and the weakness of German Liberalism. Its plea for the human Jesus is noble and strong; and much may come from its emphasis upon the personality and the teaching which are at the source of Christian history. But the excision of the centuries of Christian doctrine, worship, and aspiration is unphilosophical. Though, as Wernle puts it, "nauseated with Christology we long for God," it remains the fact that the personality of Jesus altered the texture of the moral consciousness of Europe. It is for this reason that the study of Christian origins is only a fragment of the task which lies upon the modern theologian. Paul and John may not be dismissed as unimportant mythologists: Doctrine, Dogma, and Ritual, all in their degree, can provide evidence as to what Jesus was, and is; and only a purblind Rationalism, unable to distinguish between letter and spirit, will offer us a thin handful of sayings as the final essence of the Gospel. The Liberals believe in Jesus, but they do not believe in Christ. We think it is not possible, even if it were desirable, to de-Christianise Jesus. It is precisely because, through the two thousand years, Christendom has not forgotten "what the Master desired first and before all things," but, within the Christian Church and human life, has ever tried afresh to embody it, that Jesus has conquered, and the Son of God still goes forth to war.

Wernle's essay is a clear and excellent presentation of the elements of the Synoptic problem, working towards the residuum which has the best authority for the words and works of Jesus. Wernle's control of his complicated material is admirable; neither pedantic nor controversial, he makes his successive points with the force and precision of a real master; and for those readers who want a brief but authoritative exposition of the modern results of the historical and literary criticism of the first three Gospels, this is the book.

Its defect is not in its treatment, but in its postulate that the only significant sources for our knowledge of the life of Jesus are the historical fragments imbedded in the Synoptics.

THE NEW MORAL EDUCATION.*

THE function of American literature is the intellectual appreciation and formulation of spiritual results, as distinguished from the creation of them. The aptness and power with which this can be done are illustrated by the present work. A new science and art of moral education have been for some time slowly evolving. Extreme and opposing tendencies have been struck out, and now Mr. Griggs gives us a mediating view. "In education, as in life, we are led astray by brilliant half-truths. . . . We have turned from duty to interest, from form to content, from discipline to nutrition, from instruction to expression, from prescription to election. In all this is much gain, but only if we avoid extreme reaction and keep the good of the old in the new." For example, "the discovery of the biological parallel between individual and race development led to extreme and unwarranted educational applications"; nevertheless "the parallel exists, and is of great educational importance." (These remarks introduce a most suggestive essay on the ethical value of mythology and folklore, the fresh, unsophisticated material of primitive life, in which the great moral laws stand out more simply and moral consequences have a more obvious incidence than in Goethe or Ibsen.) The same sanity and wholesomeness of the writer are maintained throughout, the twofold principle being ever kept in view: "everything is bad which does not make the child's life as joyous as possible now, and as natural a step as it may be to the life that follows." Some of the mistakes of the past are censured, e.g., some excesses in kindergarten, the overdriving of "heredity," notions in the old "Elsie Venner days" (how fast the world moves: O. W. Holmes an antediluvian!) Herbert Spencer's draconian theory that the proper corrective for children is to let them suffer the natural consequences of their misdeeds, the loss of home feeling and mutual influence of the sexes in great public schools and clubs and other one-sided groups and "Institutions"—"Homes," which are not homes; and even Froebel does not escape for having made adult logic supply the order in which subjects are taught to children. One consideration meets a difficulty put to the present writer by one of our own ministers: "If I had a son, I don't know whether I should send him to a Sunday-school; boys want to be taught hardness—not so much softness, at any rate." We are to adapt teaching to the child's stage of development: "the self-affirming tendencies of character appear before that of self-sacrifice. Children are strong egoists, and while this egoism needs to be checked and corrected, they can understand the virtues of heroism, &c., long before they can appreciate the sublimity of forgiveness and the beauty of non-resistance." The writer values Sunday-schools highly, especially as in American day-schools definitely religious teaching is not allowed. The relation of religious to moral instruction is dealt with. Parents and teachers will find themselves driven, by this comprehensive book of first principles and improved methods, to think out for themselves all sorts of questions: Why morals should be taught; and how far taught; and why fairy-tales are so attractive. There is a splendid bibliography—but Mr. F. J. Gould should have been mentioned.

MR. McCABE has entitled his book "The Bible in Europe," and has further described it as "an inquiry into the contribution of the Christian Religion to civilisation." From such a title and description the reader may very well expect to learn what, in the writer's opinion, is the essence of Christianity, and how it has affected and is affecting European life; what are the main characteristics of the collection of scriptures known as the Bible, and how these writings have affected life and literature. Nothing of the kind is here. It would be impossible from this volume to gain any knowledge either of the Christian Religion or of its sacred books. Something of the wickedness and stupidity of Christian teachers and Christian rulers in thwarting science, in burning witches, in oppressing women, in all sorts of irrational and reactionary conduct, may here be gleaned. But, really, one would hardly be justified in gathering together some dozens of illustrations of Hallam's remarks that Luther bellowed bad Latin, and then entitling the result "The Contribution of Martin Luther to the German Language." Something not unlike that will be found in Mr. McCabe's book. The third chapter is all taken up with the Middle Ages. Now, if a man seriously desires to know the contribution of Christianity to the life of the Middle Ages, the way has been cleared for him. He should be directed to spend his days and nights with Dante, whose life has recently been so lovingly studied, and whose writings have been so carefully translated by English scholars. Dante is the man who seems in many ways the embodiment of what was most characteristic of the Middle Ages. Yet a footnote of five lines represents the notice here taken of Dante, and the object of the note is to say that the great poet breathes in every line his indebtedness to Paganism! An un-instructed reader who had never opened Dante's pages might doubt from this note whether Dante was to be reckoned among the Christians. To talk to us about Christianity's contribution to European progress and say nothing of Dante even when dealing with his very times; to talk to us of the Bible in Europe, and say nothing of the literature in which the Psalms and the Prophets and the patriarchal stories have lived and worked in the minds of men is in each case to leave out that which is essential. This work, to put the matter shortly, is not a history, it is nothing more than a sectarian tract of something over 200 pages. It is written, apparently, to show that the Pagan world was not as bad as many Christian writers have represented it to be; that some of the changes made by Christianity were not altogether changes for the better; that even the reforms effected by Christianity were not so complete as certain divines have liked to imagine; that in every age follies and cruelties have been perpetrated with the connivance, the active assistance, or the sole responsibility of the Church. It is fair to say that the pretence of being a work of history rather than a sectarian pamphlet goes no further than the title-page. The chapter on the Middle Ages is headed "The Restriction of Science."

* "The Bible in Europe." By Joseph McCabe. (Watts & Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

As a handbook of the blemishes and limitations of Christianity the work is not ill done. For anything we know, there may be people living somewhere who have taken the rhetoric of Dr. Fairbairn or Dean Farrer too literally, and who will be glad of these presentations of the case for the opposition. By-and-by the same people may be glad to leave party manifestoes altogether and read history. Perhaps a few hours with Milman will then be acceptable.

PROFESSOR RALEIGH'S "SHAKESPEARE."

It must have often been a subject of wonder and surprise why the useful series of books which has become meritoriously famous and won the gratitude of thousands of readers, viz., the "English Men of Letters," has not until the present date contained the foremost name amongst them all. The series began some thirty years ago; it became sufficiently comprehensive to include Bentley and Crabbe; it even took in several women, Fanny Burney and Maria Edgeworth among them; but the master-mind in English literature it left out. The reason one can easily surmise; so little is known of Shakespeare that one could not conveniently confine one's speculations into the space allotted according to the original intention of the series. Or those who made a special study of the great dramatist held their work of too much importance to issue it in any other than the form of more ponderous volumes. At last, however, the grand title of the series has been vindicated. And no more cogent mind could have been chosen for the task than that of Professor Walter Raleigh. His reputation has increased with every fresh volume he has given to the world. It is thirteen years since his first publication, and from "Stevenson" to "Milton" to "Wordsworth" has been an advancement of power and of appreciation. Few books have won such unstinted and widespread approbation as the volume on Wordsworth (1903), which by its freshness and vigour and interpretative insight raised its author to the first rank of critics. (A review by Mr. Jupp was published in the INQUIRER of September 12, 1903.)

Everybody will read Professor Raleigh's Shakespeare. For though it emanates from Oxford it is as unacademic in temper as it is sane and wise and balanced in all its judgments. There is the sound sense, the vigorous diction, the palpable mother-wit, the sympathetic insight, the large-heartedness, the comprehensiveness, which Matthew Arnold bade us expect in the great critic. To say the book is eminently readable is to say the least thing. Though it is largely a resumé of the researches of specialists, everything has passed through the judiciously selective intellect of the author.

Lovers of Shakespeare who have no time for a perusal of special literature will be glad to possess this concise summing up of the facts that are known, and this fearless confession of where the blanks remain unfilled. Professor Raleigh does not believe that Shakespeare was a classical scholar, or an adept in natural history, or a great traveller, or any of the many things accredited to him by the laudable desire to add to the lustre of his glory; he is willing to recognise the limitations of his hero, but he does this only to exalt him the more. We have a full sense of the colossal nature of the man of imagination, the man who thought in living personalities, in human types, the man who dreamed a wondrous dream and awoke to find it true in the moving world around him. The humanity of Shakespeare is a greater thing than his other qualities; rather includes all qualities. His enjoyment of life, his love of the delights of existence, his cult of happiness, his utter freedom of thought, his sanity and comprehensiveness, his vast humour, his wide sympathy, his large manner, his ease, his self-poise—all these qualities are recognised and rejoiced in. For Professor Raleigh is no monastic devotee. Of yore he made a challenge that "no one who is not capable of great happiness can be a highly moral being," and he still adheres to it.

He justifies his "high priest of Baal." "It need not be said that Shakespeare was a whole-hearted lover of pleasure, in himself and in others. His enormous zest in life makes his earlier comedies a paradise of delight. The love of pleasure, if it be generous and sensitive, and quick to catch reflections, is hardly distinguishable from wisdom and tact."

As examples of the happy, homely, wholesome style of the book I will cite a few random passages:—

"No book, except the Bible, has been so misread, so misapplied. His poetry has been cut into minute indigestible fragments, and used like wedding cake, not to eat, but to dream upon."

"The appreciation of Shakespeare has become a kind of auction, where the highest bidder, however extravagant, carries off the prize."

And, in refutation of the plea that a dramatist conceals himself in his works, he pithily answers:—

"No man can walk abroad save on his own shadow."

"Everyone was more himself for being in the company of Shakespeare."

"Shakespeare by revealing his whole mind to us, has given us just cause to complain that his mind is not small enough to be comprehended with ease."

"His dialogue is level with life."

But why multiply instances from a book which everyone who reads at all will read for himself?

SHORT NOTICE.

Thoughts on Silence, by Jessie Coombs. These meditations are evidently the work of a devout mind. The author holds that "publicity, haste, restlessness are endangering our individuality and the sanctities of our home life," and she reminds us of the things that belong to our peace. There is much in the volume that may be appreciated by those who cannot accept its orthodox theology. Copious quotations from Carlyle, Emerson, and others enforce and illustrate the lesson of silence. (Elliot Stock, 1s. 6d.)

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION IN PROVIDED SCHOOLS.

THE COWPER-TEMPLE CLAUSE.

SIR,—A matter of serious moment has arisen in connection with the scheme for religious instruction just adopted by the Preston Town Council. As it is of national importance I ask you to insert this letter and one from the President of the Board of Education, copy enclosed.

The scheme is the most unwieldy one in the country; the most doctrinal and dogmatic. A series of prayers from the Book of Common Prayer is included in it, and alphabets of texts are set out to be learned off by heart by, and explained word for word to, all the scholars.

It would take up too much of your space to examine these texts in detail, but many of them have been selected, and in several cases without any regard for context, for purely doctrinal purposes.

In the "Course of Lessons" for infants, one section is "The Fall—The promise of a Saviour," the birth of Jesus is to be used for teaching the doctrine of the Atonement; and "Jesus in the Temple—The Bible God's Book" has to carry the lesson "His loving obedience to His mother Mary, and to Joseph the Carpenter"; the miracles are to be taught as proving that "Jesus shows Himself to be God by His works"; and the crossing of the Red Sea proves the power and goodness of God.

For older children, each standard has a set of thirty verses to learn, and each set is introduced with John v. 39, clearly for the purpose of providing an illustration by Jesus of the applicability of each succeeding text (O. & N.T.) to himself. Texts that are highly controversial, such as Phil. ii 5-11 are to be learned off by heart, "with intelligence."

In the detailed course of lessons for Standard I. the Birth stories of Matthew and Luke are to be taught in their entirety, as well as the endings of each Gospel. In Standard III., under the heading "Institution of the Lord's Supper," everything in Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, and the Corinthians was to be taught that bears on it.

The doctrinal character of this course develops as it passes through the standards. This section alone covers 16 pages of foolscap, and its main object is to teach the supernatural, miraculous, and dogmatic elements of the New Testament. The "Grace after meat" is:—

"We thank thee, Lord, for this our food,
But most of all for Jesus' Blood."
And, finally, the Apostles' Creed is to be taught to every standard.

I immediately protested against this scheme, and am working with a committee of the Free Church Council to try to get it withdrawn; but I fear in vain.

Apart, however, from the children, there is the most serious question of the teachers. They are unprotected; the very clause that no teacher shall be excused from teaching save on conscientious grounds, is turned into an implement of oppression by the words "which should be specially laid before the School Managers." I do not wish to take up your space unduly. I simply say that here at least, with this syllabus in force, no head teacher could be a Unitarian, and if a class teacher is a Unitarian, the sooner he finds another situation the better; promotion is impossible.

I enclose you copy of Mr. McKenna's reply to my letter. If the law is as he states, the Board of Education has no powers to interfere whatsoever is taught, the only remedy lies in an action on the part of an aggrieved individual. For all practical purposes the Cowper-Temple clause is a dead letter.

Yours faithfully,

CHAS. TRAVERS.

[COPY.]

Board of Education,
Whitehall, London, S.W.

April 16, 1907.

DEAR SIR,—I am desired by Mr. McKenna to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 9th inst., and to say in reply that he understands your objections to the Syllabus of Religious Instruction put forward by the Preston Local Education Authority for use on the Council schools to be based on two grounds (1) that certain parts of the Syllabus are a violation of the Cowper-Temple Clause, and are, therefore, illegal; and (2) that apart from the strictly legal question, the Syllabus is unsuitable for the use of the children, both as being excessively denominational and dogmatic, and as including teaching which would not be acceptable to parents of the children who do not belong to the Church of England.

With regard to the first point, I am to point out that the prohibition imposed by the Cowper-Temple Clause (Section 14 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870) is extremely narrow, and extends only to religious catechisms and formularies distinctive of any particular denomination. Some years ago, for example, the Law officers of the Crown advised that the teaching of the Apostles' Creed was not an infringement of that Section. But in any case, if the Act has been infringed, the remedy does not, in view of the repeal of Section 16 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, rest with the Board of Education but with a Court of Law, and the right course for the objectors to adopt would be to apply to the High Court for a mandamus against the Borough Council, a course which Mr. McKenna does not, however, recommend them to adopt.

With regard to your second point, Mr. McKenna desires me to remind you that no grant is paid by the Board of Education for religious instruction. Such instruction is not inspected by the Board's officers and the religious syllabus is not subject to the Board's approval. Whatever opinions, therefore, he may personally hold as to the suitability or otherwise of the Syllabus proposed or adopted by the Local Education Authority, he would be powerless to interfere.—I am,

Yours faithfully,

J. E. P. MURRAY.

Rev. Charles Travers,
Unitarian Chapel, Preston.

We were unable to publish the above letters last week, and now have this further note from Mr. Travers :—

SIR,—Adverting to my letter which you are publishing this week, I shall be glad if you will allow me to add to it, that in a letter from Mr. McKenna, of April 25, it is stated that Sec. 16 of the Act of 1902, does not enable the Board of Education to take action; and he corrects his letter to me by stating that the objectors to a violation of the Cowper-Temple Clause should proceed by Injunction or Writ of Quo Warranto.

Re-stating the situation it is this :

The Cowper-Temple Clause remains in the Act of 1870.

Section 16 of Act of 1870, which allowed the Board of Education to intervene if Cowper-Temple Clause is violated, is repealed.

Section 16 of Act of 1902 does not take its place. If the Section is violated the Board of Education can do nothing.

A private individual must take the matter up at great expense. Which means that the Cowper-Temple Clause is as dead as Queen Anne.

FERDINANDO BRACCIFORTI.

MANY of our readers will remember the presence at our International Meetings in London, in the Spring of 1901, of Signor Bracciforti, of Milan, and his ardent address on that occasion, breathing undying faith in the progress and unity of his country, grounded on his faith in God. In earlier years also he had been present at our anniversary meetings, always eager in the cause of liberal religion, and he was one of the honoured foreign correspondents of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

The news of his death at Milan on Saturday last, April 20, will waken old memories of loyal companionship in the good cause, and much sympathy with the members of his family.

Signor Bracciforti's daughter has been good enough to send us the following translation of a notice which appeared in the Milan papers on Monday :—

"The day before yesterday died in Milan, at the age of eighty, after a long illness, Count Professor Ferdinando Bracciforti. Born at Fermo in 1827, he was in his youth a page to Maria Luisa at the Collegio dei Barnabiti, of Parma. But at the first patriotic manifestations of 1848 he enlisted as a volunteer and fought for the independence of Italy at Pastrengo and Novara. Although he had taken the degree of Doctor of Law, he preferred to the magistrate's robe the cult and study of ancient and modern languages, and more particularly that of the English language, which he taught for more than forty years in all the principal institutes of Milan. Among the valuable books written by him is 'Milhouse Bracciforti's English and Italian Dictionary,' perhaps the most complete work of the kind. Very learned in philosophical and theological sciences, he published for several years 'the Riforma del Secolo XIX.' (The Reform of the Nineteenth Century), having as associates and friends the best known among the Italian and foreign Free Thinkers. Modest and charitable to the last degree he spent his disinterested life for the relief of the weak and unhappy, personifying the Christian and Humanitarian Ideal, of which he was an indefatigable apostle. He was a most exemplary father, and much loved by his family and friends."

On the day after Signor Bracciforti's death his family received the following message from the Editor of the Lega Lombarda, one of the most clerical of Italian papers :—

"Emilio Zansi, Editor of the Lega Lombarda, shares in the mourning of the Family Bracciforti with most sincere sorrow. The moral figure of the lamented Count Ferdinando that he knew in two memorable Christian meetings of the Lega, will always remain in his memory and heart among the most venerable. Tomorrow morning, if his professional duties allow him, he will follow the funeral of the incomparable man, who, having finished the laborious and charitable days of his worldly career, has entered the joy of his Lord."

Signor Bracciforti was keenly interested in the diffusion of liberal religious literature, and in addition to the work on his paper, translated some of the best of our Unitarian tracts into Italian. We may recall now his active interest in the presentation of the works of Channing and Martineau to the Queen of Italy twenty-one years ago, the gifts of the late Miss Durning-Smith; and also a letter which he received from Dr. Martineau in May, 1895, acknowledging a greeting he had sent for the 90th birthday of his venerated friend.

Dr. Martineau, in thanking Signor Bracciforti for his remembrance, wrote :—"It is a privilege most cheering to my heart to be thus recognised by one who has shown such consistent loyalty to truth, and never shrunk from sacrifices for conscience sake. Such are the men whom I love and honour." And having referred with gratitude to the messages of recognition of his own work which he was receiving, Dr. Martineau added : "Much harder has been your task, involving so large a clearance of obstructive and consolidated superstition before reaching the pure central Divine truths, which need only development and application. In spite of some threatenings of reaction in the sacerdotal direction, I am persuaded that the old ecclesiastical creeds are paralysed, and have lost their hold of the modern European mind, and that the drift of the living piety of our coming time is towards the simple spiritual religion of Jesus Christ, which we are endeavouring to set free from its clinging adhesions of misconception and perversion. Let us, then, bid our successors to be of good cheer, and persist in the testimony which we have not withheld, but which will soon be silenced in us. I remain, to the end, gratefully and affectionately yours, JAMES MARTINEAU."

If now we lay a tribute of respect on the grave of our friend in Milan, we feel sure that he would like best that it should conclude with the benediction of those words.

THE MINISTERIAL FELLOWSHIP.

THE eighth annual meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Thursday afternoon, April 25, The Rev. Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter, president, in the chair. Twenty-three new members were elected, making the total number on the roll 154. Resolutions were passed deploring the deaths of Revs. R. C. Moore, T. Leyland, and F. W. Stanley, and sympathising with Revs. E. W. Lummis, S. H. Street, and G. Knight, in being laid aside for awhile from active work by illness. The annual report, financial statement, and report of Settlements Bureau, were presented and adopted. The report showed that two members had been in receipt of benefit during the year, and two grants had been made from the Auxiliary Fund. Five further grants were recommended to the meeting and approved. The accounts showed that during the year a substantial addition of £65 14s. 1d. had been made to the funds.

The Settlements Bureau report showed that 56 congregations and 43 ministers had availed themselves of its machinery since the scheme was put into operation in 1904. There were now 14 congregations and 20 ministers on the list. Remonstrance had been made in certain cases against public advertisement by a congregation for a minister. A few slight alterations were made in the rules, by which the Settlements Secretary becomes ex-officio a member of Committee, and it is made possible for the annual meeting to be held next year in the Unitarian Home Missionary College, and Missionary Conference week. The Rev. Charles Roper was elected president. The treasurer (Rev. Dendy Agate), secretary (Rev. C. J. Street), and settlements secretary (Rev. J. Crowther Hirst) were re-elected; Revs. John Ellis, W. L. Schroeder, and H. Bodell Smith were elected to fill vacancies on the Committee; and Rev. W. R. Shanks and Mr. A. E. Piggott, F.S.S.A. were re-elected as auditors.

The Committee were requested to arrange for an autumnal or winter meeting of the fellowship in London. The National Conference Committee's circular, re Advisory Committees and Ministerial Settlements, was then considered, and the following recommendations submitted by the fellowship committee were approved and adopted :—

"Ministerial Settlements.—The work of bringing ministers and congregations into touch with each other must be done by one man. This official should act under the direction of a board of ministers appointed by ministers. The work should be undertaken only as a means of communication; the parties should be referred to advisory committees if they wish for advice, but the Board might well work in conjunction with such committees."

"Advisory Committees.—These should be five in number, viz. : One each for the North of England, the South of England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland. They should be appointed by the District Associations within their particular area, and work in connection with each other on similar lines. They should have regard to the educational fitness of persons desiring to enter the Ministry, and who seek their recognition, and should, as a general rule, expect a period of probation either at one of our colleges or in actual ministerial work. They should warn congregations of the risk they run in appointing ministers who are not in recognised standing. If requested by both parties, they should arbitrate in cases of difficulty in congregations or between ministers and congregations. When requested by a minister to advise on his continued fitness to remain in the ministry, they should do so. They should not inquire into any other questions than those of character, and educational and personal fitness. They should, if requested, give advice to ministers or congregations about settlements. And to do all this work effectively, the advisory committees should be constituted of both ministers and laymen."

It was also resolved that, pending a solution of the questions about advisory committees, the committee be authorised to send a representative to confer with any congregation or minister that presses for advice, and is prepared to meet the necessary expense. The question of instituting a supply Bureau, or blending it with the Settlements Bureau, was referred to the Committee for consideration, with power to take any action they thought desirable or practicable.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

No doubt you have heard of Sir John Franklin, who in 1819 first went on an exploring expedition to the Polar Seas, from Hudson's Bay; and how he believed that there might be found a way round the north coast of America, and out into the Pacific Ocean. The accounts of his voyages and adventures have entranced and thrilled many a boy and girl, and when you have a chance you should read about them. Very little in his day was known about such travels, and the provision made for those who undertook them was far less complete and good than it is now. They had terrible privations and sufferings to endure, but in spite of all this Franklin went three times on these exploring expeditions, the last being in 1845; but he never got through the North-West Passage, and from the last journey none of the party ever returned. His wife, Lady Franklin, sent out a search party under Captain McClintock in the little ship the "Fox"; and they learnt beyond the possibility of doubt that Franklin and all his party had perished in the icy regions of cold, hunger, sickness, and privations—not one living to return and tell the sad story, the North-West Passage being still untraversed and undiscovered.

A few weeks ago I went to hear an account given by a Norwegian explorer, Captain Amundsen, who had lately returned from the same journey, to try if he could get through the same icy seas to the Pacific. He had been for a long time preparing himself for it, for he intended to take observations in many scientific subjects, partly about magnetism and the magnetic pole to which the needle of every compass points; partly about geography, in order to make correct maps of the coast and islands still unknown. He carefully studied all these subjects beforehand, and then he collected all the scientific instruments that he would need. He also went a journey to the Arctic regions, for hunting, so as to prepare himself to endure cold and hardships: and then, last of all, he got a little ship built in the Hardanger Fjord in Norway, which he called the "Gjøa." She was a very little ship, only twenty feet wide, and drawing very little water; with a little petroleum motor engine to help her along in calm weather. Amundsen then carefully chose his men, each one able to do his own part in scientific exploration, in working the vessel, in managing the dogs and sledges needed for journeys across the ice, in cooking, in photographing, or to be doctor and surgeon in illness or accidents. At last all was ready, and at midnight on June 16, 1903, the little "Gjøa" set out from Christiania Fjord. There is no night in Norway at that time of the year, so though it was midnight it would be daylight still. They did not know how long it might be before they saw their home and friends again; but their hopes were high that they might succeed in their attempt, and bring home a great deal of new knowledge; so they were in good spirits, and happy to be off.

They were more than three weeks in crossing the Atlantic before they came in sight of the first ice on July 9, near Cape Farewell, the southernmost point of Greenland. They followed the Greenland coast for a very long distance; then crossed Baffin Bay into Lancaster Sound, to Beechy Island, where they stayed two days to take observations and decide where to go next. On August 24 they left Beechy Island and steered for Peel Sound, which they entered in a dense fog which hid everything; but presently it cleared enough for them to go on, and on August 28 they safely passed the place where a former explorer had been stopped by impenetrable ice. The same day they passed the entrance of Bellot Strait, where McClintock in his search for Franklin tried in vain to get through. Then they passed along the coast of Boothia Felix, where they had some very hard times. There were quantities of ice and snow all round, but their stout little vessel managed to get through; but sometimes the water was very shallow and they got aground, and there was constant fog, so that they could not see their way, and the pitch dark nights were very trying. On August 31 they ran aground, but got safely off, and anchored by a low island to wait for daylight. Everyone had gone below, and Amundsen had got out his log-book to enter the day's doings, when there was a cry of "Fire!" Instantly there flashed into his mind all that that meant to them all. A little ship with 7,000 gallons of petroleum on board, and a lot of gunpowder, and the hull saturated with tar! Unless they could quickly conquer the fire a terrific explosion would follow, and the ship, with all their provisions, instruments, and all belonging would perish, and if they survived they would be left without any means of getting away, to die of starvation and cold! An awful prospect! Everyone was on deck instantly; there was an enormous column of fire rising out through the engine-room skylight: some cotton waste soaked with petroleum had caught fire. Wük, the engine man, stuck bravely to his post, doing all he could to put out the fire. Somehow they did manage to subdue it and then put it out, and they were all saved.

After some delay they got off, and after fighting their way amongst shoals and rocks for ten days, dropped anchor on September 9 at the head of Peterson Bay in King William Land, naming their harbour Gjøahaven, after their ship. They hauled up their vessel close to the shore, and arranged everything for staying the winter there. They built themselves huts of snow and covered them with the ship's sails; and built an observatory where they placed their instruments and took observations. This was their home for two whole winters, during which they employed themselves in many ways; drawn by their dogs they made sledge journeys for exploring, and for hunting bears, seals, &c., and so increased their stock of food, and fed up their dogs. They also made friends with the Eskimo people, and though at first it was almost impossible to communicate with them, as neither party knew the language of the other, they got by degrees to understand each other better; and at Christmas-time the ship party shared their festival with their new friends. We saw their photographs, life-size, in lantern slides; they were dressed entirely in skins, so that only their faces could be seen, and so were the little children, too.

In April two of the party took a sledge journey to explore and map the coast of Victoria Land, finding that what had always been supposed to be one piece of land was a group of over a hundred small islands.

On June 1 the party began to prepare to leave their winter quarters, taking down their observatory, where Wük had kept the observations going on day and night for 19 months; and on August 13 they started westwards in the "Gjøa," on and on in the North-West Passage. On August 28 they saw a sailing ship—a wonderful sight to them after those lonely years!

On September 3, however, they got into ice again at King's Point, and soon after that they were held fast by the ice, and obliged to stay out their third winter.

But all went well with them till the end of March, and then Wük was taken ill and died. It seemed hard for him to die just as they were within reach of getting out of the ice, and home again. We saw a photograph of his snowy grave, with a little cross of sticks over it. But it was July before they really got out of the ice; and at last the brave little "Gjøa" and her company turned southward and steered through Bering Strait into the Pacific Ocean making for San Francisco. Their voyage had succeeded, and they had got through the North-West Passage. They had achieved what Franklin believed in as possible, and what he had given his life, with all his companions, in trying to accomplish. Surely his generous spirit must have gloried in the triumph of his successors!

CREED REVISION IN SCOTLAND.

DR. JOHN HUNTER contributed to the Glasgow Herald of Saturday, April 20, the final article in the remarkable series on "Creed Revision in Scotland," which has been appearing from week to week in the Saturday issues, by men of eminence both in the Established and the United Free Church. There are seventeen articles in the series, which was preceded by an introductory article in the Herald of Saturday, December 22, by Dr. JAMES MOFFATT, this year's JOWETT lecturer, and author of "The Historical New Testament." Dr. MOFFATT referred to the impulse given to this discussion by some letters which appeared in the Glasgow Herald in August, 1904, from Mr. J. S. TEMPLETON, a Glasgow carpet manufacturer, and by the book which he published last year, "A Layman's Mind on Creed and Church" (Macmillan, 3s. 6d. net), in which he speaks very frankly of the Westminster Confession, and demands its abrogation by the churches, and at the same time offers a tentative creed of his own, in the language of present-day religious experience.

Dr. MOFFATT himself urged that creed revision must be the common concern of the Established and the United Free Churches, and not as a professional question affecting ministers alone, but a vital concern of the people as a whole. "Creed revision," he urged, "must be shown to be a symptom of faith's vitality, not of its sickness. It is not that the churches have outlived the Gospel, but that the Gospel has outlived the creed."

"Whether the Westminster Confession should be revised, or an entirely new and short creed drawn up, is an open question. At bottom there is only one creed for a Christian Church, 'I believe in the LORD JESUS CHRIST,' or 'I believe in GOD the FATHER through JESUS CHRIST our LORD.' All other creeds are merely expansions or adaptations of this drawn out to answer misrepresentations and misconceptions, and to meet the needs of particular churches and particular crises."

All the writers in the series are agreed that the Westminster Confession, as a statement of religious faith, belongs entirely to a past age; their differences of opinion are, as to whether the churches are capable of any adequate restatement, or whether the time has come for making the attempt, or whether a creed is required at all.

We quoted on February 23, one strong plea for the abandonment of any formal creed, and in the twelfth article in the series (March 16) the Rev. DAVID GRAHAM, of St. Gilbert's, Pollokshields, wrote:—

"My conviction is, that, to promote a true union of souls, we must substitute for the doctrinal test of church membership, which at present obtains, the ethical test which Jesus Christ made conspicuous use of. 'Not every one that saith unto Me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the Kingdom of Heaven, but he that doeth the will of My Father which is in Heaven.' In our effort to revise the creed and reform the church we dare not ignore the circumstance that, hitherto, theological controversy, directed chiefly to peddling side-issues, has been fruitful, principally in strife, division, hatred, and persecution. My view is, that in the reconstructed creed we must place in the foreground the practical, moral, and social issues of church life and work, and leave the metaphysical side of Christianity an open question, on which every member should be free to speculate. In the reconstructed church, there must be room for the full and free exercise of scholarship. Speculation must be unfettered; provision must be made for progressiveness in life and thought. 'A false religion,' as Lord Acton declared, 'fears the progress of all truth; a true religion seeks and recognises truth wherever it can be found.' Let us forget the things that are behind, and reach forward to the fuller and freer life that is to be."

Dr. HUNTER, in his final article, says that in the interests of truth and veracity, and of the Church and its best influence, it is to be hoped that the present movement for the revision of the creed may lead to some large and liberal result. The issue is distinctly between a formal and a spiritual Christianity. The articles in the Glasgow Herald have shown that the Westminster Confession "has no longer any vital hold upon a large number of those who nominally accept it and subscribe to it. It does not represent their attitude to things, and does not tell their real beliefs. It is held provisionally or for ecclesiastical purposes, not for personal use or reliance." We live now in a new world, and knowledge demands a reconstruction of doctrine in accordance with truth. It is no longer the Fall, but the Rise of man which history teaches, and the certainties in which we rest are not metaphysical speculations, but things of the spirit, "which are capable of spiritual verification, which appeal directly to the heart of faith, and require no other witness than that of the inner light."

It is not only intellectual growth, but a deepening of moral perceptions, which calls for a revision of the creeds, and also a closer spiritual apprehension of JESUS himself.

"The Church has also grown in grace and in the knowledge of its Lord and Saviour. It has rediscovered the secret of Jesus—the large and mighty trust in God as eternal and invincible goodness which he quickened in the consciousness of mankind. The reaffirmation of the universal Fatherhood of God in modern days has led to a renaissance of faith which is slowly reforming the theology of Christendom. We see God in Christ and know God by Christ as never before, and this Divine knowledge is making all things new. There is surely hope in the common assertion that the teaching of the Churches is everywhere now tending to become Christocentric. This can only mean—nothing more and nothing less—than that Christ himself, his mind and spirit, must be the final authority by which the question of the creed will have to be decided; that the coming Christianity will be on the lines of the personal message of Jesus Christ—the proper form of a truly Christian theology. Now, it has been often admitted that the Confession of Faith rests more on Paulinism and its scheme of redemption than on the simple religion of Jesus. Christendom may have borrowed more of St. Paul's phrases than his thought, and may never have done full justice to his universalism and his conception of Christianity as a religion of the spirit; but the late Bishop Ewing revealed the thoughts of many hearts when he confessed his inability to trace in the artificial theology of the Epistles anything like a natural outcome from the teaching of Jesus in the Gospels. Terms like propitiation, predestination, justification, and sanctification make us feel that our religion has already left, and long left, its native Galilee. Still less can it be said of the theologians of later times that they continued and enlarged the main teaching of the Gospels.

"The Church of the future will have to make its choice between what the late Dr. A. B. Bruce was accustomed to call the Christianity of Christ and the Christianity of the creeds. What Cardinal Newman described as the doctrine of development in religion may be frankly admitted, but the ecclesiastical and theological developments of our religion have seldom been normal, and have often failed to preserve the original ideas. The cry 'Back to Christ,' properly understood, is not a cry of retrogression. It is the symbol of a going back which is in reality a going forward. The religion of Jesus is still an unexhausted and unrealised ideal. . . . The historic Gospel is spiritual and timeless. The mind of Christ is the revelation of the mind of the Everlasting, and his words the words of Eternal Life."

So Dr. HUNTER affirms that "the mind of CHRIST" must be the only creed of the Church. "CHRIST was, and is, essential Christianity—its sufficient creed." "The great cohesive power is loyalty to JESUS CHRIST—to his revelation of GOD and man and duty."

"It is Christ we are called to confess—his pure and simple way of faith and life, and not the doctrines and traditions of men. Even the Apostles' creed, though hallowed by ages of pious use and open to appropriation, is not sufficient. It both says too much and too little. The Beatitudes express more of the moral and spiritual content of the religion of Jesus. If it be necessary for the practical purposes of Christian fellowship and worship to have a common confession of faith, then it ought to be a confession only of those truths which relate to the very spirit and essence of Christianity, and which most directly appeal to life and experience."

Thus it is clear that the Church of to-day demands a new creed. No mere alteration in the terms of subscription will suffice. A creed truly and simply Christian, says Dr. HUNTER, has been a long-felt want, and the time is more than ripe for change.

"A new theology—no hasty, unripe, unmellowed product—has been slowly growing in our midst these many years. Prophets, thinkers, and saints like Edward Irving, Thomas Erskine, Macleod Campbell, C. J. Scott, Alexander Ewing, Robert Lee, Norman Macleod, John Tulloch, Principal Caird, Robertson Smith, A. B. Bruce, have contributed to its development, and their influence keeps it thoroughly and profoundly Christian. It is the real though unwritten creed of the best and most thoughtful of the clergy and laity. It is the new thoughts of God and Christ and man, of life and the hereafter which find expression in the sermons which are preached from hundreds of pulpits in Scotland every Sunday, and not the thoughts which the confessional fathers cast into a set of rigid forms from which it was expected that no future age could possibly escape. It is not good, however, that there should be this wide and ever-widening gulf between the living faith of the Church and its traditional creed. It is not good that its ministers should have to keep up a pretence of believing in formularies which do not have their innermost assent, and from which the reality has departed. The Church which has not full freedom to lead in the paths of Christian progress has abdicated its most sacred function as a spiritual teacher and guide. Liberty of prophesying is an essential Christian institution, and the real and whole power of the pulpit lies in its veracity and earnestness. Temporalities—secular, social, and ecclesiastical advantages—are dearly held, if the holding of them means the bondage and restraint of the ministry, the Church, and the Gospel."

In this final article of Dr. HUNTER'S—as, indeed, in the whole series—there is a great appeal. Whether the time is actually ripe, and the Churches of Scotland will now find the open way and dare to enter into the freedom wherewith CHRIST has made his followers free, we shall watch, with a deep and sympathetic interest, to see.

CHRIST came to bring man's spirit into immediate contact with God's Spirit; to sweep away everything intermediate. In lonely union, face to face, man's spirit and God's Spirit must come together. It is a grand thought. Aspire to this! Aspire to greatness, goodness! So let your spirit mingle with the Spirit of the Everlasting.—F. W. Robertson.

THE RELIGION OF UNITARIANS.

WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING.

1780-1842.

"By the Divine right of sanctity and virtue he was as a master among us. He did not impose upon us his faith, but he awakened and revealed our own." So Dr. Martineau wrote of Channing at the time of his death. And no less emphatically, at the Centenary meeting in Liverpool, Mr. Thom acknowledged his debt to Channing. Speaking of the first impact of his writings on this side of the Atlantic, early in the century, Mr. Thom said: "I remember it. I remember a sense as of being new-born. . . . Others had taught me much; no one before had unsealed the fountain in myself. He was the first to touch the spring of living water, which made me independent even of himself."

"What did Channing do for us? He lifted Religion out of the region of controversy; . . . out of the disputable and limited letter to the self-manifesting and inexhaustible light of the glory of God shining in the face of Jesus Christ. . . . He rose from the dead word to living persons. He emancipated us from external and traditional methods, from the ceremonies of the creeds that embalmed bodies of divinity from which the life was gone, to be taught afresh by the Father of Spirits, and by his living Word."

And at the conclusion of that memorable address Mr. Thom said that if those were to be his last words to the younger minds among his hearers, he was content that they should be these: "That, next to the New Testament, of all the writings I know, I think the writings of Channing are most likely to keep them in the line of spiritual advancement, humble, progressive, free, open to every light that comes from God, constrained by love to be of Christ's spirit towards the least of his brethren."

How Channing regarded his own teaching he told in the following passage of a letter written from Boston in April, 1837:—

"I feel that among Liberal Christians the preaching has been too vague, has wanted unity, has scattered attention too much. In my own labours there has been more unity, perhaps in consequence of the strong hold which one sublime idea has taken of my mind. This is the greatness of the soul, its divinity, its union with God—not by passive dependence, but by spiritual likeness—its receptiveness of his spirit, its self-forming power, its destination to ineffable glory, its immortality. This great view binds together all other truth. I think of God as the Father and Inspirer of the soul; of Christ as its redeemer and model; of Christianity as given to enlighten, perfect, and glorify it; of the universe as its school, nutriment, teacher; of all outward beauty as its emblem; of life as appointed for its discipline, and death for its passage to a higher being; of heaven as its perfection; of hell as its ruin. I understand the love which passeth knowledge, when I consider that God looks, as none other can do, into the soul, and comprehends its greatness, perils, and destiny. Love to God seems to me to be founded not on His outward benefits, but in regard to Him as the Father of the spirit, present to it, dwelling in it, calling it by conscience and by His providence to perfection, to Himself. Love to man has no foundation but in the comprehension of his spiritual nature, and of his spiritual connection with God. To awaken men to what is within them, to help them to understand the infinite treasure of their own souls—such seems to me the object which is ever to be kept in sight."

Similarly, in the "Introductory Remarks" to his collected works, Channing gave an admirable summary of his teaching. One of the finest statements of his doctrine of God as the Father of all living souls, ever present with His children, is in the following passages from the sermon on "Christian Worship," preached at the dedication of the Newport Church on Rhode Island, July 27, 1836:—

"He pervades, penetrates our souls. All other beings, our nearest friends, are far from us, foreign to us, strangers compared with God. Others hold intercourse with us through the body. He is in immediate contact with our souls. We do not discern Him because He is too near, too inward, too deep to be recognised by our present imperfect consciousness. And He is thus near, not only to discern, but to act, to influence, to give His spirit, to communicate to us divinity. This is the great paternal gift of God.

* * * * *

"In regard to the spiritual influence by which God brings the created spirit into conformity to His own, I would that I could speak worthily. It is gentle, that it may not interfere with our freedom. It sustains, mingles with, and moves all our faculties. It acts through nature, providence, revelation, society, and experience; and the Scriptures, confirmed by reason and the testimonies of the wisest and best men, teach us that it acts still more directly. God, being immediately present to the soul, holds immediate communion with it, in proportion as it prepares itself to receive and to use aright the heavenly inspiration. He opens the inward eye to Himself, communicates secret monitions of duty, revives and freshens our convictions of truth, builds up our faith in human immortality, unseals the deep, unfathomed fountains of Love within us, instils strength, peace, and comfort, and gives victory over pain, sin, and death. This influence of God, exerted on the soul to conform it to Himself, to make it worthy of its divine parentage, this it is which most clearly manifests what is meant by His being our Father. . . . We must have faith in the human soul as receptive of the divinity, as made for greatness, for spiritual elevation, for likeness to God, or God's character as a Father will be to us as an unrevealed mystery."

And again, in the sermon on "The Father's Love for Persons," in the volume on "The Perfect Life," we read:—

"Moment by moment the living God sustains us; and His own life continually flows into us through His omnipotent goodwill. Moment by moment He intends and does us good; and no blessing comes to us without His immediate loving purpose.

* * * * *

"Intimate and tender, beyond our highest conception, is our Heavenly Father's relationship to us! He is incessantly our creator and renewer, our upholder and benefactor, our witness and judge. The connection of all other beings with us, when compared with this, is foreign and remote. The nearest friend, the most loving parent, is but a stranger to us, when contrasted with God. No words can adequately express this living alliance of the Creator with His creatures. Our bodies are less closely united with our minds, than is God with our inmost self. For the body may be severed from the soul without working its destruction. But were God to forsake this thinking principle, it would instantly perish. How near to me is my Creator! I am not merely surrounded by his influence, as by this air which I breathe. I am pervaded by his agency. He quickens my whole being. Through Him am I this instant thinking, feeling, and speaking. And knowing thus the intensity and the extent of this relationship, how is it possible that I can forget Him!

* * * *

"The light of life is a constant consciousness of Divine fellowship. But we should not expect a sudden manifestation of the Infinite One to our souls. Gradually we must attain to this serene trust in God's all-protecting care, incessant mercy, and inspiring influence. The blessing will not be less real, because it comes upon us gently, according to our spiritual progress. There is no rest for our souls except in this ever-growing communion with the All-perfect One."

This is how the doctrine of Divine Immanence appeared to Channing, and for further examples of his teaching, full of the vivid sense of our constant dependence upon God for all that we possess, and all that we are as spiritual beings, we may refer to that other sermon on "Life, a Divine Gift," which is also in the "Perfect Life" volume. Of this our readers are aware that a popular sixpenny edition has now been issued by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

The well-known sermons on "The Imitableness of Christ's Character," on "Love to Christ," and on "Unitarian Christianity most favourable to Piety," and the famous Baltimore address on "Unitarian Christianity," amply illustrate the exalted conception Channing had of the mission and character of Jesus. The question of his special rank among spiritual beings, all "of one Family" and all alike dependent on the one Eternal Father, as also the question of the gospel miracles, is of secondary importance for religion; the vital question is of character, of moral and spiritual power, for the enlightenment and inspiration of men.

On this, we may quote again from "The Perfect Life," a few sentences from the Christmas sermon on "Jesus Christ—Brother, Friend, Saviour."

"Jesus, by his birth, was truly a human being, and in this we should rejoice. . . . Thus he was one of us. He was a man. I see in him a brother and a friend. I feel the reality of that large, loving, human sympathy, which so gloriously distinguished his whole character and life.

"To regenerate and exalt human souls was Christ's ultimate end. And by what means could he more effectually have ministered to this end, than by manifesting, as he did, his own excellence, disinterestedness, and divine love? This seems to me more and more to be the great good which we derive from the birth of Jesus. His inmost spirit was thus laid open to us. Nothing has wrought so powerfully on the human soul, as the mind and character of Jesus Christ. Among all means of civilisation and improvement, I can find nothing to be compared in energy with this. The great impulse which is to carry forward the human race, is the character of Jesus, understood ever more clearly, and ever more deeply felt. And consequently I rejoice in his human and humble birth, because by this his character was brought out. Thus was he revealed as the express image of divine perfection."

The passion for social progress and moral reform was a vital part of Channing's religion. His last public utterance was the Lennox address on the Anniversary of Emancipation in the British West Indies, and these were his closing words:—

"Mighty powers are at work in the world. Who can stay them? God's word has gone forth, and it cannot return to Him void. A new comprehension of the Christian spirit,—a new reverence for humanity, a new feeling of brotherhood, and of all men's relation to the common Father—this is among the signs of our times. We see it; do we not feel it? Before this all oppressions are to fall. Society, silently pervaded by this, is to change its aspect of universal warfare for peace. The power of selfishness, all-grasping and seemingly invincible, is to yield to this divine energy. The song of angels, 'on earth peace,' will not always sound as fiction. O come, thou kingdom of Heaven, for which we daily pray! Come, Friend and Saviour of the race, who didst shed thy blood on the cross to reconcile man to man, and earth to Heaven! Come, ye predicted ages of righteousness and love, for which the faithful have so long yearned! Come, Father Almighty, and crown with thine omnipotence the humble strivings of thy children to subvert oppression and wrong, to spread light and freedom, peace and joy, the truth and spirit of thy Son, through the whole earth!"

EXPERIMENTS IN SOCIALISM.—II.

BROOK FARM.

THE main justification for including the famous Brook Farm enterprise among socialistic experiments is that the critics and opponents of socialism so generally number it among the failures of the system, and in this light of failure it has attracted more attention than almost any other scheme of the kind, chiefly because of the high and interesting character of many of those concerned in it. It really was not socialistic in any fair sense of the word. It was an experiment in altruistic living, based on ordinary joint-stock principle, so far as it could be said to be based on any principle at all.

The idea of it appears to have originated with Dr. Channing at a time when social problems were being very eagerly discussed, both in Europe and America. Saint-Simon, Fourier, Owen, and a good many others had been trying to inaugurate the golden age. Channing had been greatly fascinated by some of the visions that the dreamers of the time had been conjuring up, and was conscious that in some of them, at least, there was much that harmonised most completely with his own Christian teaching. "I have," he wrote to a friend in 1841, "for a long time dreamed of an association in which members, instead of preying on one another, and seeking to put one another down, after the fashion of this world, should live together as brothers, seeking one another's elevation and spiritual growth." That was the general idea of the Brook Farm project, and for the first of the two periods into which the enterprise must be divided it was the idea which dominated everything. It was primarily a religious and educational movement, the social organisation being apparently quite a secondary consideration. Channing and a large circle of cultured and intellectual friends in Boston talked the matter over for a long time, and the more they talked the more enthusiastic some of them became. Emerson, Alcott, Margaret Fuller, Charles Dana, George Ripley, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Charles Whitmore, and a great many other leaders of Boston thought became deeply interested in the discussion of which Channing was the prime mover. Ripley, stimulated and encouraged by the enthusiasm of his brilliant young wife, was the man who finally took the practical lead. He was an advanced religious thinker and teacher, and for fifteen years had been the minister of a Unitarian congregation of an early type, unable to keep up with him in his mental and religious evolution. He and his wife felt strongly that a practical experiment in the actual living of the higher life would be the logical completion of his pulpit teaching, and when all was over, when failure was complete, and the altruists were scattered to the four winds, it was the universal testimony that Mr. and Mrs. Ripley had to the last led the enterprise with splendid pluck and spirit. When it was all over, however, and in penury and dejection—money, and even their books, all gone—they had to begin the battle of life over again, the poor wife completely broke down, lost heart and faith, and most pitifully turned for rest and shelter to the Roman church, her stronger husband looking sorrowfully on, entirely disapproving it, but unable to prevent it, and too magnanimous and sympathetic even to blame her.

Nothing like an authoritative or complete account of this interesting experiment has been left. Somebody once asked Ripley when he was going to write it. "When I reach my years of indiscretion," he replied. But from a good deal of miscellaneous writing by those who had opportunities of knowing all about it, a pretty accurate idea of it may be formed, and it is quite easy to see that it was an experiment foredoomed to failure. Ten of the transcendental Bostonians subscribed among them 12,000 dollars, divided into four-and-twenty shares of 500 dollars each. Ripley took three shares, and pledged his library for more if necessary. His wife took two, Nathaniel Hawthorne, the novelist, took two, and Charles Dana three. They were to have 5 per cent. on their subscriptions, and on the strength of their 12,000 dollars the ten of them drew up articles of association and bought 200 acres of land, and a pleasantly situated house, with a brook running at the bottom of its garden, eight or nine miles from Boston. This was Brook Farm. They settled upon the estate, I think, with twenty members, each with some small pecuniary share in the undertaking. They were none of them rich men, none of them knew much about agriculture—though some of the most enthusiastic had for a year previously been diligently at work upon the land, by way of getting experience and demonstrating their resolution; and until some months after they took up residence no sort of social constitution was formulated. It was to be simply the Brook Farm Institute of Agriculture and Education. Nobody, it was supposed, would be likely to join them who was not anxious for culture and the higher life, and, quite irrespective of creed or social theories, it was determined that all persons who should hold one or more shares of the association stock should at least be admitted to a three months' probation. The general idea was to live in kindly brotherhood, to raise their own food, as far as possible to supply their own needs, to do their own work, and to develop a scientific school or college. It was quite a small affair. They never attained to more than about 150 in number, and they could hardly be said to be an organised society at all. They were simply an aggregation of more or less spiritually minded individuals, without any very clearly elaborated system or any very definite basis of economic principle. Individual property they recognised as sacred. Each member was to work at some physical occupation just as many hours as he pleased, choosing his own employment, and, whatever his work, he got paid a certain sum per hour, and was charged a certain sum for housing and for food at a common table. During the morning hours all sorts of manual work would be general. The men—such men as Ripley and Hawthorne, like all the rest—would go to the plough and the pitchfork, the hammer and saw; the women would go to the laundry, or housework, or cookery. In the afternoon the ploughmen would perhaps change their clothes and become teachers, and in the evening there would be pleasant intellectual intercourse, or amusements in the form of dancing, tableaux, charades, acting proverbs, or Shakespearian readings. Each member, having performed such association work as he thought proper, or necessary, he was free to employ his leisure as he chose, and, by literature or in other ways, was at liberty to make money for himself if he could. Apparently there were many who maintained business and working relations with the outside world while retaining their membership with Brook Farm as a pleasant and interesting hobby, while some of independent means were attracted to it by the educational advantages offered by its leading members and the college or university they were trying to develop. They took in pupils of all ages and all sorts, and the teaching department of the enterprise seems to have been the most successful and the most profitable. It looks to have been all very delightful, and even though it failed, a great many of those who took part in it were afterwards of opinion that it was well worth having made the experiment. They declared they had thoroughly enjoyed it, and that it had brought the golden age of harmony and universal brotherhood appreciably nearer to them.

But delightful and interesting as it was as a sort of novel educational picnic, it was a doleful failure financially, of course. It seems to have been assumed that with a society established on a high moral and spiritual level, mere material and economic affairs would be sure to come out all right. It was a profound and a fatal mistake precisely similar to that which good people are always making when they argue that what the world really wants to put it right is not social re-organisation but renovated character in individual men and women. It is a grave and mischievous statement of a partial truth. No sane person will under-estimate the value of character, of course; but the finest of characters and the highest and purest of abstract principles may, and often do, contend in vain against a vicious system of things or even the want of a right system. Morally, this Brook Farm scheme was splendidly equipped, but in this world at least the basis of all life is material, and all their fine principles were frustrated because they did not do—as socialists are always being abused for doing—they did not put bread and butter in the forefront of their social system. They were going to show the world how to live; they were to be a centre for education, and preachers were to go out from Brook Farm proclaiming a new social gospel far and wide; but it all broke down because they trusted too much to the moral elements in their scheme, and took too little heed of the material.

Their estate was picturesque and beautiful, an ideal locality for an idyllic and transcendentalist centre, but the land was light and poor, and some of it rocky and barren, and they could not get manure. They were almost fanatical in their insistence on individual liberty, and their labour was not properly organised. With all the will in the world they could not put strength enough into their tillage. They soon saw that their agriculture, with all the science they could bring to bear on it, and though they engaged an expert, was a failure, and they brought along a number of craftsmen who had applied for membership to see what they could do in the way of mechanical industry. They made shoes, and blinds and baskets and lamps, and then found they could not get orders for them. Meanwhile a curious and critical world was deeply interested in this queer colony, and in one year it is said that they had 4,000 visitors, who took up their time and helped them at the luncheon table, and, moreover, were thought among them to have introduced the smallpox.

Poor Ripley and his wife faced coming disaster with smiling faces and stout hearts, but the grim spectre of ruin was not to be diverted that way. While the Brook Farmers were slowly working their way to financial extremity, the Fourierists were making something of a boom in New York, and in March, 1845, the original scheme gave place to the Brook Farm phalanx, which ran a brief course and fizzled out with a fire which destroyed their uninsured "phalanstery," a huge wooden building on which 7,000 dollars had been spent. This, probably, only precipitated the final collapse, and the summing up of the whole matter has thus been stated—"Bad soil, manure hard to get, no water power, railway three miles off, very little local industry, insufficient capital and a still greater lack of trained skill." With such disadvantages the only thing that could possibly have insured success was the carefully adjusted organisation of scientific socialism in its fullest development. This they were almost entirely lacking, and yet the opponents of socialism are constantly including Brook Farm as among the most signal instances of socialistic failure.

THE CHURCH IN RELATION TO SOCIAL SERVICE.*

BY MR. F. TAYLOR, EDITOR OF THE "GLAMORGAN FREE PRESS," PONTYPRIDD.

THERE is a natural association of ideas in the minds of many persons between an editor and a waste paper basket. Not even an editor is safe from the insatiable maw of that all-devouring receptacle of human hopes and aspirations. Believe me, if you can, I am a liberal and steady contributor to my own waste paper basket. It is in the eternal fitness of things and I would not have it otherwise. The waste paper basket has consumed my original address on "The Church and its Relation to Social Service." To the preparation of that address much time was devoted. Then I was told, plainly but kindly, that I was expected, as far as possible, to be severely practical, to deal with concrete facts, and not to wander off into a discussion of first principles and abstractions, but bluntly to get on with the business. So at the eleventh hour, I began all over again.

In effect, I suppose, what one is expected to do, is to adopt Squeers' utilitarian methods of pedagogy. Spell window, W—i—n—d—o—w, and now go and clean it.

That method of treatment requires large assumptions. May we take it for granted that we are all of one mind, freely admitting the clamant demands of social service; all keenly alive to the cruel, naked, ugly realities of the social problems of modern industrial and urban communities, and a landless people; that we are all consumed with the white heat of a passion for social justice and righteousness, and aglow with the self-sacrificing love of human brotherhood? May we take all that for granted, and assume that we are all of one mind as to the means and methods by which one of the oldest and most powerful of human organisations—the Christian Church—can direct its manifold energies into the varied channels of useful and practical social service?

While I am most anxious to get at close quarters with practical questions of social service and the relation of the Church to them, I fear it is not safe or wise to take too much for granted. Even if we are all liberal Free Churchmen, common experience would make one very cautious in assuming that we have all escaped the human tendency to think in water-tight compartments and to divide ourselves and other folks into sheep and goats.

"My friend," said the solemn man, "have you ever done ought to make the community in which you live the better for your living in it?"

"I have done much," replied the other humbly, "to purify the homes of my fellow beings."

"Ah," continued the solemn man, with a pleased and beatific look, "You distribute tracts?"

"No," replied the humble man, "I clean carpets."

It is this broad division of all sorts and conditions of men into tract distributors and carpet sweepers, as representing two schools of thought and distinct diversities of outlook on life, that presents the initial difficulty when one is asked to deal practically with the question of the Church and its relation to social service. It would be nice to take the Church for granted and the clamant demands for social service as admitted, and get on with the business. But are we agreed on any common idea of the Church, its place and function in human society, and the need of and call to social service as a personal and communal obligation? Or must we roughly classify ourselves as tract distributors and carpet sweepers.

Must we not recognise that the majority of Churches are still in the elementary, tract-distributing stage—concerned more with precept than with practice? Is not the common idea of a Church "other worldly"? Do we regard a Church as a separate, distinct and self-centred organisation or society in the world, and yet not of it, its chief end a personal one—the salvation of the individual's immortal soul, preparing him for another world, and providing spiritual nurseries and sanatoria for the treatment of sick souls, spiritual maladies, and moral weaknesses and deformities? That is the tract distribution idea. What can we say for the humble carpet sweeper?

Have we not to take account of the revolution in thought created by the theory of evolution and the conception of the organic unity of life? No one questions the paramount value of the individual and his immortal soul. And all real lasting reformatory effort must begin with the individual. Granted that, has not modern thought revolutionised our conception of the place and function of a Church in the organic life of a community? The old individualistic conception of life, of man as an isolated atom, self-centred, self-contained, has to give place to the wider, nobler, surer conception of the essential organic unity of life as expressed in the individual and the aggregation of individuals that constitute the organic life of the community. This revolution of thought has given us new ideas, new conceptions of the place and functions of a Church in a community. To the old-world individualist, this world was a "wilderness" in which, for a brief sorrowful space he sojourned—a wanderer and a pilgrim. His conception of this world was static, and heaven was a place. We see life as kinetic, ever moving, ever-changing, at no one moment fixed and stable. The world is what men make it, good or evil; heaven is not a place but a state of being, it is here and now, for the Kingdom of God is within you.

The tract distributor is right in insisting upon what he will term the religious foundation and the spiritual functions of a Church. He is right in insisting upon the pre-eminent importance of conversion and the salvation of the individual, of supplying the need in the human heart for association together in common worship, praise and prayer, and nourishment and instruction in religious and ethical ideals, or their husks and shells, creeds and doctrines.

Yes, grant all that, but isn't there something to be said for the humble carpet sweeper? The two aspects of the question expressed in these personalities, are not irreconcilably opposed or mutually destructive. They are but two facets of the truth; they each have their value, and both are indispensable. The two conceptions merge into a wider and a nobler conception of life than either alone can afford.

Indeed, is not the existence of a multitude of societies and organisations, with social, political, and philanthropic and humanitarian objects, an admission on the part of the Churches that the religious, ethical, and altruistic forces generated by them are too great and powerful to be confined within the narrow limits of that which they claim as their particular and special province. I think so.

The ideal man, and therefore the ideal Church, in relation to social service and our common humanity, is a well-balanced and healthy combination of the tract distributor and the carpet sweeper, and all that those two representatives of distinctive thought and activity imply. The tract distributor and carpet sweeper are each in splendid isolation, because they persist in thinking in water-tight compartments and maintaining artificial distinctions between sacred and secular. Your Union for social service expresses this very clearly in its address. The founders of your National Conference Union for social service have done well to place first in the objects of the union, "The careful study of the social problems of modern civilisation," as a condition precedent to the undertaking of definite practical work towards its solution. And I am devoutly glad to read the next sentence, "Such objects are to be attained as far as possible by action through the Churches on the roll of the Conference." I have spoken of the revolution in thought created by the theory of evolution and the conception of the organic unity of life. But I am reminded that there is no new thing under the sun, and our highest achievements seem to be to rediscover ancient truths and restate them in terms of current speech. For, after all, Christianity began as a social gospel, pure and simple. There is no time, and there is no need, to inquire why the Church has apparently drifted so far away from its earliest ideals. Churches, like all other organisations are subject to the same laws of development and change, of progress, and of decay; movement, not always vertical or horizontal, by no means ever in one direction.

Here is a plain, simple problem. The tormenting evidences of social evils and the weltering mass of human misery will not give thinking men rest. There has awakened in men a social consciousness that has revolutionised our outlook on life. We have a profound conviction of the need for, and the immediate possibility of a regeneration of humanity, the re-birth of society. There are many organisations working in their several ways to attain that end; but the thought will give us no peace that the Church (speaking of it in its widest sense) ought and must be the chief means for the individual and social redemption of mankind. That deep-lying conviction is responsible for such anxious inquiries, as, why has the Church lost its hold on the masses? It is responsible for the eager cry that the Church shall jettison its cargo of dead values, effete formularies and outworn creeds and dogmas. In other words, that the Church shall once again lead the van and comprehend within the scope of its activities the forces which seek the ultimate regeneration of mankind. The unkindest cut of all is the cry, uttered in all sincerity, for the conversion of parsons and ministers to Christianity. The reception of the New Theology by the parsons indicates how great is the problem that faces us.

The first step in bringing the Church into right relationship with social service is to convert the occupants of the pulpit and the pew. Begin right there.

The Churches have already all the necessary organisation to hand to discharge all the social service required for the regeneration of humanity, and the re-birth of society. The Churches only first need sound and saving conversion. And a next indispensable preliminary is, to quote the words of Sir Oliver Lodge, the marshalling of an organised body of workers and thinkers, imbued with the right spirit and informed as to the real facts, devoted to the cause of goodness, and trained for the detection of long accustomed errors, and for the development of human life.

In other words, the next step after converting the pulpit and pew is education and organisation. Facts first. Facts, uncontrovertible, of the pain, misery, and shame caused by human stupidity and human selfishness.

For that reason, I welcome the development of adult classes and men's brotherhoods. Some of them are poor and inadequate in conception and aims; but they are a right beginning. The intention is there, if the expression be lacking in lucidity and definiteness. These agencies have to learn the painful lesson, like you and I, as individuals, that right belief is vastly important, but that here and now right action is clamorously urgent.

Let there be less of "Whoso will be saved must thus think," and more of "Whosoever will save others let him do." The will of God is to be done on earth, here, now, right away. The Kingdom of God is within us, and must be lived in our daily lives. That is the secret of true social service, alike for the individual and for the Church.

The Church, in its relation to social service, may be trusted to follow the line of least resistance—in obedience to a well-known law of development and progress. What I have said respecting the artificial distinctions between secular and sacred, and our propensity for thinking in water-fight compartments, largely meets, and I hope in some degree answers the very decided and emphatic objections on the part of the great army of tract distributors to the Institutional Church.

The ultimate ideal of regenerated human society is a community in which there is no distinction of Church and State, and in which every common effort of life, social, civic, and political, is an act of worship and devotion.

The Institutional Church is one of the most hopeful and promising stages in the development of the church's efforts to solve the problem of its right relation to social service. We are distinctly "getting on." Knowing how deeply rooted is the tract distributor idea in the average Church, no one need fear that the Institutional Church is likely to forget the paramount importance of giving attention to the individual and his spiritual needs.

Following the line of least resistance, the Institutional Church may be regarded as a clear and definite response on the part of the Church to the social needs of the age. The industrial and commercial revolution has vitally affected all human relations, and especially the home and social life of the people. The Church was bound to adapt itself to changed and changing conditions of social life. The Institutional Church is as yet in its infancy. It has infinite possibilities of good, infinite possibilities of development. Consider only one phase of it. The severance and isolation of thousands of young people from home ties and influence. Can the Church hope to do its duty to these thousands of young people by its Sunday services, leaving them to their own devices and the manifold temptations of urban life on the remaining six days of the week?

Here is a concrete problem of social service, and some of the Churches are manfully striving to meet it. The efforts are tentative, halting, and often blundering; but there is evidence of an earnest desire to do the will of God in practical service.

It ought to be possible for the whole social life of a young person to attain its fullest development under the protecting care and guidance of the Church. Where young people enjoy the inestimable privilege of true home life this need is not so apparent; but it exists even in that case to a certain extent.

In this connection may I remind you, in conclusion, that the social problem is not merely a problem of poverty. One cannot possibly exaggerate the extent and intensity of the mass of poverty in the modern community, but it is only a part—admittedly a big part—of the social problem. There is a tendency—I even noticed it in the address of the Conference Union for Social Service—to give over emphasis to the economic side of the social problem, especially in relation to poverty.

The sole justification for this or any other civilisation is its capacity to produce as its ultimate object an ever-increasing number of healthy, happy, joyous human beings. That is the social problem—civilisation its cause and cure. And while we are grappling with the economic perplexities of the poverty problem, let us remember that there is a positive as well as a negative side to social service, a constructive as well as a destructive work to which the Churches are called. The Institutional Church is at once an example and an inspiration.

This organisation, or aggregation of organisations, is on sure safe ground, when, concurrently with efforts to awaken individual consciousness of the gross evils of modern civilisation; to encourage their systematic study and the practical application of remedies in everyday life, it directly aims at the promotion of a wider, healthier, happier, fuller and freer social life amongst all classes.

Here is another "next step" in the Church's contribution to practical social service. Let each Church realise that there is a social meaning and interpretation, as well as an individual one, of the Master's words, "I have come that ye may have life, and that ye may have it more abundantly."

I have spoken of the Institutional Church's efforts for the young life of the community. It must not stop at the young people. Can anyone contemplate unmoved the drab monotony, the dull depressing sameness and hopeless cheerlessness of the lives of the great masses of our population? Industrial conditions all tend to rob a man of his individuality and reduce him to the level of a mere cog in the machine that manufactures wealth. It is the Church's privilege and duty to rescue men and women from these life and soul destroying influences, to encircle them with the sunshine and the warmth of true social intercourse a large, full and free life. Here is work that lies ready to hand. We may not be able to solve at once the problems that afflict modern society, but each Church, while striving earnestly to spread a wider and deeper and surer knowledge of the roots of the evils that afflict our common humanity, and the remedies for those evils, can, and ought to be every day of the year an oasis of true social life in the arid wastes of the common life of our industrial communities.

TO EDWARD EVERETT HALE.

How richly runs life's record on for thee,
Rounding the goal of five and eighty years,

Meeting large issues with a front that cheers

Wide legions of thy fellows, setting free
Into the sunshine of thy liberty

How many a soul companioned else with fears,

How many a heart that sate erstwhile in tears,

Teaching the world the worth of man to see.

The heavenly kingdom dost thou still proclaim,

E'en Christ's good-will and peace across the land,

The dignity of service in His name

Whose praise is wrought in many an earnest band.

And so may those who later tell thy fame Speak best thy praises as they "lend a hand."

ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE.

NEW CHURCH OPENING.

THE new Richmond Hill Church, of which the foundation-stone was laid about a year ago, during the ministry of the late H. Kelsey White, was opened on Thursday, April 25, with special services of dedication.

The church, which is calculated to hold some 400 worshippers, is described as of English Gothic in style, consisting of nave, aisles, and chancel. It is built of Accrington pressed bricks, with granite columns. The cost is over £3,000, of which over £2,100 is in hand.

At the opening, on Thursday afternoon, a procession proceeded from the school-room, where services have hitherto been held, to the church door, where a key was presented to Mrs. Enfield Dowson, that she might perform the opening ceremony.

Mrs. DOWSON, in accepting the key, thanked the congregation for the honour they had done her in asking her to open their beautiful new church. That was the beginning of a new era of their work in Ashton. The church, for which they had worked so earnestly, was dedicated simply to the worship of Almighty God. She trusted that it would become to them a home truly beloved, and help in many a good cause, and be a centre of light and leading in the town.

Mrs. Dowson then opened the door and passed in, followed by the choir, singing "Lift up your heads." The church was quickly filled, among the congregation being a number of neighbouring ministers and friends from other congregations.

The service of dedication included the hymn "Here, Lord, in faith we gather," written for the stone-laying by Mr. Kelsey White, and the lessons were read by the Rev. John Barron, the newly appointed minister, and the Rev. W. C. Hall, the first minister and builder-up of the congregation. The Rev. H. Enfield Dowson offered the prayer of dedication, and preached the sermon from 1 Cor. iv. 13, "We also believe, and therefore also we speak." They were going forth, he said towards the close, with new power in Ashton in that beautiful new church. If they were to hold their place as ministers of Christian churches they must establish new social conditions in which the brotherhood of man would no longer be a mockery. Churches were not worthy of the name of Christian unless they placed social reform among their first purposes. So here to-day, he said in conclusion, I dedicate this beautiful church in fulfilment of many hopes, aspirations, and prayers and labours of your late young minister. A free church, dedicated to the truth of God, to a worship according to conscience as dear as life itself, to the Christian life within your own souls, to the gathering in of young and old into the embrace of your pure and beautiful religion, to the work of social reform in the very spirit of Him who went about doing good; may it be not the least influence in this town, and may you be among those who bring nearer this fair Kingdom of God.

After the sermon Mr. H. H. Livesey sang a solo, "O Thou to whom in ancient time," composed for the occasion by Mr.

James Broadbent. The collection amounted to £67 8s. 3½d.

After tea in the New Jerusalem School, a meeting was held in the schoolroom, over which Mr. S. Moss presided. The secretary, Mr. S. Wilkinson, gave a brief account of the movement in Ashton, begun in 1870, then abandoned for a time, but taken up again with special lectures and Mr. Hall's ministry (which began in 1897). Their school chapel was opened in 1900. For the new church they still had £900 to raise, and they wanted an organ. For this they were contemplating a bazaar.

A vote of thanks to Mr. and Mrs. Dowson was moved by Mr. S. Smethurst, seconded by Mr. Slater, and supported by the Revs. J. Barron and W. C. Hall.

A further service of dedication was held in the evening, when the Mayor and Mayoress (Councillor and Mrs. F. Reyner) were among the congregation. The second hymn, "Nor heaven nor earth can Thee contain," was written for the occasion by the Rev. W. C. Hall. He preached the sermon, from Isaiah lx. 18, "Thou shalt call thy walls Salvation." In the course of it he made an earnest appeal to his old congregation not to trust the future, but to make it: "Yesterday's work is ended; do to-day's work to-day." And he concluded:—

"You have built a church, a beautiful church, and you will add to its beauty as times goes on and as you can, you will bring into it the skilful work of hands that can enhance it; but you have set yourselves to build something still richer, a life within it, an activity of purpose, to make your own lives nobler, and to fill the lives of others with the truth you know. Many will come here, seeking truth, and you will give it not in a creed, not by means of any ritual or form of worship not through any pulpit pronouncement. You will give it in your life. Religion has called you to tasks of self-sacrifice, and this building is an evidence of your compliance and fidelity. It calls you again to acts of self-sacrifice, to give life unto the regeneration of mankind. There are souls in this town who expect at your hands the grace of God; there are souls, believe me, who can only find His Kingdom here. No man will enter heaven because he can bring the evidence of a multitude that his doctrine was sound. He will enter heaven as God says unto him 'Well done,' for the saving of a soul. I ask the people of this town, in which I began my work as a Christian minister, to believe that this church stands not in antagonism against any other, however distinctive be the specific opinions herein proclaimed, but to accept it into their midst as a witness that some of their number, who generally call themselves Unitarians, are eager to save souls for God by declaring the truth which God has revealed to them, and giving forth to their brethren the strength and life which He has vouchsafed. God lay upon this church His own hands for its consecration, and upon all its people His holiness. God bless you all as disciples and brethren of Jesus Christ."

The special opening services were continued on Sunday, when Mr. Hall was again the preacher. The collection on the two days amounted altogether to £106.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Astley.—The annual sermons were preached on Sunday, by the Rev. R. S. Redfern, of Leigh, whose earnest, thoughtful sermons were highly appreciated by large congregations. The singing was by an augmented choir, accompanied by a string band, under the leadership, of Mr. A. Hunsworth, J.P. The collections despite the unfavourable weather, amounted to £21 9s.

Heywood.—On Sunday last, the annual Sunday-school services were conducted by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford, who preached two very appropriate and inspiring sermons. The musical part of the services was very efficiently rendered by the choir, which was largely augmented by the children and the elder scholars of the Sunday-school. The chapel was well filled, but owing to the unfavourable weather on the day, which made it inconvenient for many friends in the neighbouring churches to attend, it did not present the crowded appearance that is customary at these times. The offertories amounted to £47.

Horwich.—To the memory of their late minister, Rev. Richard C. Moore, who died somewhat suddenly nearly a year ago at the age of forty-one, the congregation have placed a rose-window of stained glass representing "Christ and the children," in the gable behind the pulpit, with a brass plate underneath the picture bearing a suitable inscription. Rev. J. J. Wright, of Chowbent, conducted a special service on Sunday afternoon last in connection with the unveiling and dedication of this window. Notwithstanding the very inclement weather there was a large attendance of members and friends.

London: Bell-street.—The girls' club gave their annual drill display on Wednesday evening, the senior class having been admirably trained by Miss Alice Gardner, the Junior class by Miss C. R. Holland. The drill included a good deal of gymnastics, dumb bells, clubs, jumping, &c., as well as a fascinating Maypole dance for the little ones, and the whole display was much enjoyed, both by the audience and the girls themselves. At the close they presented their two teachers with bouquets of white roses, and the Rev. V. D. Davis, who presided, distributed the badges to the four girls of the senior class and seven of the junior, who had gained their colours for regular attendance, good conduct, and good work.

London: Highgate.—The Band of Hope held its annual meeting on Wednesday, April 24, the President, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, in the chair. The proceedings opened with the election of officers for the ensuing year, followed by the distribution of medals and prizes by Miss Bredall, who also gave a charming address. The members afterwards delighted their audience (which consisted of over two hundred people) with a little musical play "Cinderella." Thus was closed a most successful year's work.

Manchester: Broughton.—On April 23, the Sunday-school anniversary services were held, the attendances constituting a record for the church. The services were conducted by the Rev. Hy. Dawtre, who preached in the evening on "The Leadership of Jesus." In the afternoon the scholars rendered a cantata, "The Dawn of Spring," when the church was crowded to excess. The whole of the collections are to be devoted to the Sunday-school.

Manchester: Upper Brook Street.—The Sunday School anniversary services were held on Sunday last, the evening preacher being the Rev. W. L. Schroeder. There were good congregations, and the collections showed a great improvement on recent years. On Saturday and Monday last the elder scholars gave an excellent performance of "The Merchant of Venice." The chapel report, which has just been issued, shows that the school and congregation are steadily improving. Sixty-one new members joined the Church last year, twenty-seven of them elder scholars from the Sunday-school. The only anxiety is in regard to finance. The City News of last Saturday contained a good report of an address given by the Rev. C. Peach at the Arts Club on the occasion of the annual Shakespeare celebration, the subject being "The Supernatural Element in Shakespeare."

Midland Sunday School Association.—The thirty-first annual meeting was held on Saturday, April 27, at the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham. The Rev. Thomas Paxton presided at the business meeting, and among those present were Mr. Ion Pritchard, representing the Sunday School Association, and Mr. Godfrey, the North Midland Association. The report gave statistics of the thirteen schools of the district, and recorded the great success of the Annual Scholars' Service in the Birmingham Town Hall. The address by Dr. Crothers to the teachers was also very successful. In the autumn of last year, Mr. Worthington, of Stourbridge, invited the teachers to a garden party, about 100 accepting the invitation. The committee regretted that they were unable to open the teachers' preparation class, but an effort would be made in that direction during the winter months. Also that the Association hoped to be in possession of a lantern shortly. The visitors reported in their visits the many agencies in connection with the schools, such as Bands of Hope, Guilds, Benevolent and Provident clubs, Savings Banks, Recreation classes, Cricket and Football club, Girls' and boys' clubs, &c., which were the means of keeping the elder scholars to the schools and churches. The Rev. J. W. Austin was elected president for the ensuing year, and the Rev. T. Paxton and Miss Twist, hon. secretaries. A very hearty welcome was given to Mr. Ion Pritchard and Mr. Godfrey. Mr. C. M. Stocker was thanked for his services as hon. sec. during the past three years, other duties having compelled his resignation. Tea was provided in the school-room by the teachers of the Old Meeting schools, and a conference was held, when the Rev. J. W. Austin presided, and a paper was read by the Rev. W. J. Clarke on "The Aim and Qualifications of the Sunday-school Teacher." A discussion followed, and votes of thanks brought a successful meeting to a close.

Newport, Mon.—After being in temporary charge of this church for more than six months, the Rev. S. Burrows terminated his present visit on Sunday last, when good congregations assembled to hear his farewell sermons. On Thursday evening, April 25, a very pleasant social gathering was held, when the opportunity was taken to present Mr. Burrows with a silver-mounted inkstand, suitably inscribed, as a mark of the congregation's regard, and in recognition of his good and helpful work for the church. Mr. W. Pritchard presided, and the presentation was made by Mr. Banks, the oldest member of the church. Mr. Burrows gratefully acknowledged the gift and the kindness they had shown to Mrs. Burrows and himself.

North East Lancs. Sunday-school Union.

—On Saturday, April 27, the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, was present at a meeting held at Trafalgar-street, Burnley, and gave an address. As President of the National Conference he said, he would take the opportunity of dealing with some of the work which the Conference was engaged upon. Mentioning first the matter of young people's guilds he advocated the formation of such societies amongst our churches as one of the best means of attaching the elder scholars to the church. The Social Questions committee was also doing a good work in preparing syllabuses for the adoption of the churches that wished to take up a systematic study of the various social problems which are pressing for solution. Mr. Wood pointed out that the church could not take sides as between individualists, collectivists, socialists, and others, but he urged that it would be neglecting one of its chief duties if it did not see to it that its members had the opportunity of ascertaining the facts with regard to the social problems, leaving the individual to draw his own conclusions from those facts. Lastly, reference was made to the shortage of supply of students for the ministry. Mr. Wood urged the necessity for careful watch being made on the part of the minister and others for any young person who showed any desire to take up this most important calling, and to give all the encouragement possible. An interesting discussion followed, in which the Revs. A. W. Fox, J. Islan Jones, J. E. Jenkins (chairman), Messrs. Mackie, Lowcock, Harrison, Hird, Hargreaves, and others took part.

Whitchurch, Salop (Welcome meeting).

—On Tuesday, April 23, a public tea-meeting was held to welcome the recently appointed minister (Rev. W. J. Pond). The Rev. J. C. Street, Shrewsbury, delivered the charge to the minister, and in a very earnest, impressive address, reminded him of the sacredness of the position to which he was called, the grave responsibilities that devolved upon him, and that he was a servant, not only of God, but of the people. The Rev. E. E. Lovell (Baptist), as the senior Nonconformist minister of the town, welcomed Mr. Pond to Whitchurch, and expressed a hope that he would take an active part in civic as well as religious life outside his own church. The charge to the congregation was delivered by the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, Saffron Walden, president of the General Baptist Assembly. In reply, Mr. Pond said he had come as a humble worker in the Master's vineyard. His aim was not to preach theology, but the simple practical Gospel of Christ. He recognised but one creed, the only one his Master taught, viz., "the Fatherhood of God and Brotherhood of man," and it was his aim to inspire them to "Live that creed and hold up to earth the torch Divine, to be what thou prayest to be made, and let the victor's step be thine." He was not going to make extravagant promises, but would do his best, and hoped that "to his virtues they would be ever kind, and to his faults a little blind." Other speakers were the Revs. H. Fisher Short (Crewe), A. Thompson (Dudley), D. Davis (Nantwich), and E. Evans (Chester), and Mr. H. Coventry (New Brighton), and the chairman, Mr. G. Groom (Whitchurch). There were several friends present from Shrewsbury, Nantwich, Crewe, and Chester. By this very practical sympathy from distant sister churches Mr. Pond and his congregation were much encouraged. The Rev. J. A. Brinkworth had preached on the previous Sunday, both morning and evening.

Styal.—Of presentations there are many and of various kinds, but it will be agreed that a presentation of a large carved oak mantelpiece to a newly built chapel room by an octogenarian, who had carved it herself, is something out of the ordinary. Such a presentation was made on Saturday, April 13, to the Nordlife Chapel new council room by Miss Hankinson, the sister-in-law of the late Dr. Brooke Herford. There were no two opinions about the solidity and beauty of the work, which had occupied Miss Hankinson four or five hours a day for some ten weeks. The council room was filled with a great company of friends to receive the gift and to celebrate Miss Hankinson's long connection with the chapel and schools, and to record their gratitude to her for her untiring helpfulness in all good works. After a few introductory words by the minister and an enthusiastically acclaimed little speech by Miss Hankinson, Mr. H. P. Greg (the chairman of the chapel) received the gift on behalf of the chapel. The Rev. P. M. Higginson was present, and spoke of the past and of the period of his lengthened ministry at Styal, and of Miss Hankinson's record as a worker. Old members of the chapel, women and men, old scholars and fellow members of Miss Hankinson arose, and in the eloquence of gratitude and enthusiasm called their benefactress blessed. There was a good programme of music.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

MR. C. LIONEL BRIGGS, who writes from Woodlands, Cranborne, near Salisbury, sends us an earnest appeal for help towards the relief of the Russian peasantry, suffering from appalling famine. There are millions starving, Mr. Briggs writes, "and their would-be helpers, who have been struggling to keep body and soul together through the long winter, are now on the point of having to give it all up from lack of funds. The Society of Friends—as in the great famine of 1890-91—has been foremost in our country to respond, as a religious body, to the claims of humanity, and by their fine generosity have shown once again the vitality and breadth of their religion."

MR. BRIGGS appeals to our ministers and congregations to take their part in rousing the sympathies of their fellow citizens, in this great need, and he makes the following offer to any congregation within reasonable distance of Salisbury, that is willing to take the matter up :—

"I should be glad to help by a lantern lecture, giving some of my impressions of Russia and her people from a couple of visits to the country, an acquaintance-ship with Leo Tolstoy and a long sojourn with Russians in England—provided a lantern could be supplied and my expenses paid." Contributions to the Famine Fund may be sent to Mr. Isaac Sharp, Secretary of the Society of Friends, 12, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

IN addition to Miss Richmond, of Wellington, and the Rev. R. W. Boynton, of St. Paul's, Minnes., we are glad to learn that the Protestantenbund of Holland will be represented at the Whit-week meetings by Professor B. D. Eerdmans, of Leiden, whom so many will remember as the energetic secretary of the international meetings at Amsterdam, and who took a prominent part in the London meetings in 1901. Dr. H. L. Oort, of Utrecht, who is to preach at the Dutch Church in Austin Friars on the following Sunday, will also attend. The Rev. Herman Haugerud, minister of the newly founded Unitarian church at Christiania, will take part in the anniversary proceedings, and we are also to have the pleasure of welcoming our venerable friend, Matthias Jochumsson from Iceland. The attendance of ministers from this country, notwithstanding that so many are going to America later in the year, will be above the average. Upwards of one hundred ministers have already intimated their intention of being present.

AN important and interesting meeting was held at Exeter Hall, on Monday, to consider a proposal to hold a conference representing the various religions of the world immediately before the assembling of the Hague Conference next June, with the object of demonstrating the unanimity of all religious faiths in the cause of peace. The circular summoning the meeting was signed by the Bishops of Hereford and Ripon, and by leading representatives of orthodox Nonconformity; it also had the names of Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, both of whom were present and took part in the proceedings. The Bishop of Hereford was called to the chair. He pleaded eloquently for a united expression from every possible religious organisation upon the necessity for now taking a forward step in the direction of lessening the evils and possibilities of war. He was of opinion that the mass of the people in every country in Europe, upon whom the burden and suffering of war chiefly rested, were far more determined in favour of peace than the rulers and diplomatists of the world imagined. It was agreed to appoint a small committee to prepare a suitable memorial, and to enter into communication with the various religious bodies with the view of presenting it to the representatives of the nations at the Hague. The secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was elected to serve on this committee.

LORD ROSEBURY, as Chancellor of the University of London, presided on Wednesday at the presentation of degrees, and gave his annual address. In the evening a new departure was made, for at the instance of a body of students a special service was held in Westminster Abbey, the Chancellor and other dignitaries of the University taking part. The service was mainly choral, and the sermon was preached by the Dean.

THE difficulty of imparting "religious education" in our public elementary schools has received fresh illustration in the case of the Preston syllabus, to which our friend, the Rev. C. Travers drew attention in our columns last week. The vague provision of the statute that no formulary distinctive of any particular denomination is to be taught evidently affords room for serious abuse. Details were abundantly supplied in Mr. Travers's communication. Last week a remarkable discussion on the point took place at Preston, under the chairmanship of the Mayor, the debaters being the general body of Nonconformists on the one side, and on the other Dr. Rigg, a stalwart Anglican, who appears to have taken a prominent share in the drawing up of the syllabus. The discussion clearly showed that, in the opinion of the Nonconformists, a very decided Anglican colour had been given to the religious instruction prescribed, since in addition to the Apostles' Creed, responses and prayers from the Book of Common Prayer are ordered to be used.

DR. RIGG, who must have the full credit of his opinions as he had publicly invited the debate, had little difficulty in sheltering the action of the Local Authority behind the usage of some other education authorities; and though apparently he had no special affection for Mr. Gladstone's policy in general, he was grateful for that statesman's opinion that the Apostle's Creed was not "distinctively sectarian. Mr. Travers, in a speech which a local journal commends in unreserved terms of admiration, showed the syllabus to be specially ill-conceived from the point of view of the children, who must be dosed beyond measure with Biblical lore, if the regulations are carried out. He pointed to a recent declaration by a large number of the clergy, including men of high rank as scholars and dignitaries, "that it is not without grave responsibility and peril that any of us should build the faith of souls primarily upon details of New Testament narrative, the historic validity of which must ultimately be determined in the court of trained research." Dr. Rigg with dexterous design, sought to put the Evangelical Nonconformists against Mr. Travers, but the attempt failed. Let us hope that this sense of community of injury may not only bring the non-Anglicans closer together, but suggest to Anglicans themselves to try a more liberal course, in the best interests of all concerned, but especially of the children.

THE Rev. R. J. Campbell may certainly adopt the language of the Psalmist who said (P.B.V.), "I am become as it were a monster unto many." At the last annual meeting of the Sheffield District Methodist New Connexion churches a resolution as follows was unanimously carried, the Rev. Principal Clemens being in the number of those who supported it:—"That in view of the strong feeling against the doctrine propounded by the Rev. R. J. Campbell, and because of the position he has taken being widely divergent from evangelical truth as believed by our churches, this meeting is convinced it is very undesirable, and likely to lead to great trouble, if he be allowed to preach at any service connected with the Conference, official or otherwise, and strongly appeal to the local and annual committees to take such steps as may be necessary to cancel the engagement at any cost."

LATER, in the same meeting, a resolution was passed exhorting the members to contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered to the saints, and asking that in legal documents and doctrinal standards for the church in the future (i.e., as incorporated in the new United Methodist Church) everything may be done to safeguard "our evangelical and Scriptural character as a true branch of the Catholic Church." The comment that must have been made inwardly by some of those who heard this resolution would be a reference to the fact that the City Temple, whose pastor is shunned as an unbeliever, and compared to Joseph Barker, is strictly safeguarded by legal documents from Socinian or even Arminian heresy. It is interesting to remember that Joseph Barker, to whom reference was made by more than one speaker, after passing through various phases of doubt and belief, ended as member of a Methodist church, and died professing that he trusted in Christ for salvation.

At a large and enthusiastic meeting held in Exeter Hall, the Rev. Marshall Hartley, as treasurer of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society, said that the report he had to present was probably the most satisfactory that had ever been given to a Methodist missionary meeting in that hall, at any rate within living memory; £11,200 had been raised in additional subscriptions, giving claim upon a contingent £10,000 more, which had been promised, and in all the total income for the year amounted to £208,307. One speaker had the boldness to make the suggestion that the society should send its surplus to the Church Missionary Society or the Baptist Society, and thought if each society would do something of that sort they might all claim to be in the Apostolic succession.

THERE is some sense of strangeness in discovering in a Parliamentary paper material for studying the historical development of Christian theology. But a reference to the recently issued report of the Charity Commissioners is very instructive in this respect. A chapel at Kingswood, formerly known as "Mr. Whitefield's Room," had been used since 1802 by the denomination of Pædo-baptist Congregationalists or Pædobaptist Independent Dissenters. The trust deeds contain twelve doctrinal statements, several of which are scarcely credible to-day, and the Congregational authorities have applied to the Commissioners for power to vary the articles. The statement of belief which it was proposed to substitute illustrates the official dogmatic position of the present time, and is as follows:—

"The unity of the Godhead as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. The Incarnation, Resurrection, and Ascension of the Only Begotten Son of the Father in Jesus Christ, who is our Propitiatory sacrifice, our Redeemer, our Judge, the sole Head of His Church.

"The Quickening, Indwelling, Guiding, and Sanctifying of the Holy Spirit.

"The Revelation of God's Grace to man and of man's duty to God in the Holy Scriptures."

THERE is enough in this modern statement to disagree with, and it is a matter of regret that these close trust deeds are still perpetrated. But the old trust is much stronger, and includes, inter alia, "The utter depravity of Human Nature," "the resurrection of the body," and "the eternal punishment of the wicked." These positions are now passed by in silence, and may be regarded as outgrown in the denominational counsels.

THE Charity Commissioners, however, have no power to grant relief of conscience. With regard to the doctrinal trust, it seemed to them "that the proposal involved a material alteration in the main purpose of the charity, that is to say, the maintenance of a specified form of worship in accordance with specified doctrines; and that we were not competent to authorise such a change, whether by scheme or otherwise under our ordinary jurisdiction. The proposal, however, appeared to us to be one which, with certain modifications, was reasonable and desirable. But it also appeared to us that the object could not be obtained without the authority of an Act of Parliament."

THIS month's World's Work, "an illustrated magazine of national efficiency and social progress," completes the first half-yearly volume under the new editor, Mr. Chalmers Roberts. It is a special Irish number, telling of this year's Exhibition in Dublin, of various forms of industry, of women as well as men, all fully illustrated, and of the "wonderful growth of the Irish League." There are six full-page portraits of "men who are making Ireland," i.e., the Lord Lieutenant, Sir Antony Macdonnell, Sir Horace Plunkett, Mr. Redmond, the Chief Secretary, and the Marquis of Ormonde, President of the Exhibition.

IN the April Atlantic Monthly, Mr. H. W. Boynton has an article on "Mr. Shaw as Critic." "However we may disrelish his appearance, however we may distrust his premises, and discredit his conclusions, we must perforce yield him the attention due to sincerity of impulse and integrity of conduct. We cannot dismiss him with a shrug." So the article concludes. Then turn on to the pages devoted to the Contributors' Club, and by no means overlook the bit on "The Pessimistic Pose," where we seem to have fallen into company again with the author of Miss Muffet's Christmas Party, and The Pardoner's Wallet.

IN the May Calendar of Trinity Church, Glasgow, Dr. Hunter records the words of tribute he spoke at the morning service on April 21 concerning the late Robert Maclehose, of the well-known firm of Glasgow publishers. After announcing the anthem, "I heard a voice from Heaven saying unto me, Write, from henceforth, Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord," Dr. Hunter said: "Instead of the usual 'Dead March,' I am asking you to sing these words of Christian faith and hope in memory of one who has been for many years a devoted servant of our Church, and who gave, as far as his slender physical strength would allow him, much of his time and thought and energy to promoting the best interests of this congregation. I refer to Mr. Robert Maclehose—a brave and beautiful soul whom it was a joy to know, and whose memory will long live in many hearts. We can ill spare him. For he was not an ordinary or average member of the Church, but one who stood, and stood with an undivided and earnest heart, for the ideals of this independent community of Christian worshippers. He was in many respects one of my best helpers, wise in his counsel, and ever ready to serve, grudging no pains in order that he might do well what he undertook to do. I attempt no eulogy, but I cannot let this hour pass without one simple word of grateful recognition and remembrance." The services at Trinity Church to-morrow are to be conducted by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas of Nottingham, and on Whit Sunday by the Rev. E. I. Fripp, of Clifton.

LONDON LAYMEN'S CLUB.—The fourth annual dinner and general meeting of the club was held at the Inns of Court Hotel on Monday evening, the President, Mr. Harold Wade, in the chair. The report gave a most satisfactory account of the Club, which has now 88 members, including the full complement of 10 ministers. The successful effort made by the Club to carry forward Dr. Herbert Smith's work for the Boston Conference Fund was recorded, and also the gift of the challenge shield for gymnastic competitions among teams from our London churches. It was also reported that Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence had promised another challenge shield for a swimming league competition among lads' clubs. The regular meetings of the club were recorded, at the first of which, last October, the Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., of Cambridge, Mass., was welcomed as the guest of the evening, and gave an address on "Unitarian Laymen and their Work in America." The President was very warmly thanked for his services to the club during his term of office, and Mr. A. Savage Cooper was elected president for the ensuing year, and Mr. Percy Preston vice-president. The hon. secretary, Mr. E. Benford Hall, and the treasurer, Mr. W. Fitchett Wurtzburg, were re-elected, with hearty thanks for their services to the club.

LITERARY NOTES AND NEWS.

THE literary world is sad this week for the death of Ian Maclaren, and the Churches mourn in John Watson a strong and popular preacher and a broad-minded religious writer, who touched the old theology with the spirit of a new humanity. It is seldom that one man wins real excellence and wide popular success in two such separate spheres. Charles Kingsley did it; and in both cases the secret was the same. The strong sympathetic personality of the man went into all his work. It made both his preaching and his novel writing ring true to common life. There was never any feeling of discord in the fact that the Scotch stories, with their quaint humour, came out of the same study which produced the "Mind of the Master."

It was the nature of John Watson to be sympathetic and tolerant. That was the reason why he was in many respects a broad churchman, and his theology seemed often to lack some keenness of edge. He was quick to recognise spiritual power and Christian beauty of character wherever he found them. He did not value either men or books for the sake of their labels. Christianity to him was more a matter of the heart than of the head. The present writer looks back to a Sunday evening spent in his company a few months ago. How full of good stories he was that night, how genial and sympathetic in his talk on more serious themes! How quickly he brushed aside the suggestion that some fine books that bear heretical names are coldly received on that account! "No sensible man," he said, "can possibly allow that to weigh with him." He referred spontaneously to a volume of the Hibbert Lectures in which his listener took a special interest, and added with generous ardour, "I always consider it one of the great books of our generation." He was every inch a book-man. Books had a fascination for him apart from the art of writing which he practised so delightfully himself. But human life interested him still more. He was first of all a man and a preacher.

The commemoration of the centenary of the death of John Newton has revived interest in his intimate friendship with William Cowper, and in the book of Olney Hymns in which they collaborated. Most of these religious verses are forgotten, but the volume deserves to be remembered for the sake of the few perfect hymns which it contains. Cowper's "God moves in a mysterious way," "Hark! my soul, it is the Lord," and "O for a closer walk with God" are there; while Newton's exquisite lyric, "How sweet the name of Jesus sounds," and his triumphant song, "Glorious things of thee are spoken," are among the imperishable hymns of the Church.

A writer in the Manchester Guardian calls attention to the fact that the English Hymnal has recovered one fine hymn by John Newton from oblivion. It is worthy of notice, for it is more simple and direct in its religious appeal, and at the same time more free from sentimental rhetoric, than many of the hymns about nature and the changing seasons which fill a large place in some modern hymn-books.

Kindly spring again is here;
Trees and fields in bloom appear;
Hark, the birds with artless lays Warble their Creator's praise.

Where in winter all was snow,
Now the flowers in clusters grow;
And the corn, in green array,
Promises a harvest-day.

Lord, afford a spring to me,
Let me feel like what I see;
Speak, and by Thy gracious voice
Make my drooping soul rejoice.

On Thy garden deign to smile,
Raise the plants, enrich the soil;
Soon Thy presence will restore
Life to what seemed dead before.

Readers who enjoyed Lady Gregory's delightful volume of Irish lore called "Poets and Dreamers," will welcome the announcement that Mr. Murray will publish shortly a new volume from her pen of a similar kind. It will be called "Saints and Wonders, according to the old writings and the memory of the people of Ireland." We may expect in its pages the same atmosphere of the primitive world, with its rich popular mythology and its quaint humour, so refreshing to the reader who is jaded with the sensationalism and the elaborate artificiality of city-made books.

* * *

Another recent product of the Irish literary movement is the second edition, revised and enlarged, of "Bards of the Gael and Gall," by Dr. George Sigerson. It is a volume of verse translations of popular poetry from early times to the patriotic songs of the eighteenth century, with a long historical introduction.

* * *

The following lines will give some idea of Dr. Sigerson's vigour as a translator. They are taken from St. Patrick's hymn called "The Guardsman's Cry":—

Christ near,
Christ here,
Christ be with me,
Christ beneath me,
Christ within me,
Christ behind me,
Christ be o'er me,
Christ before me,
Christ on the left and the right,
Christ hither and thither,
Christ in the sight
Of each eye that shall seek me,
Christ in each ear that shall hear,
Christ in each mouth that shall speak me,
Christ not the less
In each heart I address.

Truly, the belief in immanence as a practical part of Christian piety belongs to the days of our fathers and to the old time before them. St. Patrick stands confessed as a prophet of the New Theology!

W. H. D.

The May Cornhill has an article by Mr. Leonard Huxley on "A Great Darwinian and his Friends," telling of Sir Joseph Hooker, who will be ninety on June 30, and whom Mr. Huxley calls "Darwin's closest and oldest friend."

THE "HIBBERT JOURNAL."

"THE ethical and spiritual re-awakening of Christendom is at hand," says Mr. Campbell, in the first article of the April Hibbert Journal, to which we have already called attention. "While the formal unity of Christendom is neither possible nor desirable, a practical concentration of all the Christian forces for the realisation of the main purpose for which the Church of Christ exists (that is, the establishment of the veritable Kingdom of God on earth) ought now to be within sight. Whatever name we give to the movement which is rising spontaneously from so many different quarters, we can gladly and thankfully recognise that it is of God, and do our best to further it." And this number of the Hibbert furnishes abundant evidence that such a movement is in very active process. The striking article on "The Aim of the New Catholic Movement," which follows Mr. Campbell's on "The New Theology Movement," and is by a man who speaks with intimate knowledge of the affairs of the Roman Church, sets before us very clearly the significance of the liberal movement within that great communion. It is an ideal movement, aiming at a natural, organic development without breach in the continuity of spiritual life. The saint of Fogazzaro's famous novel makes that ideal striving live for us, and one is anxious to hope that the earnest spirit of freedom and a passionate humanity there at work may prove in time capable of triumph over the terrible forces of repression centred in the government of the Church.

"To-day," says the writer of this article, "evolution, the great results of Biblical criticism, and democracy are all acknowledged facts, and in the light of them the need for religious reconstruction is patent and indisputable. Nowhere is the triumph of democracy more complete than in the two great Catholic nations of Latin race, and it is they among all the peoples of Christendom who are leading the way in that new synthesis which is most correctly described as a task of rejuvenation and renovation. This task the Catholic Church is uniquely fitted to undertake by reason of her historic continuity; her secular experience of crises not less serious and accommodations and assimilations of no less magnitude than any that are called for to-day; the inexhaustible treasury of her spiritual riches amassed throughout the ages from all quarters; her profound sense of the mystery of things and of the nearness and reality of the invisible world. Above all, she is fitted for this task by reason of her splendid assertion of the principle of oneness or solidarity; the oneness of human nature, justifying the external cult no less than interior piety and consecrating the senses and emotions in the service of the spirit; the oneness of God and man, whereby God co-operates with man and men with one another in the spiritual evolution of the individual and the race; and (in the Communion of Saints) the oneness and co-operation of all the sons of God, living and departed, in this world and the next. . . . In pursuing this ideal, they are truly working to promote that visible Kingdom of God, for whose coming the Lord taught His disciples to pray: Adveniat regnum tuum! For this Kingdom of God would seem to be rightly conceived as also a republic of spirits, in that its rule is founded upon the free consent of the governed; none are coerced, nor are any excluded from the Kingdom save by their own act. Liberty is its rule, but, in its divinely ordered and disciplined society, service is the condition of liberty. As it is said, servire est regnare; by service alone the Christian becomes free. Christian liberty is not licence, and does not, by any means, exclude authority. And, as our obedience is not servile, so our authority is not tyrannical, but is the means for safeguarding and securing liberty. It is to liberty in this sense alone that Catholics aspire: that liberty which is the heritage of the sons of God, the burgher-right of the citizens of the Heavenly City."

We have made that long quotation because the passage presents a noble ideal, which it would be a great thing for the world, if the progressive spirits within the Roman communion should prove by God's grace able to realise. And yet it is very clear to us that those great possessions of the spirit and that aspiration do not belong to them alone, or to their Church exclusively, though interpreted in the widest sense. The "Catholic Church" has indeed that great capacity and promise and undying hope—but its members are to be found in many different communions, as they appear in the world. Known or unknown to one another, they are all working to the same end, moved by the same spirit, finding their freedom only in obedience to the highest. In what outward form the great consummation shall finally appear, it is not for us as yet to know or to ask.

But meanwhile we have all to be at work in our own place, thankful in the deepening sense of comradeship and the great hope of progress. And we find much that is helpful in other articles in this number.

First we note Dr. Galloway's article on "What do Religious Thinkers owe to Kant?"; and especially the strong plea at the close for the maintenance of the truth of personality. Genuinely religious men, Dr. Galloway remarks, have believed that the facts of the religious consciousness can be adequately construed on the theory of Absolute Idealism, but a more critical examination of its actual meaning, in the phrases used, has tended to dispel that belief. "There is ample evidence at present that many feel this need of a revised idealism which will relate itself more intimately to the facts of finite experience. In this connection the growth of the movement termed ethical or personal idealism is significant. . . . The practical and spiritual aspects of the conscious self are being set in the light; and, if unification is still held to be the goal of thought, it is recognised that no unification can be valid which does damage to the realm of personal values. For the moral self-consciousness demands to be real. Here the influence of Kant is, to borrow an image from Plato, like a breeze from wholesome places bringing health. Of nothing was Kant more sure than of the fundamental fact of moral freedom, which carried with it the truth of the moral law and the imperative of duty."

Dr. A. E. Garvie, also, the Principal-elect of New College, London, in his article on "Personality in God, Christ, Man," stands strongly for its reality both in man and God. Whether in his interpretation of the personality of Jesus he is altogether orthodox, we leave it to the dogmatic theologians to decide. Dr. Garvie agrees with Dorner that in Christ the Incarnation was progressive, and he holds not only that in Christ human personality is destined for completion, the completion of the human in the divine, but that "in Him men are called to become sons of God." And this also is Dr. Garvie's statement: "It is in knowing, trusting, loving, and serving God as Father that Jesus claims to be Son. It is to a false metaphysics that we owe the assumption that ethical sonship, sonship revealed and realised in the entire personal development, is something else and less than an ontological sonship might be. If spirit be the ultimate reality, then there can be nothing more real than the sonship of Jesus as expressed in his self-consciousness. It is with God as Father—that is, with wisdom, goodness, and love perfect and communicative—that Jesus knew Himself to be one in His thoughts, feelings, aims, deeds; and it is vain to conceive a unity with God more real than this. In this personal union of God and man there is essential union."

Further suggestive thoughts on this subject of personality will be found in the Rev. Frederic Palmer's article on "The Christ of the Fourth Gospel," which is followed by a welcome plea for reality by the Rev. B. A. Millard in his article on "The Theology of the 'Average Man.'"

Dr. R. J. Ryle, writing on "The Neurotic Theory of the Miracles of Healing," expects that theory in the hands of its supporters to prove too much. No one, we imagine, except literalist believers, will attribute the presence of the miracle stories in the Gospels to any one single cause. Some basis of fact of the "faith-healing" kind may very likely have given rise to some of these stories; but the natural growth of wonder and the misinterpretation of figurative language, and the assumption that old prophecies must have had a literal fulfilment, may all have contributed their share.

Readers of this number should by no means overlook that strange and beautiful record of experience, "Between Death and Life," for the genuineness of which the Editor gives us his word.

THE INTERNATIONAL JOURNAL OF ETHICS.

THE April number of this thoughtful journal contains several good articles, and perhaps the most valuable and original is the opening one on "The Ethics of the Gospels," by A. C. Pigou, of Cambridge. The fundamental ethical principles which the writer ascribes to Jesus are substantially in agreement with those laid down in Dr. Martineau's "Types of Ethical Theory." Goodness lies not in the outward act, but in the motives of the agent. Conscience reveals a certain ideal, and conduct is right or wrong according as it accords with or opposes this ideal. If this were the whole of the moral teaching of Jesus it would be equivalent to Kant's Categorical Imperative, namely, "Act according to the practical reason or conscience." But this gives us only the form of right conduct; and, though it may afford a valid canon of subjective right, it throws no light on what is objectively right when subjective ideals differ; "it is paradoxical to count as of equal goodness a conscientiously murderous dervish and St. Francis of Assisi." The following passage well expresses the different forms which the attempts to establish an ultimate standard of ethics assume:—"In the Jewish law, the ideal provided wherewith to fill the Kantian form, was a mingled catalogue of deeds and qualities: Thou shalt not kill; thou shalt not steal; but also, thou shalt not covet. In Greek ethics an advance upon this was made by the elimination of deeds. The ideal became solely one of qualities, justice, benevolence, courage, temperance and so on. This standpoint was not, of course, in conflict with the other. It did not repudiate the fruit of conduct; it merely traced it to the root of character. It came, in fact, not to destroy, but to fulfil. It did not abandon the primitive creed; but built for it a deeper foundation. The ideal presented by Jesus went beyond the pagan ideal in just this same manner. It did not repudiate the catalogue of virtues, but found for them a new foundation in the pivotal doctrine of love. Love to God and love to man; this was the law and the prophets."

The writer then proceeds to discuss the question whether Love was, in the opinion of Jesus, the only real good. He inclines to a negative reply. "Whether," he says, "Jesus believed intellect to be good in itself we have no evidence, but the whole course of his ministry goes to show that he did believe this of happiness. He sympathised with pain, and he went about healing sick people. To deny that he really cared for the happiness of others, though he acted as though he cared for it so keenly, is surely straining facts to fit a theory." We are not quite sure that we fully understand Mr. Pigou here. It appears clear to us that Jesus did not regard either knowledge or freedom from pain as good in themselves in the sense in which Divine love is good in itself. Whenever the pursuit of either knowledge or happiness clashes with the claim of love, he would certainly have given to love the supreme authority. Love is, in his view, another name for God, and, therefore, only through love could either true spiritual insight or unalloyed happiness be reached. Hence it would seem that according to Jesus, all other so-called goods have no intrinsic worth, unless they are associated with, and help men to realise, the one absolute good, viz., the dominance in the soul of the sentiment of self-forgetful love. Mr. Pigou's paper deserves to be carefully read by all preachers.

The next article is a well-reasoned protest against capital punishment. Then follows an address on "The Russian Revolution," by Mr. W. M. Salter, the eminent "ethical culture" leader. This paper, which is evidently the outcome of much knowledge of the subject, does not encourage the expectation of a near-approaching successful revolution. "It is," he says, "a government that will be responsible to the people that is the essence of the revolutionary demand. But to accomplish this, there must be power to meet power. To establish the right of free political institutions in a university lecture, or among a pack of students is one thing, but it is another thing to face the solid stone-wall of an autocracy, a bureaucracy, and an army, and to lay it low. For that I say, there must be power.

Man needs must fight

To make true peace his own ;

He needs must combat might with might,
Or might would rule alone.

But where is there such power in Russia to-day ? Do a handful of educated men, a few lawyers and professors and students, make such a power ? Do a few liberal-minded aristocrats make such a power ? Do a few scattered bomb-throwers and assassins make such a power ? How ridiculous ! The power must be that of the mass of the nation. The smaller the revolutionary forces are, the more violent they are, the more ineffective. When the Russian people want the revolution, they will have it without bomb-throwing and assassinations, by the simple resistlessness of their might." Still, as Mr. Salter clearly shows, liberal ideas are gradually penetrating even the peasant class ; and there are currents at work all through Russian society which will, at length, achieve victory, though it may take half a century to do it.

After a very discriminating paper by Mr. Melian Stawell on "Women and Democracy," we get an interesting but highly speculative article by Professor E. O. Sisson, of Washington University, Seattle, on "The State absorbing the function of the Church." The State, argues Mr. Sisson, has always embodied power, while the Church has embodied love. In recent years, however, men are increasingly finding in the State an organ for the expression of the philanthropic love which they formerly expressed through the Church. Hence, he infers that in the future, the two elements of power and love will be at last united in one body, the new Church-State. This is indeed, looking very far ahead ; and it seems to us that for the realisation of this idea it would be first necessary that theological beliefs should have disappeared, and that ethical ideas and aspirations should have become the sole form of faith and worship.

The last two articles on "Student Self-Government in the University of California," and "The Elevation of the College Woman's Ideal," have great interest for educationists, for they show that in American universities the authorities are more and more entrusting discipline, and the maintenance of a high ideal, to associations formed by the students themselves. "Honour Societies" are established, the aim of which is to foster in all the new students a love for their university, and to create a sane and effective student public opinion. Offences against discipline and morality are brought in the first instance before a court appointed by the students themselves, and the findings of this court are almost universally endorsed by the official authorities.

The usual excellent notices of new books complete this valuable number.

CHARLES B. UPTON.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

In this month's Contemporary, M. Paul Sabatier writes on "The Montagnini Papers." He profoundly regrets the steps taken by the French Government against that prelate and the confiscation of his papers, but at the same time presses home the lesson of what those papers revealed, as to the character of the Papal representative and the policy of Rome. Contrasted with the religious earnestness of the French bishops, Montagnini appears in a very unattractive light. The papers, M. Sabatier affirms, "constitute the intellectual, moral, and religious bankruptcy of a particular method of exerting authority." "In obstinately defending the pontifical diplomacy, the Catholic Press simply show that their intellectual and moral sense is far behind that of the lay public."

The question of the relation of the Protestant churches to their doctrinal standards is considered by Mr. G. F. Barbour in a thorough article on "Dogma and Progress." He pleads for a broadening of the basis of church membership, laying more stress on earnestness of moral purpose than on doctrinal uniformity, and, in a final word on creed-simplification, says that the danger of creed revision, urged by the timid, is not so great as that of holding back from progress. He points to the grave suspicion of insincerity which rests upon the creed-bound churches. "Rightly or wrongly it is believed that men of the most scrupulous honour in other directions sign church formulas with little of the close consideration that should be given to so significant an act. We are told that old chains gall less than new ; but is not this a proof that centuries of use and wont have rendered perception callous where it should be the most sensitive ?"

Mr. Alexander Brown's article, "Jesus on His own Vocation," is vitiated, as it appears to us, by the use of dogmatic statements in the Fourth Gospel, as though they were the actual words of Jesus himself. We note, also, Mr. Murray Macdonald's plea for the Reduction of Armaments.

The Nineteenth Century and After has a curious and interesting article by Dr. Smythe Palmer on "The Angelic Council," starting from the text "Let us make man," for the interpretation of which, as he says, the preposterous expedient of finding Trinitarian language in the words cannot avail. Then comes a valuable article by Mr. Havelock Ellis on "Religion and the Child." His position may be gathered from the following passage :—

"The fact that it is impossible to teach children even the elements of adult religion and philosophy, as well as unwise to attempt it, by no means implies that all serious teaching is impossible in childhood. On the imaginative and spiritual side, it is true, the child is re-born and transformed during adolescence ; but on the practical and concrete side his life and thought are, for the most part, but the regular and orderly development of the habits he has already acquired. The elements of ethics, on the one hand, as well as of natural science, on the other, may alike be taught to children ; and indeed, they become a necessary part of early education, if the imaginative side of training is to be duly balanced and complemented. The child as much as the adult can be taught, and is indeed apt to learn, the meaning and value of truth and honesty, of justice and pity, of kindness and courtesy ; we have wrangled and worried for so long concerning the teaching of religion in schools that we have failed altogether to realise that these fundamental notions of morality are a far more essential part of school training ; the Inquiry into the Methods and Results of Moral Training in Schools, now being carried out under the auspices of a large and influential committee, is likely, therefore, to be productive of much good in calling attention to this matter." We note also Lady Archibald Campbell's article on "Our Brothers, the Beasts," and Lieut.-Colonel Davy's on "What to Drink." This is a sane medical opinion : "There are states, of which medical men know, in which certain regulated doses of alcohol are beneficial. The same is true of every other powerful drug. The notion that it is a food, to be taken every day as a matter of course, is a wholly pernicious one. People who are in health do not add to that state by taking wines and spirits."

"Here in England," he concludes, "we may assuredly say that without alcohol Hearts would be stronger."

Life would be longer,

In the Albany Review Mme. Savinkov completes her painful personal narrative, "A Russian Mother" (1897-1905), telling of the incredible callousness and cruelty of the repressive Government, and the tragic result in her own family. M. Paul Sabatier has a short article on "The Bishops' Declaration of January, 1907: A Significant Episode in the Struggle between France and the Holy See," showing how the Bishops were compelled by the Pope to a policy entirely opposed to their patriotism and their better judgment. In a note M. Sabatier says :—"It cannot be too often repeated that the Separation Law, far from robbing the Church of its property, assured it to it indefinitely through the associations for worship. Since the great majority of the Episcopate was willing to fall in with the law by forming these legal and canonical associations, the responsibility for the loss of the church property must be laid at the door of Pius X., and of Pius X. alone. Those who try to stir up disturbance by declaring that the French Government has robbed the Church either have not read the law of December, 1905—in which case they are guilty of culpable carelessness—or else they show their contempt for those who listen to them by the attempt to give historical currency to a lie."

I AM certain that it is impossible to keep the law towards one's neighbour except one loves him. The law itself is infinite, reaching to such delicacies of action that the man who tries most will be the man most aware of defeat. We are not made for law, but for love. Love is law, because it is infinitely more than law.—George Macdonald.

IN THE CROW'S NEST.

"So you have been in the Rosegtal," said the Dean. "Did you see any chamois?"

"Not a horn," I confessed.

"Come with me, then, and I will show you some." So on the day fixed I called at the Pontresina Pfarrhaus, and we dropped down together to the Punt Ota. Here the Bernina runs through a dainty little gorge, worthy of Devonshire. I had peered down into it in the summer with delight, and was curious to see how it looked in its winter festoons. Unfortunately, I glanced over the wrong parapet.

True, the river was transformed into a miniature glacier, the rocks were hung with gigantic icicles, and all was clad in the elfin tints and rounded grace of snow that covers rock and frozen torrent. But, alas! it wore another coat as well—fragments of paper, match-boxes and tins, grey ash, brown ash, the miscellaneous refuse of the dust-bin.

I started back in dismay. The President of the Synod of Graubünden laughed. "Yes," said he, "this is the locus infamis of Pontresina. It was here that Vergerius flung the altar and images out of the church, in the Reformation time."

"Vergerius? Was he here too? He seems to have been everywhere."

"He was here for a day or two," replied the Dean, as we moved on towards the opening of the side valley; "long enough to reform us. It was on his journey from Poschiavo to St. Gallen, in 1549. He happened to pass the night here when the parish was just about the business of electing a Pfarrer. The landlord of the inn—it stood up there by the gate of the cemetery; the older village was further up the hill than modern Pontresina—"

"Which accounts for the situation of that queer old tower. You must tell me about it some day."

"There is nothing to tell except that it is an old tower, of immemorial origin, called La Spagnola. The landlord of the inn was president of the Church Council. The two got into talk.—Those two girls there are very bold ski-runners. They belong to the Kronenhof. We had a big ski tournament here on Sunday."

"I saw some of the preliminary heats on Saturday—boys. Very fine leapers some of them were."

"The landlord found that his guest understood Church matters, and, as it happened to be Saturday evening, he asked him to preach next day.—Here we turn off. Keep to the track, please, and excuse my going in front.—A good company gathered in the inn, and after awhile they were all listening to Vergerius denouncing image-worship. He preached on Sunday and again on Monday, and the only question remaining unsettled was, what should they do with the papistical idols."

"It seems a pity to have simply flung such things away. Why not have given them or sold them to the orthodox Veltliners?"

"It was proposed. I wonder if this snow here to the left will bear us. I think we might try. We can get over to that shed and sit down a bit. There are always plenty of chamois on these rocks to our right. It was proposed, but one sturdy bauer cried out, 'What is not good for us will not help anybody else either,' and carried the meeting. So the saints went over the bridge, and Vergerius went on his way to his friend Vadian, and then to Basel."

"To Basel? Was he not Pfarrer in the Bergell?"

"Yes," assented the Dean, "at Vice-soprano. He began early in 1550, and stayed three years. Then he went to Tübingen, at the invitation of Duke Christopher of Würtemberg. But he was here again, and everywhere else, as you say. He made journeys all over Germany, into Bohemia, into Poland. He was well known to the Waldenses. He founded the first German Bible Society. A keen and active reformer!"

"How was he brought over?"

"There, there!" cried the Dean. "Do you see that long snow-shelf, the second from the gorge? On a rock just under—now he's leaped! Look at him across the snow! There's another—three—five—two whole herds there are! Now you have seen some chamois."

But I had seen nothing except snow, rocks, and pines.

"Take this glass, then. Start from this big pine here, with the broken one at its foot. Its top seems to touch a bare rock. Sweep the snow to the left."

There, indeed, they were, the shy, graceful, daring, agile dwellers in the snow-wilderness. The first I saw, in the moment when I saw him, was digging away the snow with his forefeet to reach the scanty, flattened herbage underneath it. No wonder these creatures are fine, clean, and hardy, working as they do for so temperate a dinner in air so pure.

My eyes grew schooled. I made out another and another, then a whole herd together. One stood watch, still as a statue, but with every nerve and muscle alert, like a Landseer stag. One quietly cropped a little patch of brown grass under an overhanging crag. One sauntered leisurely forward, another sprang and stood, sprang and stood, and yet another leaped to a rocky point and seemed to pose there for the camera, gracefully rigid, so that I could see the moulding of his horns, the shading of his face.

While we sat watching, another and much bigger herd came down the gorge, ventured a little way on the snow-slope, and sprang about the rocks. I saw one appear alone at the rim of a precipice, and wondered by what roundabout route he would join his brethren below. He simply jumped down that sheer wall in six or seven enormous springs, finding heaven knows what inch of foothold, and astonished me so mightily that I found myself feebly murmuring "I wish I could do that!"

We rose at length, crept gingerly over the thin crust, reached the harder track, and began our return. But, like Thames, leaving his beloved Mole, I "could hardly on," from those herbivorous mountain spirits "so loath I was to go."

"—to convert Luther," the Dean was saying; "and as it turned out Luther converted him. He lost a cardinal's hat through it. Clement VII. made much of him, and had appointed him"—I forget what my friend said—"and he was afterwards"—something else—"to Paul III. But when he began to correspond with heretics the Inquisition got on his track. He managed to escape sentence—you see, he was a practised jurist, in Verona and Venice, Padua too, before he took to divinity—but he had to be contented with a bishopric instead of a principedom. He remained in the Catholic Church as long as he could, like some few others, 'silent reformers,' and would have testified at Trent if they had allowed him. 'If they treat me as they treated Huss I am quite ready,' he said."

My thoughts leaped to the great boulder on the burning-place outside Constance, Huss's monument, and the incongruous picture postcard booth beside it; to the dwelling-house, the prison, the savage council hall, the perjured minster. What a splendid thing it is to be so much on fire within for some Divine cause that one fears no fire from without! Who pities Huss? Who does not pity the miserable, conscience-smitten emperor?

"—recanted out of sheer terror," a voice proceeded; "and then, in despair, killed himself."

"I beg your pardon. Who did?" I was forced to ask.

"He was called Spiera. It was perhaps the loss of this friend, and the suspiciously sudden death of his own brother that led Vergerius to make public renunciation of the Papal Church."

"When was that?"

"In 1548, in Padua. He came to Chiavenna—Bündnerland then, you know—and to Poschiavo, where he founded the great missionary press. Pope Pius V.—"

"Was not that Ghisleri?"

"Yes, the arch-inquisitor—did all he could to collect and burn books of Landolfi's printing. But they did a mighty work, a mighty work.—Here comes the communal gamekeeper."

We stopped and chatted. He had trapped a marten, and enlarged on the wickedness of that species (he keeps fowls). He said that in the spring before last, when the snow was gone, he found the skeletons of forty-three chamois that had been carried off by avalanches. His dog, who evidently believed in me, suspected the chief cleric of this canton of larcenous designs on his master's implements, game-bag, and ski, and made it necessary for us to move on.

"Those mountains on our right," said the dean, "as far as the Morteratsch Valley, are free mountains. Not a shot can be fired at a chamois in that sanctuary. Our friend there says they understand our game laws as well as a Christian, and on the first of September he sees them crossing in troops."

I wanted to show my chamois to Corva and the Corviculi, and a friend in Pontresina kindly arranged a party for the purpose. But before the appointed day came heavy snow and then mild winds, and the avalanches began to bombard the valley floor, so that our expedition was abandoned. I wonder how many chamois will be overwhelmed this year!

What a shame it is to shoot them!

IN THE ACADEMY.

THERE are plenty of pictures in this year's Academy, as we said in a brief note last week, which it is a pleasure to remember and to return to again and again; and we propose, in this brief notice, simply to disregard the ugly things which unfortunately are also there.

The exhibition has a pleasant beginning with Mr. Colin Mitchell's "Wild Flowers and Scotch Firs" (2) and "Signals from the 'Victory'" (3), one of the five pictures of Mr. W. L. Wyllie, the R.A. elect; and close by is Mr. Wetherbee's picture (16) to which we referred last week. One of the many pictures the children will like in this exhibition is Mr. A. E. Proctor's "A Posy for Grandmother," and we always like what the children like. Mr. C. M. Padday's "Landing of the Pilgrim Fathers" (27) is one of the most striking of the historical pictures, and the "Funeral of King Charles I." (266), by Mr. Ernest Crofts, R.A., is another; both winter scenes, but of very different sentiment. The strong Puritan character in the Pilgrims' faces is finely presented.

The portrait of the year we find in the second room, "Portrait of an Elderly Gentleman" (137), by Briton Riviere, R.A. We prefer his coat even to the gorgeous apparel of "His Majesty the King" (161); and beyond the work of some of the greater artists, partly no doubt because of the fine subject, we are drawn to Mr. Hugh Riviere's "Captain David Beatty, R.N." (831). That is a man to trust, and there is some satisfaction in looking into those clear eyes.

"The Town Mouse and the Country Mouse" (142), by Mr. G. D. Leslie, R.A., is another of the children's pictures, and we must all be fascinated by Mr. W. Logsdail's "An Early Victorian" (524). Mr. Gotch's "Golden Youth" (520) is also not to be overlooked. Mr. Frank Dicksee's "Doria" is more beautiful than many.

Among the landscapes this year, while there is no great picture, there is a full measure of delight. Mr. E. T. Compton does not, perhaps, come up to his "Saleinaz Glacier" of last year, but still there is great power in his "Awful hills, whose sides of strength are belted round with all the zones" (568). It is refreshing to be with him on the great heights among the snow, and then one may return to green pastures and still waters, as in Sir Ernest Waterlow's "Yorkshire Dale" (193), with the long reach of river and the hills beyond. Beautiful country, with all the variety to be found within our own shores, we have in Mr. Aumonier's "Dulas Valley" (765), Mr. Yeend King's "The mill meadows" (400) and "In the shade of the oak" (486); Mr. Alfred Parsons' "Hillside Farm" (247) and "All in the blue unclouded weather" (521), both reminiscent, if we mistake not, of Broadway Hill and the country stretching away into the Vale of Evesham; and then, among our Lake hills, Mr. Frank Carter's "In the heart of Borrowdale" (104) and Mr. J. H. Crossland's "Mountain Ghyll, near Coniston" (411).

There is a glory of apple blossom in Miss Lucy Kemp-Welch's "Morning of the year" (371); and in a very different style, a no less vivid bit of autumn in Mr.

H. H. La Thangue's "Sussex Autumn" (156). Further afield there is Mr. MacWhirter's "Lake of Lucerne" (513); and no less fascinating, Mr. H. H. Stanton's "Segovia, Spain" (344).

The sculpture this year is of special interest, but we must only note Mr. Hope Pinker's marble bust of the late Sir J. S. Burdon-Sanderson (1730) and Mr. Brock's "Motherhood" group (1796) part of the National Memorial to Queen Victoria.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

LEGENDS OF THE SAINTS.

I.—SAINT MARGARET.

WE often meet with the names of saints when we look at pictures, both in the galleries that we have in England, and in those in foreign cities; and it is interesting to know who they are and the stories told about them. In the old days in the Church, men and women were called "saints," who were looked upon as specially holy, and sometimes very beautiful and sometimes very curious stories are told about them.

Among all the saints of those early days there can hardly be one more sweet and winning than St. Margaret. Her short life was yet long enough for her to learn those lessons which are best worth our knowing, and who was so gentle and good that she has always been chosen as one of the great patronesses of women. The legend about her is strange and impossible, but all the same it is beautiful, and one from which we can learn a great deal.

She was born at Antioch, so the story goes, in the early days of the Church, when there were still cruel persecutions because the rulers of the people had not yet become Christians.

As a little child she was not strong, and was sent to live with a nurse in the country. This made a great difference in her life, for the nurse was one of the many secret believers in Christ. Here little Margaret lived and grew up, amongst good and holy people, who taught her early how beautiful Christ's life had been. Some artists have painted her as a shepherdess, with daisies in her hair, tending sheep upon a green hillside, and it is quite likely that while living in the country she helped to look after the sheep, and these long quiet hours out of doors would give her plenty of time for her own thoughts.

She grew up so fair and gentle that when, one day, the governor of Antioch happened to pass by the place where she lived, he was struck with her beauty, and tried to persuade her to be his wife. But she refused, telling him that she was a Christian, which in those days was a terrible thing to declare.

"What!" he said to her, in great amazement, "so beautiful a maiden, and you adore the crucified Nazarene!"

Then St. Margaret answered, "How dost thou who art not a Christian know that he was crucified?"

"By the books belonging to Christians," replied the governor.

"Then, why," she said, "if thou dost read, why dost thou refuse to believe?"

He was so angry at her question that he ordered her to be thrown into prison and kept in misery until she would say she no longer believed in Christ. Then it was, while she was lying on the stone floor of a dark and dreary dungeon, with no prospect before her but that of death, that the strange part of her legend is said to have happened. It was said that a horrible dragon with flaming breath came upon her out of a dark corner of the dungeon. Some say that she made the sign of the cross and the dragon fled, but a still stranger version of the story is that the dragon swallowed her, but immediately burst, and she stepped forth unhurt, and, putting her foot upon his neck, she held him in her power until he promised to leave her. It is, of course, only a fairy story, but we may see a meaning in it. We may imagine that in prison she had to face some dreadful trial, perhaps from her persecutors' tempting her to give up her faith. But, whatever it may have been, she overcame it, even though she was a helpless girl among strong and cruel men, and it was to her like trampling a dreadful dragon under foot. The next day it was decreed that she must die, and she was so brave and true to the very last that many people afterwards followed her example and became Christians. She became a favourite saint in Europe, the type of modesty and gentleness, and her name was given to the little modest flower, the daisy.

A great many churches have been built in her honour in England as well as in other countries. From the earliest times she has also been celebrated by artists making her the subject of their pictures. Sometimes, as I told you, she is painted as a shepherdess, with daisies in her hair and in her lap, but more often with her foot on the dragon, and the hem of her robe in his mouth; and sometimes he is crouching on the ground, and she is standing before him holding up a cross.

The best-known picture of St. Margaret is one by the great painter, Raphael, which is in the Louvre at Paris. It shows her in the act of triumphing over the dragon, and another one shows her being crowned by angels. In reading of these early saints, whose lives had something in them which has always appealed to people, and which has influenced the religious and artistic life of different countries, we must try and keep before us the thought of what their stories meant, rather than what they actually were. For instance, we may be reminded by this quite impossible story of St. Margaret that everyone has a dragon of their own to fight—the dragon of doing what is wrong—and we have got to be brave as she was, and set it under our feet. And every one of us is sometimes called upon to stand up for what we know to be right and true. The picture of that brave girl holding up the cross to hold back the false and cruel dragon may help us when our time of trial comes.

THE law of life is this: No one can be good, or great, or happy, except through inward efforts of his own, sustained by faith, and strengthened by the grace of God. The message of the Baptist must be repeated: "Change yourselves, or to you at least no kingdom of God can come."

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

PARENTS with growing boys have no easy task in deciding upon their schools. If it be urged that there is abundance of choice, that very fact, alas, only embarrasses the case. Moreover, general principles must be considered and prior questions settled, before particular schools can be discussed. Shall it be a Preparatory School or a Public School? Shall it be a Day School or a Boarding School? Shall religious teaching be a sine qua non? Shall they search for foundation scholarships to lessen the great expense? These are not fictitious queries, but real parental anxieties.

The great public boarding school has been set up as an idol, and parents with long purses have bowed low before this image, relegating their own responsibilities to popular house masters, and accepting whatever forms and traditions might be in force. Eton and Harrow have magic in their very names; Rugby was idealised by Dr. ARNOLD; Winchester and others can boast historic old foundations; Marlborough and Charterhouse stand in fine situations. But Dr. MARTINEAU has not been the only one to question, and even condemn, some of the features of the great boarding school system, for doctors and educational reformers, in increasing numbers, are breaking away from its worship in many respects. Many are the confessions in recent biographies, of the miseries and disasters attendant upon being plunged too young into the whirlpool of a big boarding school curriculum.

The preparatory school would seem, then, to offer the first solution, and much good work is there done for education. But, unless the smaller school be in recognised and organic relation with the larger one, there is no continuation of curriculum, and an awkward break puts the course out of joint, thus involving much waste of time and effort. Although a few preparatory schools attempt to obviate this, such dislocations are always taking place. These junior schools, moreover, lack the background of elder boys.

There is, again, the religious difficulty, which is, admittedly, not imaginary, and need not arise from any sectarian jealousy. Many of the old foundations enjoin, whilst others assume, a distinctively Church of England teaching. To set against this, the larger denominational schools founded for the education of Non-conformists, can hardly keep clear, even should they so desire, of a denominational flavour. In either form, exemption from the teaching subjects the absentee to the penalty of peculiarity.

For most open scholarships on the foundation there is a keen eliminating competition, which only secures the "no fees" to the cleverest boys.

The need of the situation is an institution which can offer the blended ideal of a Preparatory and a Public School, which can avoid at the same time the break of transition and the jar of a big school system, and which can further offer and secure an unsectarian religious instruction.

The prospectus of Willaston School, Nantwich, seems to us to adequately furnish that for which many parents are in search. Under its new head master, Mr. H. L. JONES, this school offers unique advantages which ought to assure for it increasing numbers and success. It provides a liberal education on public school lines, but it admits boys of eleven years of age, and takes them right through to the Universities. There are an Upper and a Lower School, also a Classical and a Modern side. It is a boarding school with all the usual advantages, but without the attendant drawbacks. Religious knowledge is one of the set subjects, but the aim of the religious teaching is to instil a simple Christian faith, and promote a personal religious life. Attention is devoted particularly to the history of religious liberty, and the instruction is entrusted to teachers free from dogmatic tests. Special attention is also given to the study of English literature and history. The books in the School library are selected carefully, and advice is given in matters of reading.

The school buildings are modern and spacious, including large dining hall, library, class rooms, private studies, three dormitories, all ranged round a quadrangle and connected by light and airy corridors. There is also a gymnasium, sanatorium, two five's courts, cricket and football fields, and allotment gardens for each of the boys.

The school grounds occupy twenty-four acres in the open country, and in a situation remarkably healthy, the soil being sand and gravel. Careful and individual attention is given to physical training, and the household arrangements are in the hands of an experienced matron. We know some of the present Willastonians, and also a few of the old boys; they all speak of the school in loyal terms, which is no slight test. We have also seen copies of the interesting "Willaston School-Chronicle," with its accounts of the wonderful school debates, and delightful excursions, and tuneful concerts. Great importance is attached to music as a social and recreative factor in the school life, the head master being both an enthusiast and a proficient in this respect.

We feel that Willaston not only offers many advantages to our boys, but also has distinct claims upon ourselves, because of the broad and open position of its religious teaching. Knowing what Civil and Religious Liberty mean to us and our Free Trust Churches, we are not a little anxious that our sons should warmly embrace these same foundation principles. For this reason Willaston holds a very important position.

In accordance with the will of the founder, provision is made for a certain number of boys as foundationers, who are admitted at one half the full fees. We heartily wish that some means could be devised, some fund subscribed, whereby the sons of our ministers, as in other Churches, might be helped to reap the advantage of this privilege, which is still in many cases beyond their reach.

It will be sorrowful news to many that Dr. John Watson (Ian Maclaren) is dead. He had left Liverpool, having closed his twenty-five years' ministry at the Sefton Park Presbyterian Church, and was on a lecturing tour in America, when he was struck down by an attack of tonsillitis, followed by blood poisoning, and passed away at Mount Pleasant, Iowa, on Monday morning, May 6. He was only 56, having been born November 3, 1850. He was President elect of the Evangelical Free Church Council, and if he had returned home, it was expected that he would have succeeded to the Principalship of the Westminster College at Cambridge. Dr. Watson told us some little time ago how he had intended to be a farmer, but on his mother's persuasion became a student for the ministry at Edinburgh, and afterwards proceeded to Tübingen. His ministry began in Scotland, and he had two years at the village church of Logiealmond, which he afterwards idealised in his stories as Drumtochty. What he afterwards became to Liverpool, both as a minister of religion and a public man, was fully acknowledged at the time of his retirement. As an author he sprang into fame in 1894 with the volume of sketches, "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush," and two years later he published "The Mind of the Master." This, and his Yale lectures on Preaching and Pastoral work, "The Cure of Souls," are the books by which he will be the longest remembered. An appreciation in this week's Christian World mentions that Dr. Watson has left a novel, which will appear as a serial in that journal in the autumn. A further reference to Dr. Watson will be found in Mr. Drummond's "Literary Notes."

THE RELIGION OF UNITARIANS.

THEODORE PARKER.

WHEN Dr. Martineau reviewed, in 1846, Theodore Parker's "Discourse of Matters Pertaining to Religion," he spoke of it as "the confession, at the threshold of a high career, of a great reforming soul, that has thus cleared itself of hindrance, and girded up itself for a faithful future." The book had been published four years before; fourteen years later the high career was ended. How high it was in moral passion, in religious fervour, in vast and penetrating influence, must be read in the biographies. Miss Frances Cooke's little volume published by the Sunday School Association may well serve those who have all too little time for reading, but to whom the story of a brave, gifted, prophetic, and lovable soul is too good to miss. The notes that follow may lead some to make first-hand study of his works.

His works are numerous, filling fourteen volumes. He was pre-eminently a preacher. He left nearly a thousand sermons in MS., and his books contain a rich store of pulpit utterance. On a day early in 1845 it was "Resolved, that the Rev. Theodore Parker shall have a chance to be heard in Boston." The causes leading up to this resolution need not be recounted here. As he said, nearly eight years later, no minister in New England had in the interval "done so much preaching or had so much hearing." He spoke to audiences numbering two thousand, or even three thousand. His public speech was supplemented by abundant private and personal ministration. He travelled lecturing into remote parts; his correspondence was enormous. In the midst of all this ceaseless activity, intensified as it was by theological controversy and political agitation involving him in sternest conflict and actual bodily danger, Theodore Parker never relinquished the habits of severe study by which alone he had been able to struggle into the ministry through the hardships of a youth of privation. In the sense of attracting large numbers of hearers from all classes of the community he was a "popular preacher," but never in the sense of imparting the maximum of emotional quickening at the expense of the minimum of thought. His works teem with evidence of wide reading, of earnest grappling with the severest problems. "Every word that he speaks," wrote Lowell, "has been fierily furnaceed. In the blast of a life that has struggled in earnest." This note of strenuous, self-sacrificing thoroughness distinguishes his writings as it marked his character.

The religion for which Theodore Parker lived and died was based on the revelation of the divine as it dawns inwardly on the thought and conscience. He stood for "free Individuality of Thought in Matters of Religion." Three great doctrines, he says, made up his scheme of theology. They relate to the Idea of God, the Idea of Man, and the Relation between God and Man.

As to the first of these doctrines, we find in Parker a man who was "very sure of God." To quote again from Lowell: "There's a background of God to each hard-working feature" in the preacher and his preaching. From first to last the reality, greatness, goodness, and tenderness of God remained before his soul's vision, undimmed by philosophic doubts, unshadowed by the sins and sorrows of mankind. The divine Life was for him truly "immanent" in this world of ours. He delighted to contemplate the earth in its endless variety of beauty, flowers and trees, mountains and rivers, beasts and birds, cities and villages, and to trace the one animating Presence everywhere. So deeply was he aware of this Presence, so fully and unreservedly did he declare its effect upon him, that he laid himself open to the charge of sheer pantheism. Note the following, especially observing (a) the absolute acceptance of the notion of divine foreknowledge, and (b) the conviction that the issues of evil are controlled for good:—

"I have taught the Infinite Perfection of God; that in God there are united all conceivable perfections—the perfection of being, which is self-existence; the perfection of power, almightiness; the perfection of wisdom, all-knowingness; the perfection of conscience, all-righteousness; the perfection of the affections, all-lovingness; and the perfection of soul, all-holiness;—that He is perfect Cause of all that He creates, making everything of perfect material, from a perfect motive, for a perfect purpose, as a perfect means;—that He is perfect Providence also, and has arranged all things in His creation, so that no ultimate and absolute evil shall befall anything that He has made;—that, in the material world, all is order without freedom, for a perfect end; and in the human world, the contingent forces of human freedom were perfectly known by God at the moment of creation, and so balanced together that they shall work out a perfect blessedness for each and for all His children." (Sermon: "Some Account of My Ministry," Nov., 1852.)

The charge of pantheism was distinctly repudiated by Theodore Parker. He observes in pantheistic systems a disposition to attribute "progress" to the divine Being. Such a notion was abhorrent to his mind. That there is a progress in the self-manifestation of God he strongly maintained, but he could not endure the thought of a progress necessarily implying defect in One who was already infinitely perfect. And, although the doctrine of divine Immanence was, as we have seen, emphatically the fountain of his religion, he held just as tenaciously to the doctrine of divine Transcendence. There must be qualities in the divine nature beyond our knowing; suffice it that what we know is true so far as it goes. That God transcends the world of matter and of spirit he repeatedly affirms, and that He is other than the Universe of which He is the perfect Cause.

Parker maintained that in the particular of this doctrine of the Infinity of God he differed not only from all anti-Christian sects, but from every Christian sect also. "If the Infinity of God appears in their synthetic definition of Deity, it is straightway brought to nothing in their analytic description of the divine character, and their historic account of His works and purposes."

From the conception of God set forth in the passage quoted above there flows naturally a conception of Man far other than that of "human depravity." "I have taught," says he, "that God gave mankind powers perfectly adapted to the purposes of God"; and he delights to justify the goodness of the bodily life, the adequacy of mind, heart, and conscience to the activities and duties intended for man, and the adequacy of provision naturally forthcoming, with satisfactions for every demand of spirit, intellect, conscience, affections. The "religious faculty" being as "adequate to its function as the practical faculties for theirs," he discards the notion of a miraculous revelation in religion; and, an early evolutionist, he spares no pains to show that theological progress has been as certain, and as natural, as progress in all the arts of civilisation. This progress he confidently expects to continue. It "did not begin with Moses, or end with Jesus." "This power of growth, which belongs to human nature, is only definite in the historical forms already produced, but quite indefinite and boundless in its capabilities of future expansion."

As to the Relation between God and Man, Parker says: "Here are two propositions—first, that God so orders things in His providence that a perfect result shall be wrought out for each; and, second, that He gives a certain amount of freedom to every man. I believe both of these propositions; I have presented both as strongly as I could. I do not mean to say that I have logically reconciled these two propositions, with all their consequences, in my own mind, and still less so to the minds of others. There may seem to be a contradiction. Perhaps I do not know how to reconcile the seeming contradiction; and yet I believe both propositions." Man, being thus free, yet subject to over-rule, is loved of God, "Father and Mother of all men." Each man is loved with God's whole Being. Suffering for error and sin is a fact in this world, but "it is not from the anger or weakness of God that we suffer; it is for purposes worthy of His perfection and His love. Suffering is not a devil's malice, but God's medicine."

As man, being God's child, "has an inalienable right to the infinite providence of God," a right which no sin ever can alienate or nullify, so man owes "religion" to God. Piety and Morality are the internal and external aspects, respectively, of religion; Piety including all noble loves, Morality all obedience to the natural laws written for body and spirit. "Man's consciousness proclaims God's law." "The ordinances" of the religion which we owe to God are, he says, "inwardly, prayer of penitence and aspiration, the joy and delight in God and His gifts; and, outwardly, they are the daily works of life, by fireside and street-side and field-side—'the charities that soothe and heal and bless.' These are the ordinances, and I know no other."

"Of course," he continues, "to determine the religiousness of a man, the question is not merely What does he believe? but Has he been faithful to himself in coming to that belief? It may be possible that a man comes to the conviction of Atheism, but yet has been faithful to himself. It may be that the man believes the highest words taught by Jesus, and yet has been faithless to himself. It is a fact which deserves to be held up everlastingly before men, that religion begins in faithfulness to yourself. I have known men whom the world called Infidels, and mocked at, who yet were faithful among the faithfulest. Their intellectual conclusions I would have trodden under my feet; but their faithfulness I would have fallen on my knees to honour."

The implications, personal, social, and international, of such a scheme of thought are obviously beyond summary. Theodore Parker's own life of zeal for righteousness and truth, his own deep-flowing and wide-spreading affection, are the best commentary upon it. One point only seems to call for emphasis here. It is sometimes urged against the school of pure Theism that, in cutting itself from the roots of a piety nourished on sacraments and heightened by a supreme devotion to the Founder of the Christian Faith, their religious life is deprived of vital currents that are indispensable for the flowering forth of the soul's sweetest blossoms, and that all tends to become pale and colourless in an intellectual atmosphere, indeed, but one lacking personal warmth and glow. However it be with any, it was evidently not so with Theodore Parker. His prayers, of which a goodly number are preserved, are the outpourings of a heart deeply penitent, devoutly aspiring, joyously grateful to the "Father and Mother," as he characteristically named God. Tears were often seen flowing down his cheeks while thus he sought to voice the longings of the heart for himself and the great multitudes who "hung upon him, listening." "That man," said a casual hearer, "speaks to God as if He were his friend." How else? It was noticed of him that when some lovely object, such as a rose, came into his hands, he would bow the head and murmur as a "grace" of thanksgiving, "My heavenly Father." Doubtless, there have been many who, without the image of a Christ to aid them, would have seemed bereft of assurance of the love and tenderness of God. But, as Jesus himself found his Father ever near him, so did this nineteenth century prophet, who, in dying desired that the Beatitudes should be read over his grave.

EXPERIMENTS IN SOCIALISM.—III.

THE SHAKERS.

It has often been said, and probably far more frequently thought, that for any really successful collectivist society there must be some strong religious sentiment to bind it together. The Shaker communities of America have, perhaps, been mainly responsible for this impression. The founders of these singular fanatical bodies went out from England and planted themselves in about the most secluded spot they could find on the Hudson River, something over 130 years ago, and they seem to have been more or less thriving and successful ever since. One has not heard much about them for a long time now. What their numbers are I do not know, and as I am not proposing to write very minutely about them, I do not think it worth while to go to the trouble of finding out. Many years ago I spent an evening with their leading Elder, Frederick Evans, and he told me that in their eighteen separate settlements they were from 8,000 to 10,000 strong. All sorts of writers have given the most fascinating accounts of them. Hepworth Dixon, for instance, says:—"Order, temperance, frugality, worship—these are the Shaker things which strike upon your senses first; the peace and innocence of Eden, when contrasted with the wrack and riot of New York. No jerk, no strain, no menace is observed, for nothing is done, nothing can be done, in a Shaker settlement by force. Everyone here is free. Those who have come into union came unsought; those who would go out may retire unchecked. No soldiers, no police, no judges, live here; and among the members of a society in which every man stakes his all, appeal to the courts of law is a thing unknown."

The most scrupulous cleanliness, quiet, order, harmony, comfort and plenty, characterise the Shaker settlements everywhere. Absolutely everybody works, but nobody is overworked. There is not a gaol or a workhouse, or a single poor person among them. They are a fanatically religious sect. They are entirely celibates and non-combatants. They are out-and-out spiritualists, and it is said that it was from them that modern spiritualism took its rise. In their queer combination there is a strong dash of the Quakers, among whom they originated, and they are very decided Unitarians—of a kind. They reject the idea of the Trinity, and they regard Christ and their foundress, Ann Lee, as elders of their church, to be revered, and loved, but not worshipped. It is an article of their belief that sex runs through the whole range of life, from the Deity downwards, though, strangely enough, their adherence to celibacy is, or used to be, most rigid. Ann Lee, a Manchester woman, the daughter of a blacksmith, who, to the day of her death, never learned to read or write, was the Christ come a second time in female form! There is no doubt at all about the religious belief of the Shakers. Their creed is very pronounced and definite, very strongly and apparently very sincerely held, and very practical in its results; and it has naturally been taken by those who have visited them, almost entirely to account for the undoubted success of their socialism, which, throughout the eighteen settlements into which they are divided, has taken the extreme form of complete communism.

Now it would be folly to dispute the force and effect of religious faith such as this in rendering collective living practicable and successful; but it is at least equally foolish to assume that a collectivist society is not practicable without it. Fanaticism is, no doubt, a great force in the world—while it lasts; but when all has been said and done, there is nothing so forceful, nothing so lasting, nothing so truly religious as the quiet recognition and adoption of a right principle for any and all of the affairs of life. These poor simple Shakers are full of crankiness and are steeped in ignorance. Of the outside world they know little. Only their elders—their chief officers—hold any intercourse with it. Of science or art, or literature—beyond their own sectarian effusions, of which they are said to have a considerable body—they know practically nothing. "If you were setting up your buildings over again," Elder Evans was asked, "wouldn't you aim at something a little more ornamental? wouldn't you try to impart a little beauty to your houses?" "No," the old man replied. "The beautiful, as you call it, is absurd and abnormal. It has no business with us." The elders and all their people are in many respects very little above the level of the uncivilised. But with all their ignorance, and amid all the trumpery of their religious creed, they hold one or two vital principles that are quite sufficient to account for all their success, and any community that will adopt them—whether they call themselves "religious" or not—may attain the same material results.

Now what are these principles? First, that all wealth should be held by the community for the common good. These absurd people profess to believe that they find this in the New Testament, and the curious thing is that an increasing number of the shrewdest thinkers of the day are declaring their belief that that must be the ultimate outcome of any honest application of New Testament teaching. Even assuming this to be the truth, of course it does not follow that the whole fabric of society should be at once subverted, or that we ought to apply the principle as the Shakers have always done. Their plan has been very uncompromising. Every convert to their society before leaving "the world," has always been required to pay his debts, to discharge every obligation, and then to come in and turn out his pockets into the society coffers, to throw all he possesses into the common stock. In the building up of a new society from the beginning that was practicable, and as a matter of fact I suppose it has afforded them the capital to buy up their 100,000 acres of land, on which they have been able to plant their colonies with the one fundamental and all-important condition of success. All the Shakers have collectively owned all the land they occupy.

Starting with the common ownership of the land their next sound principle was to make that, and to keep it, the basis of their whole social scheme. "Every commune," said shrewd old Elder Evans, "must, if it is to prosper, so far as its industry goes, be founded on agriculture.

Whenever we have departed from this rule to go into manufacture, we have blundered." To go into manufacture for the outside market he means. They have their own workshops for the making of what they require for their own use, but when they have attempted to develop these workshops into factories for export, so to speak, or, on the other hand, have been tempted by cheapness to buy from the outside what they could make for themselves, they were soon conscious that they were going wrong. "A community," said the Elder when over seventy years of age, "should as far as possible, make or produce all it requires. We used to have more looms than now, but cloth is sold so cheaply that we gradually began to buy. It is a mistake." In the end they gained little, said the old man, and they imperilled their independence.

To own their own land, to make agriculture the basis of their industrial system, to supplement the farm with the workshop for the making of what they required in addition to food, and thus as far as possible to make themselves independent of all markets outside their own communities, these were all sound, healthy and therefore religious principles requiring no fanaticism, nor, so long as they were adhered to, could any extravagances of fanaticism or folly prevent their successful outworking. But there was yet another principle to which the Shakers were from the first immovably attached, and which they have always with the utmost confidence declared, was of the very essence of New Testament teaching. They have always resolutely eschewed all competitive strife, and have based their industrial system entirely on organised co-operation. Of course they have lost some force. Envy and emulation, rivalry and greed, cunning and pugnacity are undoubted powers in the world, and whenever they are toned down or eliminated either by sane and reasonable religion, or mere cranky fanaticism or anything else, there is loss. But is there no gain? Is there no inspiration in the discovery of the simple principle that wherever there is a man there is a man's work to be done, and that we have only to use the common land and the common capital, and every man will be able to do it? Is there no moving power in the recognition of the principle inherent in the very nature of things, that two men working in friendly co-operation can do more than three men working in mere isolation, and more than four men working in mutual antagonism? Is there really no actual power in brotherly co-operation? and if there is, and men gradually discover the infinite range of its possible operation, is there no religious uplifting in the slowly dawning perception, that we have here not only the teaching of Christ, but a great fundamental principle of all social life? The moral to be deduced from these poor Shakers and their doings, is not that religion is necessary to support the working out of right principles, but that right principles are religion, and that they need only to be applied and, in spite of folly and ignorance and fanaticism, they will solve all our social riddles. We cannot apply them precisely as the Shakers have done, but in our own way we have applied them to some extent and with the most satisfactory results, and when we think fit to bring them to bear on our great and urgent social problems, we shall have on a great national scale social conditions approximating to those of the Shaker societies with all the added advantages to be derived from the most advanced science and intelligence of the day.

GEORGE F. MILLIN.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE fifty-seventh annual meeting was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday evening, and there was a fair attendance of members and friends, who were received by the President, Mr. John Harrison. There was the usual pleasant social prelude, with tea and coffee, before the business began.

THE PRESIDENT having taken the chair, letters of regret were read by the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, the hon. sec., from Mr. Hahnemann Epps and Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke. On the platform the President was also supported by the Treasurer, Dr. C. F. T. Blyth, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., and Mr. Percy Preston.

The Committee's Report, which had been previously printed and circulated, referred to the many signs of renewed activity in the London district during the past year, and recorded with much satisfaction the steps being taken by the Lewisham congregation for the building of their new church, and the similar hopeful prospect at Kilburn. At Wimbledon it was hoped that a minister would soon be settled. At Acton progress was being made, and the iron church in Creffield-road had been opened free of debt. At Kentish Town the efforts of the Rev. F. Hankinson were bearing good fruit. At Forest Gate, Plumstead, and Peckham there was cause for anxiety. At the Mansford-street and Limehouse Missions most admirable work was being done. It was pointed out that with a more adequate income much better work could be done, and the Committee reported the generous offer of an anonymous friend to subscribe £50 a year for five years on condition that another £450 was contributed for the same period. The challenge had been met by the promise of subscriptions of £50 each from the President, Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence and Mr. Charles Hawksley, and the offer would remain open until the last day of June.

The accounts, which showed an expenditure of £589 10s. 7d., had been balanced by a sale of Consols. Annual subscriptions amounted to only £210 18s. 6d., congregational collections to £52 19s. 7d., and income from the Permanent Chapel Building Fund produced £230 1s.

THE PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, dwelt on the encouraging features of their work, especially at Lewisham and Kilburn, and as to the challenge of the friend who offered to subscribe £50 for five years, said that the total promises had so far reached £300 of the £500 required. Their friend's offer was made in grateful remembrance of the late Sir James Clarke Lawrence, who had been one of the founders, and for twenty-five years the president, of that Society. In those days when a New Theology was being preached, very like their old Unitarianism, it was their urgent duty to do their part and help forward the cause of free religion. With a closing word on the inadequacy of their ministers' stipends, Mr. Harrison made an earnest plea for further support.

THE Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS seconded the motion, and told of the great pleasure he had found in visits to Limehouse and Mansford-street, and the admirable work being done there. It was, he said, the best kind of religious work they could do. He was not much of a believer in church building, and certainly not in Gothic churches, for their work. They ought to have homely places, where the people would be glad to come and feel at home.

The report having been adopted, Mr. John Harrison was re-elected President, on the motion of Mr. Percy Preston, seconded by Mr. J. C. S. Mummery. The officers and committee were also elected, the Rev. C. Roper and Mr. R. G. Epps being new members of committee. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, in seconding, suggested that they should consider the election of more ladies than the two they had on the committee.

DR. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., then gave an address, in which he said he really wanted to speak to the Unitarians who were not there, and to urge that more should be done to unite their scattered congregations, and deepen the sense of comradeship in a common work. The moment was opportune, for everything was stirring, and they must not find fault with those who were really allies, though not fighting under their banner. Wherever they went they found an astonishing liberality and eagerness of inquiry. And they, with a gospel they believed in, must let people know of the new truth. It was their bounden duty to go out to them, in that teeming London, in which they ought to have a church at least in every square mile of the city. It was a sin and a shame that their Society should have a subscription list of only £210.

THE Rev. W. G. TARRANT, referring to the close of the President's speech, said some frank things about the struggle with poverty many of his brother ministers had to face, and the folly of expecting a constantly bright and inspiring ministry from men ground down by such trials. Their wealthy and cultured families would not put their own sons to such work, and he asked them to consider what it meant, when they left their ministers in such a plight. They could not expect their work in London to go forward under such conditions, and he earnestly supported the plea which had been made for a larger income for that society.

THE Rev. T. P. SPEDDING then gave an address on the work of the Van Mission. At present they were preparing the ground for the summer campaign, and he warned them not to be disappointed if in the South they did not have such encouraging results as last year in the North. They found, for instance, that on the road between Peterborough and London, in places where they thought of stopping, there was hardly ever any market square where the Van might take up its position, and where the people would congregate. They must be prepared for small results, but he was sure that they would find everywhere an earnest response if they had the courage to speak out. Some of their ministers appeared to hesitate to enter upon that work, but he assured them that they would find, when the call came, that they had the power, and such work would be of the greatest benefit to themselves. Their object was not dogmatism nor proselytism. They had simply to speak the word of life and let their light shine. That was what the people wanted, and they did respond. The Van Mission was one of the ways by which they must go out and win back the people to a rational Christianity.

A cordial vote of thanks to the President, moved by Mr. A. Barnes, and seconded by Mr. T. H. Terry, brought the meeting to a close.

THE LIVERPOOL DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

THE annual meeting of the Liverpool Domestic Mission Society was held at the Mill-street Mission on Friday evening, April 26, the President, Mr. T. Cook, in the chair. The treasurer, Mr. Walter Holland, and Alderman W. B. Bowring wrote regretting their inability to be present.

The Committee's report urged the necessity of raising an additional income of at least £200 a year. The report was adopted, on the motion of the President, seconded by Mr. Councillor Brunner. Mr. Hugh Rathbone moved a cordial vote of sympathy with the missionaries and other workers, and said that they should certainly see to it that the work was carried on without financial anxiety. The Rev. H. W. Hawkes seconded and Mr. R. H. Armstrong supported the motion, which was carried with acclamation, and the Revs. T. Lloyd Jones and J. Anderton responded. Mr. Philip Holt proposed and Mr. Arthur Hall seconded the election of officers and committee, with Mr. Hugh R. Rathbone as president. A vote of thanks to the chair, moved by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, and seconded by Mr. C. Sydney Jones, brought the meeting to a close.

Of the annual meeting of the North End Domestic Mission, which was held at the Hope-street Church Hall, on Thursday evening, April 18, we received no report, but the printed report of the two missionaries, the Rev. J. L. Haigh at Hamilton-road, and the Rev. W. Reynolds at Bond-street, are full of interest. The large hall at Bond-street has been cleaned and painted, and the entrance from the street has been greatly improved. Readers of Mr. Haigh's "Sir Galahad of the Slums" will be specially interested in his report of the work at Hamilton-road. Mr. Kenneth Cook is the hon. sec. of the North End Mission. The report is issued by the Liverpool Booksellers' Company.

BEYOND all wealth, honour, or even health, is the attachment we form to noble souls; because to become one with the good, generous, and true, is to become in a measure good, generous, and true ourselves.—Thomas Arnold.

KHASI HILLS UNITARIAN UNION, INDIA.

SINCE the management of the Khasi Hills Unitarian Union has been taken away from Mr. Kissor Singh, and placed in my hands by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, no report has appeared in the columns of THE INQUIRER as to its present condition and internal affairs. A short account will, I hope, be of some interest to the Unitarian friends in England.

There are at present four churches at different centres, of which three have been considerably strengthened by the admission of new members during the last year.

(1) The church at Nongtraw (Umked) is the youngest of all in age, but it has outdone others in the earnestness of its members. They are, with the exception of two families, extremely poor. The last year was a very bad one for them, famine having visited many of the villages. I could give them only a little help out of a small amount of money remitted to me by the Brahmo Samaj Committee of Calcutta at the request of the hon. treasurer of the B. and F. Unitarian Association. Though these poor, simple, and ignorant people could scarcely get two meals a day, and had not sufficient clothes to protect themselves from cold, they jointly cultivated a plot of land for the benefit of their church. The paddy grown on this land will bring them a little over £3. This amount, together with the sum of 100 rupees kindly contributed by Mr. G. W. Brown, will be spent in the erection of their small chapel. Two new families and several individual members have been lately added to their congregation. Several domestic ceremonies were duly performed according to Unitarian rites, and two marriages registered under the Marriage Act at this centre. The anniversary meetings were held on March 9 and 10 last, which were attended by some Unitarians from Jowai and Nongtalang and several Brahmos from Cherrapoonjee, and were successful in every respect.

(2) The church at Raliang has also a hopeful future before it, there being an addition to its members, and three entire families having lately offered to join it. The Raliang people have lately invited the members of other churches to their anniversary meetings which will take place in September next. As they did never before venture to invite the outside Unitarians to any of their meetings, this new departure simply tends to show their growth in energy and strength.

(3) The Jowai church was in a state of lethargy for more than a year, but it seems to have lately shaken it off. Two new families have been added to the list of its members since November last, and three others are expected to join the Union before long. The anniversary was celebrated with great enthusiasm on March 23 and 24 last, and Unitarians from other centres came to take part in the celebration. Mr. Hajom Kis or Singh made an attempt to take possession of the Jowai chapel by force, and was consequently entangled in a criminal suit from which he could release himself with some difficulty by entering into a compromise with Rev. David Edwards.

(4) The work of the Nongtalang congregation, which is the oldest of all the churches in the hills, has been going on rather feebly on account of the absence of members from the village. Owing to the prevalence of famine last year the struggle for existence has been so very hard that the people have had to devote all their thoughts and energies to gaining a livelihood, and many have been staying far away from their village, being engaged in cultivation, as the prospect for the current year is also very gloomy. With the return of the normal price of food stuff and the recovery of the mission fund from Mr. Kissor Singh, who was formerly treasurer of the Union, and who declines to make over the fund to Mr. D. Edwards, the secretary of the Union, a better prospect for it is expected.

The work of the Union is conducted by five mission workers who have to discharge the twofold duty of preacher and teacher, and at the head of whom is the Rev. David Edwards, who was duly ordained as minister by the Rev. J. T. Sunderland during his visit to India. The second in place is Mr. Mar Singh who resigned his appointment under Government in order to serve the Union. These five workers are paid out of the annual grant of £75 remitted to me by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in quarterly instalments. All the important questions regarding the management of the Union are discussed and decided by an Executive Committee consisting of four representative members from the four congregations, together with Mr. D. Edwards as secretary, Mr. Mar Singh as assistant secretary, and myself as President. There are four day schools in connection with the congregations, at which Unitarian and other children are taught to read and write.

Misleading reports are sent from time to time by Mr. Kissor Singh for publication in the Christian Register. They are all from his own pen, as no one belonging to his so-called "Union" except himself has the power to write such reports. Not to speak of others, his "president" is not even acquainted with the English alphabet, nor can he, I fear, read and write his own mother language. Mr. Singh's union has no connection whatever with the Khasi Hills Unitarian Union, which is related to and helped by the B. and F.U.A. He started his own after he had been unanimously suspended from his membership of the Union for various reasons on April 30, 1905. I took charge of the Union on the following day. I allude to all these facts simply to disabuse the minds of friends interested in the work of the wrong impressions made by these reports. Any one who supplies Mr. Kissor Singh with funds does but put weapons in his hands to destroy the cause of Unitarianism in the Khasi Hills, and to hinder the work of the local Union.

MINISTERS' SALARIES.

SIR,—The question of the salaries of our ministers is one of perennial interest, but it gets no nearer settlement. That ministers, and especially country ministers, are underpaid seems to be generally accepted. It has been suggested that there should be an equalisation of salaries. In other words, that the better-paid town minister should share his stipend with the country minister. The suggestion is futile. There are probably no ministers in our chapels who are paid salaries that can be regarded as high, and even of those receiving comparatively high salaries it may be said that they are not paid more than enough to enable them to take the part in social work and social life that is expected of the minister of a large congregation. In any case, the demands on a city minister make his salary no larger in reality than a country minister's much smaller stipend. Another suggestion, and one that has been acted upon, is that the various congregations should help each other. We have the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which, among other objects, includes that of making grants to struggling congregations, the Ministers' Stipend Sustentation Fund, and the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund, as well as the much older Presbyterian Fund. These are more or less general in their source of income, but there are still a few survivors of the Fellowship Funds, inaugurated about ninety years since by Dr. Thomson, of Halifax, whose idea was that the stronger congregations should each have a fund for aiding weaker congregations. All these funds are doing good work, but I think that apart from the income from investments it will be found that comparatively few purses contribute to them. Ours is usually reckoned a wealthy denomination, and possibly the average wealth is pretty high. Nevertheless, we are but a small denomination, and few of our number can be considered wealthy; and that few does most of the subscribing to most of the funds. In the subscription lists the same names appear again and again. Those who are not wealthy find that they have enough to do to help to maintain the chapel they attend, and yet they are asked and expected to contribute to the work of other congregations.

It seems to me that the true solution of the difficulty in regard to the smaller chapel is to recognise frankly, what I take to be the fact, that these, and more especially the country congregations, do not require a minister's whole time; and that, therefore, it is not necessary to pay him a stipend sufficient in itself to maintain him, the congregation leaving him free to make a living wage in any decent manner. In the old days there were dozens of congregations kept together and chapels maintained on an income that would nowadays be thought absurdly small. The explanation was that the country minister of those days was often something else as well, usually a schoolmaster—sometimes a farmer. Is it not possible to revert to this practice? Sometimes the school was a large one, and one wonders how the master found time to attend to his congregation. Yet it was done, and the congregations under schoolmaster-ministers were kept together and in many cases were flourishing; witness Monton under Robert Smethurst, Gateacre under Dr. Shepherd, Knutsford under Henry Green, and at Manchester under Dr. Beard.

It may be objected that the day of small private venture schools has gone, never to return. I do not think so. Widespread as is our national system of education it has, as yet, made no provision for the requirements of the children of parents who, for one reason or another, dislike the public elementary school, or who would be willing to pay for something they consider to be better. Sometimes this feeling is mere snobbishness, but usually it is a true perception of the fact that the most important part of education is environment. Another form of the same idea is that the country minister should coach men for examinations. It is not every minister who is fitted either by nature of training for the scholastic profession, but still one expects that most of them at least are as fitted for it as the average assistant master in a grammar school. If the minister has no vocation for teaching he would probably be best out of the ministry. There are, of course, other directions in which the country minister might honourably increase his stipend.

The advantages of a reversion to the old practice are many. It would enable many country congregations to be self-supporting, it would give useful employment to ministers who, at present, have really not enough to do, it would throw pastoral visiting from the afternoon to the evening, and so give the minister a chance of directly interesting the men folk in the work of the chapel, and bring the minister into closer touch with people of other denominations. From one point of view it would be an advantage that the minister would not be so entirely dependent (financially) on his congregation.

Our ministers have often distinguished themselves by their manly disregard of the consequences when they thought principle was involved, and though it may not always tend to the immediate peace of mind of the congregation it is good at times for the plain unvarnished truth to be preached to it. Our ministers would be more free to do this if they could afford to snap their fingers at the usually small part of their congregation who resent the truth, or who have not yet learned to allocate to themselves all the pleasing and complimentary remarks from the pulpit, and to their neighbour in the next seat those of another character. Besides strengthening the moral fibre of the ministers, I think a little more work (I am referring only to those who obviously have not enough) would be a good thing mentally. These remarks are not written in any spirit of hostility to the minister either in town or country, but are the result of an attempt to apply business methods to our congregational methods.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Ashton-under-Lyne (Induction).—A service for the induction of the Rev. John Barron as minister of the Richmond-hill Church was held on Saturday afternoon, May 4, in the new church, the opening of which we reported last week. Principal Gordon gave the charge to the minister and the Rev. J. E. Manning the charge to the congregation. There was a large congregation, including a number of neighbouring ministers of our own and other churches.

Blackpool: South Shore.—The anniversary services were held on Sunday, May 5, when the Rev. Alexander Gordon preached morning and evening, and at the children's service in the afternoon also gave the address. There were good attendances at the services, and the collections were very satisfactory.

Burnley.—On Sunday last a portrait of the late Thomas Bibby, one of the pioneers of the Unitarian movement in the town, was unveiled in the church parlour of the Trafalgar-road Church after evening service. The portrait, which is an enlarged photograph, is the gift of the three sons of the late Alderman Bibby, and it was unveiled by Mr. Peter Bibby, who spoke of what his father had to face in the early days of their struggle for the faith, and his unflinching fidelity. Mr. J. Farrer presided, and Mr. J. S. Mackie moved the vote of thanks for the gift.

Chelmsford.—The quarterly meetings were held on Sunday, April 28. A very enjoyable tea was held in the chapel. The service was conducted by Mrs. Page Hopps, who preached from the text "Rejoice in the Lord, O ye righteous," an able and outspoken sermon. At the conclusion of the service the secretary declared a small deficit on the quarter's accounts.

Hinckley.—The Sunday-school anniversary sermons were preached on Sunday last, by the Rev. A. Hermann Thomas, of Leicester, and greatly appreciated by crowded congregations. There was the usual singing by scholars and choir, with an additional anthem at night. There was a record collection.

Halifax.—The Rev. Charles Peach conducted the services at Northgate-end Chapel on Sunday last, and in the morning delivered a special address in connection with the Jubilee Memorial movement of the Unitarian Home Missionary College.

Horsham.—The chapel, which has undergone a complete renovation, was re-opened for worship on Sunday last, when sermons appropriate to the occasion were preached by the Rev. J. J. Marten. Floor and ceiling have both been repaired, the walls coloured a restful green, the woodwork cleaned and varnished, and a new matting laid down; the expense is estimated at about £50, half of which was contributed by the Sewing Circle in connection with the church, the result of their successful sale of work in the autumn. Improvements to the lighting, new blinds, and the re-lettering of the monumental tablets on the walls have also been contributed by members of the church, and the result is a very pleasing one. During the winter months an interesting series of lectures on various subjects were delivered to good audiences; one on "Mazzini," by the Rev. F. K. Freeston; on "The Boot of Italy," Rev. W. C. Pope; on "Shakespeare's Mother," by Dr. Blake Odgers, K.C., and on "William Penn, Quaker and Coloniser," by the Rev. H. Rawlings. These were closely followed by another, of a somewhat different character, given by the Rev. J. Harwood, on "The New Theology, or Unitarianism in relation to Jesus Christ." This also was well attended and much enjoyed. On Sunday, April 28, services in the schoolroom (which was used as a place of worship whilst the chapel was closed for repairs) were conducted by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, of the Provincial Assembly. Now the congregation are hoping for a fine day, and a gathering of many friends from far and near, to celebrate their 134th Whitsuntide annual meeting. Both lunch and tea are provided in the schoolroom for visitors at moderate charge; the Rev. Alfred Hall, of Norwich, is the preacher; and the country-side is donning its freshest and loveliest green robes to offer the most beautiful welcome of all to its guests.]

London: Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel.—At the invitation of the Sunday-school teachers a social meeting of parents of the scholars was held on Monday evening, April 29, when about seventy parents attended and partook of refreshments. The Rev. W. L. Tucker presided, and remarked how pleased the teachers were to see so many of the parents amongst them. He recognised that most of them were hard at work during the week, and on that account were not always able to attend the services on Sunday, but they sent their children to the school to represent them. Messrs. A. A. Tayler and James Welch, the superintendents, and Messrs. W. S. Tayler, A. W. Harris, and H. H. Quarumby, gave a hearty welcome to the parents. Songs and recitations added greatly to the pleasure of the evening.

Long Sutton.—The Rev. W. Harvey Smith, Messenger of the General Baptist Assembly, has been welcomed as minister of this congregation, and entered last Sunday upon his new charge.

Manchester: Blackley.—A social gathering of the members was held on April 25, by invitation of the Ladies' Sewing Society, to celebrate the extinction of the debt on the new school building. The balance of the debt (£100) had been raised by subscription amongst the members, who responded generously to the appeal made to them. The Rev. W. Holmshaw, who presided, spoke of the work they had accomplished and expressed the great satisfaction they all felt at the happy result of their efforts. The new schools were opened in March, 1901, and cost £1,600, of which sum more than three-fourths has been raised by the members of the congregation.

Manchester: Longsight.—The anniversary services on Sunday last were interesting from the fact that the Rev. William Rosling made his first visit to Manchester since the establishment of his new church at Bradford, subsequent to his relinquishing the position of Congregational minister in that town. Owing, no doubt, partly to the genial summerlike day, the collections were considerably below the average of the past few years, but those present heartily appreciated Mr. Rosling's sermons. At the evening service an excellent rendering of Spohr's cantata, "God, Thou art Great," was given by the choir. In the afternoon there was a musical service.

Sheffield: Attercliffe.—The first anniversary services in commemoration of the opening of the school church were held on Sunday, May 5. The Rev. C. J. Street preached to a fair congregation in the afternoon, and the Rev. C. Hargrove in the evening, about 150 being present. The collections at both services were very good. The birthday party was held on Monday, 56 sat down to tea, and about 70 listened to short congratulatory speeches by the Revs. J. Ruddle, A. H. Dolphin, C. J. Street, J. W. Cock, and Mr. Wilson. Musical selections were interspersed, and Mr. Reuben Jones presided.

Southport (Farewell Presentation).—A meeting to bid farewell to the Rev. F. B. Mott was held at the Portland-street Church on Wednesday evening, May 1, when some seventy members of the congregation were present. Dr. W. N. Maccall presided. The hostesses for the evening were Mrs. Tolme, Mrs. Hudson, Mrs. Kleiter, Mrs. Maccall, and Miss Hudson. The chairman, in welcoming the company, spoke of the great affection and appreciation in which Mr. Mott was held by them all, and the sorrow they experienced in being compelled to part. They wanted to convey their appreciation in some tangible form, and that was their reason for coming together that night. Mr. C. E. Hudson, treasurer of the church for nearly thirty years, read an address to Mr. Mott, which had been beautifully illuminated. The address, which was signed by 97 members of the congregation, expressed great regret at parting from Mr. Mott, and said: "We wish to convey to you our appreciation of the services you have rendered us and the church during the three years you have been with us, our admiration for the eloquence and spiritual insight of your preaching, and our thanks for your sympathy as pastor and friend. We trust that ere long you will find a congenial sphere of work, with still larger opportunity for the exercise of your powers and qualities as a minister, for the benefit of the people among whom you labour, and for the advancement of our Unitarian cause." The address concluded with earnest good wishes for Mr. and Mrs. Mott and their children. Miss Sophie Hudson then handed a purse containing £92 to Mr. Mott, and Miss Kleiter presented a handsome basket of flowers to Mrs. Mott. Dr. W. E. A. Axon, F.L.S., said he had great pleasure in being present and joining in that tribute of respect and affection to their friend Mr. Mott. Mr. Mott had always seemed to him to have what was an essential in a preacher. He had thought his own thoughts, and, having given his best consideration to his subject, he had spoken from the heart to the heart of his hearers. Mr. Franklin Hilton, Mr. A. D. Rose and Mrs. Tolme joined in the expressions of regard and gratitude to Mr. and Mrs. Mott, and the Rev. F. B. Mott, who was heartily received, thanked them for their present and their words. He had been, he said, through a good many experiences in his life, in foreign countries, as well as this. Strange experiences many, and very trying some, but he was in a position that night which was quite unique in his experience. He could only say how deeply their hearts had been touched and strengthened by this expression of love, which he received on behalf of his wife and children and himself. In conclusion, the chairman remarked that he hoped Mr. Mott would always remember that such a large part of his congregation had so thoroughly appreciated his qualities both as a minister and as a man.

HOME IRONING IN COMFORT

and perfect safety can only be done by use of the "Dalli" Iron or the "Dallinette" (a smaller "Dalli.") To use them is the best, most simple and most comfortable way of ironing. Independent of stove and gas it can be used anywhere. Self-heating with non-inflammable fuel without noxious fumes, therefore no risk from fire. Healthier and safer than any other iron.

The "Dallinette" is a smaller "Dalli." Really excellent for light work and travelling. For general household work use the "Dalli." Having a larger ironing surface and greater heating capacity, every description of ironing can be done with it.

Price of the "Dalli" 6/., price of the "Dallinette" 5/9. "Dalli" Fuel 1/9 per box of 128 blocks. Of all Ironmongers and Stores. If any difficulty apply to THE DALLI SMOKELESS FUEL Co., 4 and 6, Moor Lane, London, E.C.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

It is with the greatest satisfaction we announce that M. Paul Sabatier has been good enough to promise a monthly article to THE INQUIRER during the continuance of the religious crisis in France. His first article, which we hope to publish immediately after Whitsuntide, is on "The Revival of Catholic Thought in France," with special reference to a notable book by M. Le Roy on "Dogma and Criticism."

FROM the Librairie Fischbacher, Paris, we have received a little book of M. Sabatier's, an Open Letter to Cardinal Gibbons on his recent manifesto concerning the separation of the Churches and the State in France. M. Sabatier takes up the Cardinal's manifesto, which appeared in the Baltimore Sun of December 14, 1906, and goes through it point by point, explaining its misconceptions and refuting by a plain statement of fact its misrepresentations of the religious situation in France, concluding with the expression of an earnest hope for Catholicism as distinguished from Clericalism in France, and a plea for reform in the method of the appointment of bishops.

APOLOGISING at the end of his letter for any inadvertent informality in his method of address, M. Sabatier suggests to the Cardinal that his own conscience may not be altogether clear of sin in that respect, and then in a footnote explains this reference of his letter by telling a good story. It seems that when Cardinal Gibbons, on his appointment as a Prince of the Church, went for the first time to the Vatican to offer his homage to the Pope, he actually went on foot. Imagine the scandal among the officials, and the tone of voice in which he was given to understand that in Rome a Cardinal only went out in a carriage. So the Archbishop, conciliatory by nature, on his second visit took a cab. But, alas! it was explained to him, with an air even more sombre than on the first occasion, that a Cardinal's carriage should have two horses. The third time, therefore, he went by tram!

DURING Whit-week the Book Room at Essex Hall will be transformed, as last year, into a reception room, but nevertheless the books, and especially the new books, will be within reach of those who are anxious to see and to buy. The second volume of Dr. Martineau's "Endeavours After the Christian Life," in the new six-penny edition, is now ready, and we would also call attention to the reprint, in the same popular series, of Dr. Freeman Clarke's "Materialism and Atheism Examined," with a valuable introduction by Dr. S. H. Mellone. Other new books, which friends who have not yet got them should secure, are the Rev. W. J. Jupp's "Religion of Nature and of Human Experience," Dr. Crothers' Essex Hall Lecture of last year on "The Making of Religion," Dr. Edwin Odgers' admirable edition of "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," with introduction and notes, and most recent of all, Professor Wernle's "Sources of our Knowledge of the Life of Jesus," translated by the Rev. E. W. Lummis. Ask also to see some of the publications of the American Unitarian Association, and especially Robert Collyer's little book on Father Taylor.

WHILE our Anniversary Meetings are being held in London next week, our friends of the German Protestantverein will be assembled at Wiesbaden. The first meeting is on Wednesday morning (in the house "Wartburg," 35, Schwalbacher St.), when the Rev. Alfred Fischer will give an address on the situation in Germany and the immediate problems of liberal churchmen. In the evening there will be service in the Ringkirche, when Pfarrer Jatho of Köln will preach, and later a popular meeting will be held in the Kaisersaal, 15, Dolzheimer St. On Thursday, questions of religious instruction in the schools, the rights of the congregation in church government, with a demand for reform, and the relation of the Church to the life of the people will be considered. On Friday morning, the People's Church and the Confessional Church is the subject for discussion. Social functions complete the programme, and we wish it were possible to be in two places at once!

It was a quite unexpected pleasure to welcome Dr. M. J. Savage at Essex Hall on Tuesday afternoon. He arrived in this country with Mrs. Savage and Mrs. Simons last Saturday, having sailed from Boston by the same boat which brought the Rev. L. P. Jacks home from the States. Dr. Savage, who is a lover of great cities, has come to London for rest and quiet, and is not to be worried by meetings or anything of the kind. He hopes to spend some months in this country.

THE Rev. John Hunter, D.D., preached in Manchester College Chapel, at Oxford, last Sunday morning and evening, in the evening giving a lecture on Frederick Denison Maurice. On Monday afternoon Dr. Hunter gave the first of three public lectures on "Church and City," the subject being "The Ideal of a City Church." Next Monday the subject is "Religion and the Duties of Citizenship," and on May 27, "The Training of the Citizens of the Future."

THE annual meeting of the National Conference Union for Social Service is advertised in another column. The programme for the summer meeting to be held at Manchester College, Oxford, July 8—13, is now ready, and should secure a large attendance of members of our churches. Among the lecturers are Mr. Percy Alden, M.P., the Revs. Philip Wicksteed and Kirkman Gray, Mr. Lees Smith, Vice-Principal of Ruskin Hall, and Miss Clementina Black, who is to give two lectures on "The Public Conscience and Underpaid Labour." Miss H. M. Johnson and Mr. Seebohm Rowntree are to introduce the subject of "The Drink Traffic—Disinterested Management." The session opens with a reception by the Principal of Manchester College on the Monday afternoon. The membership fee is 2s. 6d., and inquiries and applications for tickets are to be addressed to Miss Catherine Gittins, Salisbury-road, Leicester.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:—Letters, &c., received from C. D. B., D. B., J. M. C., B. K. G., C. G., F. A. L., S. J. McG., J. M., R. J. O., F. M. S., H. S. S., E. L. H. T., W. J. W.

MR. CAMPBELL AT OXFORD.

THE Rev. R. J. Campbell addressed a meeting of over a hundred University men in the library of Manchester College, Oxford, on Monday afternoon, on "The Present Condition of Liberal Religious Thought." Dr. Hastings Rashdall presided, and after his address Mr. Campbell replied to a number of questions as to his own position as an exponent of the "New Theology." The meeting, which was of a private nature, was arranged by a committee of students, and their gratitude for the hospitality of Manchester College was warmly expressed.

In the evening of the same day Mr. Campbell gave an address on "The Evangel of the New Theology," in the Corn Exchange, which was completely filled by an audience of over 600 people, mostly University men. Dr. Carpenter, Principal of Manchester College, took the chair, and Dr. John Hunter opened the meeting with prayer, the collect, "that all our doings without charity are nothing worth," and the Lord's Prayer, in which the assembly joined.

Mr. Campbell's address was listened to throughout with the closest attention, and his references to the social implications of his faith called forth an especially warm response. "I am compelled by my Gospel," he said, "to declare myself a Collectivist," and the address concluded with the appeal of the lines, "There's a day about to dawn,"

"Men of thought and men of action, Clear the way!"

The true meaning of the Immanence of God, the Person of Christ, and the Atonement, were the three chief points on which Mr. Campbell dwelt. As to the first, he set aside the doctrine of unmitigated Pantheism, in which he said nobody really believed, and said that in spite of all argument we are obliged to hold that we have some individual power of self-direction and self-control. As separated portions of the Divine Essence, with our own individual consciousness, we are in our own custody, that we may give ourselves back to God, and mingle our being with the Infinite. The language of Christian devotion went further than any statement of their theory in declaring that God must be all in all. The affirmation that "God became man, that man might become God" he accepted in its most literal interpretation. It was nothing new. It was older than Christianity, they might say it was as old as religious thought. It was what the saints meant by the beatific vision, the union of the soul with God, in which nothing of selfhood would remain, but God be all in all. What was new was not the thought, but its application to the conditions of modern life.

As to what in the light of this doctrine we are to think of Christ, Mr. Campbell said that in Jesus we saw the moral ideal, a consistent self-giving for the common good. In him we saw what humanity meant. Humanity, when true to itself, was divinity. In human nature the Immanent God was giving Himself for the world. It was, in fact, His method of self-expression and self-realisation. And so they could see the true meaning of atonement, love showing itself as self-sacrifice, which was the principle of the Cross. That idea involved the reconstruction of the whole order of society, which was still organised on the principle of selfishness. They must learn the lesson of self-giving for the whole. So Mr. Campbell was brought to his closing appeal.

Dr. Carpenter, in thanking Mr. Campbell for his address, said it was always a high privilege to listen to the perfectly sincere and courageous outpouring of a man's thought and life, and it was such a self-communication they had enjoyed that night. Many of them might not agree with Mr. Campbell, but they must honour him for his courage and absolute sincerity.

The meeting closed with the Benediction pronounced by Dr. Hunter.

"SPINOZA."*

THIS able and readable exposition of the views of the great Pantheist appears opportunely at this time of great theological unrest. Mr. Campbell's treatise on "The New Theology" is a brilliant but utterly inconsistent compound of Oxford Idealism, which is essentially akin to Spinozism, and of the totally different philosophy of religion which is implicit in the New Testament. In some paragraphs of the book we find sin presented, after the complacent fashion of the great Jew of Amsterdam, as simply a necessary phase in the soul's spiritual growth, while in other passages it is spoken of in those strong terms of moral condemnation which express the sentiments of the still greater Jew of Galilee. The more thoughtful of Mr. Campbell's readers cannot long fail to see that in his book the philosophy and the Christianity are only mechanically mixed, and not chemically combined; and the probability is that, while a large majority of them are devoutly hoping, with Dr. Clifford, that the popular orator will ere long drop altogether his Hegelianism and become simply the leading liberal Christian preacher and prophet, a minority of his readers are captivated by the monistic idealism, and would like to have this new philosophy of religion presented in an unadulterated form, and therefore apart from such dogmas as free-will, the personality of God, and individual immortality with which Mr. Campbell's book vaguely and inconsistently associates it.

To persons in this frame of mind Mr. Picton's book strongly appeals. The author of it has not been mainly drawn to Spinoza, as Sir Frederick Pollock was, because the doctrine of the two parallel attributes of thought and extension in the one eternal substance so well accords with the views which Huxley and other scientists held on the relation between matter and mind. Still less does he approach his subject, as Dr. Martineau did, with antagonistic prepossessions. He expounds Spinoza as the disciple expounds the ideas of his teacher; and, indeed, "the Master" is the term which he prefers to use in referring to him. It is as a way of salvation from the depressing Agnosticism into which recent science has driven so many thinkers, that Mr. Picton enthusiastically preaches and expounds the ideas contained in the "Ethica." In his view the days of Christian Theism are numbered, but it will be succeeded by a higher form of religion—a glowing Pantheism inspired by a deep consciousness of identity with the Spirit of the Whole, and seeing in the intellectualis amor Dei the supreme goal of all moral and spiritual aspiration. "In the Ethics," says Mr. Picton, "Spinoza has laid down an impregnable foundation for morals and religion, available for the time now coming upon us."

While we by no means share in Mr. Picton's despair of the future of Christian Theism, and believe that Spinoza's Pantheism is very far from furnishing "an impregnable foundation for ethics and religion," we nevertheless regard the "Ethica" as a work of genius which is most valuable as showing how far the intellect alone can give us insight into God and our relation to Him; and we gratefully acknowledge that Mr. Picton has done high service to present thought in producing a handbook which very clearly expounds Spinoza's main ideas, and, by means of concrete "instances," throws great light on many of the more difficult passages.

Starting with the assumption that we, in our minds and bodies, are limited modes of the two aspects or attributes of the one eternal substance, God, Spinoza contends that so long as we have "inadequate ideas" of reality, we do not see things as God sees them, we do not realise our true position in relation to the infinite whole of which we form a part, and therefore we remain the slaves of our appetites and passions, and fail to attain to that spiritual freedom in which alone true peace and happiness are to be found. By the lessons of experience our insight enlarges; we more and more escape from the enslaving influence of narrow views and narrow sympathies, and become more consciously a part of the life of God. We realise that at every moment we are what we are in virtue of a Divine Necessity, and that this necessity is the expression of God's eternal essence. Hence, as in the conspicuous case of Spinoza himself, our inner life is pervaded by calm resignation and contentment; all selfish desires and aims fade away; we no longer distinguish between our own interests and the interests of our fellow-men, and so come to love our neighbours as ourselves. This divine and universal love is our love of God. But we must not expect that God will love us in return. He loves Himself eternally, and loves us simply as finite and partial modes of His own life. Such, in very imperfect outline, appears to be the religion involved in Spinoza's great work. Such a Pantheism is, we think, inadequate to fully satisfy the spiritual cravings of the soul, but it contains some true and beautiful features, and is vastly more inspiring and satisfying than is the prevalent Agnosticism.

Christian Theism has much in common with Spinozism, but it is fundamentally distinguished from the latter by its assertion that, though we constantly depend on God for our existence, and are constantly enlightened and guided by his self-revelation in the intellect, the conscience, and the heart, we are, nevertheless, not wholly identical with Him. He has endowed us with a self-hood which enables us in a measure to resist even Him in whom we live and move. The experience of sin reveals to us that in our wills God and we are not one, but two; that our wills and the Eternal Will are at times in antagonism with each other. It is because of this experience that the sentiments of repentance and remorse at times arise within us, and we feel the pain of alienation from God, and the joy of reconciliation with Him. Here, then, the crucial difference between Theism and Pantheism reveals itself. If Pantheism be the true philosophy of religion, such expressions as "repentance," "remorse," and "divine forgiveness" are entirely emptied of their usual meaning.

This vital difference between the two forms of religion needs to be strongly emphasised, and the only serious fault we have to find with Mr. Picton's exposition is that, instead of emphasising it, he tries to explain it away by asserting that it will be "found that Spinoza leaves the practical facts and issues of morality precisely as they have always been, and as they are now held by practical men uncommitted to any theory." "All the usual sanctions of morality, such as repentance, remorse, &c., have as much a place in Spinoza's system as in any other." Now, we venture to assert that the part which the sentiments of repentance and remorse play in Spinoza's system is essentially different from that which they fill in the general ethical judgment of mankind. Spinoza rightly describes what "repentance" means in ordinary parlance. "Repentance," he says, "is grief with the concomitant idea of something done which we believe we have accomplished by a free resolve of the Mind." In other words, the sentiment of repentance is inseparably united with the idea of moral freedom. But in Spinoza's view moral freedom is nothing but a fiction, and therefore he maintains that "Repentance is not a virtue—that is, it does not spring from reason." And in like manner he says, "Humility is not a virtue, for it does not spring from reason." But Spinoza's sagacity told him that though, in his view, freewill, repentance, and humility are all irrational emotions and based upon psychological ignorance, it would be a very bad thing for public morality if this philosophical truth were widely made known. "It is no wonder," he says, "that the Prophets, who consulted the good, not of a few, but of all, so strenuously commended Humility, Repentance, and Reverence. Indeed, those who are a prey to these emotions may be led much more easily than others to live under the guidance of reason—that is, to become free and to enjoy the life of the blessed." It appears, then, to have been Spinoza's view that the Hebrew prophets were well aware that the freedom of the will was an illusion, and that therefore humility and repentance were irrational emotions; but that, nevertheless, for the good of society, they scrupulously kept their ideas on this subject to themselves. Surely a philosophy which cannot be generally proclaimed for fear it should impede the ordinary man's progress toward spiritual blessedness raises a strong presumption against its own validity.

In like manner with regard to the popular belief that sin entails retributive consequences far beyond the limits of this present life, Spinoza acknowledges that such a conviction is most necessary for the ethical well-being of the majority of mankind. "If," he says, "men were not pervaded by this hope and fear—if, on the contrary, they thought that Mind and Body perished together—that there remained no longer existence for wretches weary of the burden of Piety—they would return to their natural bent, they would take lust as the only guide, and would prefer the chances of fortune above (their better) self." If, then, there is no firm belief in personal immortality, one strong support of moral effort is removed, and therefore, on this point also it would appear that the wide spread of Spinoza's philosophy would not be conducive to morality. It is, we are inclined to think, by no means improbable that the consideration in Spinoza's own mind that his philosophical views, however true and interesting to advanced philosophers, were not likely to further morality, and, therefore, the progress to blessedness in the case of mankind in general, was one of the inducements which kept back the publication of the "Ethica" during the author's lifetime.

We may notice, in conclusion, that this doctrine of the identity of God and man not only contravenes the general idea of sin and moral responsibility, but it also removes all ground for the existence of personal relations and communion between God and the individual soul. If we are simply limited modes of God's eternal life, it follows that, as Spinoza held, God cannot be conceived as loving our individual personalities; his love for us can only be a phase of his love for Himself. We see, then, how much depends on the settlement of the question whether in the experience of sin we have a valid consciousness that the will of man is in some degree independent of the causality of God. If it should ever be generally accepted that there is no such possibility of any real separation between the human and the Divine will, ethics and religion will have to make the best of it; but the religion which will then arise will be essentially different from that promulgated by the Prophet of Nazareth. But so long as the general testimony of mankind supports the belief that in sin the individual spirit resists the authority of the immanent God, Christian Theism will successfully maintain itself against both Hegelian Idealism and Spinozistic Pantheism.

THE RELIGION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.*

SINCE reading this book we have been at a loss to understand why it should have been included in the "Crown Theological Series," for less than a year ago there appeared in that same series a volume on the same subject under the title of "Hebrew Religion," by the Rev. W. E. Addis. Comparisons are said to be odious; but comparisons are inevitable in such a case, for the appearance, within a year, of a second volume in the same series on the same subject might suggest that the earlier one was so faulty that it needed to be replaced by a better one. The truth is just the other way. Mr. Addis's book is in every respect superior, and the reader who possesses the earlier volume will have no use for the later one. Marti gives the impression of having written a rather hasty sketch, without caring to put his best work into it; and the result, though, no doubt, reliable as to its statements of fact, is rather dull and superficial. Comparison might seem to be somewhat disarmed by the fact that Addis's book only came down to the time of Ezra, while Marti extends his survey down to the time of Jesus. If Marti had begun with Ezra there would have been some reason for the two volumes, only that arrangement would have brought out even more strikingly the deficiencies of Marti. For his treatment of the Judaism of the centuries from Ezra to Christ is altogether inadequate, his chief fault being a rather contemptuous neglect to try and understand the religion which he is describing. If he had kept to the subject of the primitive Hebrew religion, he would at least have written with more sympathy, as well as more knowledge. In dealing with the later Judaism, Addis is far superior to Marti, both in amount of knowledge and in the scrupulous desire to be fair—the chivalry that will say everything that can be said on behalf of a form of religion felt to be uncongenial. If Addis had begun his book with Ezra, and let Marti take the earlier period, the gain would have been great, and the subject more fitly handled. But in that case the loss of Addis's earlier chapters would have been but poorly compensated by what Marti has written. The simple fact is that Addis's book is better all along the line, and it is much to be regretted that this other book was ever put into a position of rivalry by being included in the same series. It does not gain anything by being a translation from the German, and the fact that it is so makes one still more wonder why it should have been translated. For German readers abroad the book is well enough, though it might be better; but what end was to be served by translating it and publishing it as a bad second to Addis's book we cannot guess. That it is light to hold and easy to read goes without saying, considering who are the publishers; but how much more one would gladly have said if it had been possible to say it!

DRUIDISM REVISED.*

A CRUSTY attorney who hated Welsh preachers was forced to admit "they were always interesting, if unconvincing." Mr. Delta Evans has succeeded in writing a book that is engagingly interesting, in spite of a certain rawness of style and occasional girding at the orthodox. The author is a wide reader, whose fishing brings all things to his net. Handling his material as a "critical inquirer," his rôle is that of the informant rather than the interpreter—a very necessary rôle in face of the prevailing ignorance and worse than ignorance of the subject. Mr. Evans, with his intimate knowledge of the Welsh language and Welsh lore, is eminently fitted for the task of removing the misconceptions that persist concerning the ancient Druids, whom he is anxious to re-christen with the less dignified title of "bards"; and in his footsteps may follow the Interpreter, with the magic wand of the poet and the clairvoyance of the seer to make the past alive for us once more in its grandeur and witchery, and continue the work begun by Renan in his Essay on the Poetry of Celtic Races, and by Matthew Arnold in his "Celtic Literature."

Students of literature cannot afford to neglect those sources without which our English literature would not have been possible, as Stopford Brooke has shown. Students of Ethnology, again, instead of raving over the "Cagots," may be reasonably expected to evince some real concern for the civilisation of the ancient people of this very island in which they draw breath; while students of Religion, at a time when the call of the East is so distinctly heard and so eagerly heeded, and Eastern thought is sweeping like an irresistible tide over Western intellect, must hail with delight a faith bearing so striking a resemblance to the religion and philosophy of India.

The Druidic teaching of Rebirth and of cycles of evolution; the insistence on Karma; the recognition of Purgatory as part of the beneficent process of salvation; the emphasis on the sacredness of life, on the essential oneness of mankind; the beautiful Panentheism; the intimate connection of Involution and Evolution which material scientists wholly neglect; the doctrine of Avatars, of the periodic incarnation of celestial beings in the human race to assist its progress; all the elements with which Hinduism and Buddhism have made us familiar steeped the very sod of this sea-girt island once in the long ago. A bare recital of these parallels is sufficient to indicate that the author has an easy task in vindicating the ancient bards from the charges of cruelty and ignorance. On the contrary, we find a body of sages who saw everything in God and God in everything; whose office was the peacemaker's; who had been so trained in religious tolerance that they offered a welcome hearing to the first messengers of Christianity, and had no difficulty in accepting its humane principles, for it is on record that the "Britons embraced the new religion with more openness than any other people"; nor is this to be wondered at, if we accept the testimony of Strabo, Cæsar, and Lucan that they were "wiser than their neighbour."

To name the "Mabinogion" alone is to name a work whose magical beauty has charmed great poets and artists, but whose depths of meaning as yet remain unplumbed. A race that could produce it arrests the imagination, whilst the ethical wisdom of the Triads and the reverence of the ancient chants hold the spirit of worship and make us recognise the everlasting sighing after the infinite, sending us back to those "three places where most of goodness is to be found, where it is most sought for, where it is most loved, and where there is least of self."

Meanwhile, many English readers will be glad to possess this compendium of knowledge upon the subject, and will think all the more highly of the race whose blood, derived from the brides of the conquerors by conquest won, still pours in their own veins, and gives to their Teutonic steadiness and grit the idealism, the imaginativeness which are like the carving of lily-work upon the columns in the temple of Solomon; and will be grateful to the assiduous and enthusiastic author who has placed his labours at their feet.

SHORT NOTICES.

Gospel Notes, by J. S. Foster Chamberlain, are not, as a whole, very satisfactory, though they contain occasional flashes of insight. The author shows some grasp of critical methods in dealing with the text, and his readings are at times suggestive. Thus he renders Matt. xii. 33-37: "Every idle word which men shall speak, they shall render an account concerning it at the day of judgment. For from thine own logoi (or accounts) shalt thou be condemned"; and his note on this passage is, "Men shall be asked their reasons for their conduct and will be judged from their own arguments." The interpretation is plausible, and it reminds us of the nobleman's saying to his wicked servant in Luke xix. 22, "Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee"; but it does not strike us as being what Jesus meant. There is an interesting note on Christ's relations with the publicans and sinners, and we quote a part of it to show the quality of the book at its best: "Jesus found the best hearts among the despised publicans and sinners. . . . He did not tell them to live like the Pharisees and the doctors of divinity and the other religious people. He liked their own life much the better of the two. And they would do anything for Jesus, just as they would do anything for anybody else. And when they had got to know and to love Jesus they found that although he had a very human heart, and although he was not a bit like the religious people, and although his amusements were the same as their amusements, yet he was different to any of their other friends. He could be a real friend in a way in which their other friends could not. There was a strength in his life which the others had not, and a beauty in his life which they did not see elsewhere. And they admired and loved the human God, while the respectable people despised or hated him. And the more they admired and loved their friend, the more they desired to change what needed changing in their lives." (Elliot Stock, 2s.)

Criticism and the Old Testament, by the Rev. H. Theodore Knight, M.A., is described on the title-page as "a popular introduction," but it is, at the same time, a most scholarly work. It is well fitted to commend the Higher Criticism to the thoughtful layman, and it will be read with pleasure and profit even by those who are already familiar with the subject. The treatment is necessarily limited, but it is by no means slight. One gets an excellent idea, not only of what the Higher Criticism is, but also of its main results, which have made the Old Testament once more a living book for so many. The order and circumstances in which the various writings arose are admirably suggested, and the objections commonly urged against the critical views are met in a frank yet sympathetic manner in such chapters as those entitled "Inspiration and Exegesis," "Miracle and History," "Prophecy and Morals," "Messianic Hopes," and "The Appeal to the New Testament." It is only in regard to the last-mentioned chapter that we feel inclined to cross swords with Mr. Knight. In it he attempts to meet the objection that the acceptance of the results of criticism involves the denial of the authority of Christ, since Christ gave his sanction to the traditional views of the Old Testament by speaking, for example, of Moses as the author of the Pentateuch. "Once begin," say the objectors, "to admit the validity of critical work, and you have entered on 'the down-grade,' and will find yourself compelled to deny our Lord's Divinity" (Deity). Our author does not agree that such a result is inevitable. It is, as he says, quite true that "if we start with the idea that our Lord 'knew everything,' we run the risk of a rude awakening as we turn over the pages of the New Testament, because their evidence goes to prove that he did not," and that "throughout the whole of his ministry there are traces of a genuine limitation of knowledge." But he meets the difficulty by adopting the Kenosis theory, according to which Christ, in becoming man, abjured the exercise of omniscience. Despite our quarrel with this particular chapter, however, we heartily recommend the book to our readers. It contains two appendices, the first consisting of useful chronological tables, and the second of a Bibliography of English works bearing on the subject, together with some indication of their contents. J. M. C.

The Invisible Things. By J. Sparhawk Jones, Minister of Calvary Church, Philadelphia. We have read this volume of fifteen sermons, the first of which stands as the title of the whole, with uncommon pleasure. Its theology, on its historical side, does not entirely appeal to us, but the writer has not lost much in not being quite in line with the Higher Criticism. On the other hand, on the side of its palpable spiritual significance, its expositions excite many a sympathy in our mind and heart. These discourses are distinctly helpful to both our mental and religious temper, and the truth to which they witness are of the very bedrock of effective spiritual teaching. The matter is uniformly good, and the manner of its presentation is generally vivid. Here and there a few Americanisms arrest the reader somewhat uncomfortably, but on the whole these sermons strike one as very able writing, bright with apt epigram and illustration, and vigorous in the use of quite an exceptional vocabulary. The author does a service in showing most clearly in the case of each of his texts the wealth of suggestiveness it contains, and the uses, more legitimate than most of us make, to which it may be put. He reflects the matter of his scriptural headings deeply before he puts it to the service of moral and spiritual purposes. (Longmans. 4s. 6d. net.)

OBITUARY.

MRS. WILLIAM H. HERFORD.

It was one autumn evening thirty years ago that two middle-aged ladies introduced themselves to me in the tramcar as the Miss Carbutts. They won me straight off, and I counted them among my most valued friends from that time forth. They were both delicate, and might have been justified to have considered it their calling to be patient and unselfish invalids. But they had too much character to resign themselves easily to any such lot, and they spent their time in so wisely and resolutely combating their infirmities, that they were able to lead a comparatively active life and exert a marked influence for good in their church and city.

The younger sister died some years ago: had she been a Roman Catholic, they would have said "in the odour of sanctity." The elder, who became Mrs. William Herford, was found asleep and dead in the early hours of Saturday, May 4. She was born at Altona, near Hamburg, on September 25, 1832. The family afterwards removed to Leeds, where they were well known and influential for the space of half a century. Her father, Francis Carbutt, was a director of the Midland Railway Company, and Mayor of Leeds in 1847. Her brother, afterwards Sir Edward H. Carbutt, was Mayor just thirty years afterwards. Her eldest sister was wife of John Darnton Luccock, who took a prominent part in the work of the town, and was twice Mayor, and was herself a distinguished woman, able, determined, energetic, and generous. Indeed, there was not one member of the family who did not show in some one or other direction a more than average capacity.

Of them all I think Louisa was the most distinguished by originality and independence of judgment and determination to lead a useful and active life in despite of all obstacles. At a time when our middle-class had not yet outgrown the belief that it was a misfortune or a misdemeanour for a lady to engage in work, and that even teaching, almost the only calling she could decently take to, involved a loss of caste, Miss Carbutt put aside the protests of friends and relations, and left home to set up a school for girls. She made no pretence of doing it out of charity or for the sake of religion. She had her own conception of what school life and methods should be, and she was determined to put them in practice. It was in 1860 that she took a house at Knutsford, and began with the girls of two Unitarian families. For ten years she kept school, till serious ill-health compelled her to give it up and return to her father's house. And what a school! The old girls ought surely to leave on record some memorial of it. There were no punishments and almost no rules. If a girl would not do her work, it was taken away from her, and she was made to do nothing till she was sick of idleness. I am told of two girls who were kept for a whole week without any lessons at all. They were only too glad to return penitent to their form. The girls were left as much as possible to arrange their lives for themselves. There were certain lessons to be attended and stated times for meals and sleep, but otherwise they might do as they liked about recreation, preparation, &c., but two hours must be spent out of doors. The system might be impossible if tried in a larger school, or with another mistress, but it certainly succeeded here. I have met many who had been Miss Carbutt's pupils, and all speak of their schooldays with affection and show some distinctive qualities due to her influence. And especially of the religious influence which she brought to bear on them by her Sunday readings, one writes to me: "It was intense and lifelong. Reading was hardly the word. Miss Cobbe's 'Thanksgiving' or 'Prayer' was read; but the discussion evoked, and her own attitude as an elder child of God helping us to tread with her the path of practical Christianity in our daily school life, of which special problems were often talked over—these were the vital factor."

She spent a few happy and useful years in Leeds after she had recovered from the disease which threatened her life. She was never well and strong again, but, nevertheless, she managed to do a great deal. She was one of the first lady Guardians, and it was in great part through her exertions that our pauper children were clothed like their little brothers and sisters of happier lot, and sent to the Board schools, instead of being secluded in the workhouse.

In 1884 she was taken from us by Mr. William Herford, who had worked with her at Knutsford, and there won her admiration for his gifts as a teacher. If it had been one less worthy of her we should have found it difficult to forgive him, but she could not have found in the whole world one better suited to be her partner. A minister, if he were responsible for the marriages which he solemnises, might shrink from ever committing himself by so doing. But I did commit myself deeply in this instance, defending the proposed marriage against all critics as most desirable and suitable; and I can only wish that every young couple whom I have united might have been as happy and loving to the end as have been these dear elderly folk. She began the duty late in life, but she knew how to make a perfect wife, and I have often expressed my conviction that both would have died long since had they remained single. In the more difficult vocation of stepmother—a vocation in which so many excellent women have failed—she was marvellously successful. One writes of her: "She will be missed by high and low, and we, father's children, can never be grateful enough for her loving care of him and the way she made us feel her personal love and care for us and the grandchildren."

She is gone, and the world is poorer for the loss of her. For she was one of those persons who exert a vital influence which seems independent of bodily health and appearance. She made herself felt, and felt for good, in whatever society she moved. Her judgments of people and things were quite unconventional. She seemed to see them direct, and not, as it were, through the atmosphere of social prejudices. Some laughed, not unkindly, about her health fads and queer habits, but she justified herself by living far beyond the average age of womankind, and that although of most frail constitution and suffering more or less from imperfect health for more than thirty years. She cared however, nothing for the remarks of men and women, kindly or even, if there were such, unkindly. She pursued the even tenor of her way, and fulfilled a long life, happy, honoured, and loved by all those who knew her best.

CHARLES HARGROVE.

At Paignton, near Torquay, her home had been of late years, and it was there, at Torbay Lodge, in the days when she had been watching with her husband in his serious illness, that the summons came to her. The funeral service, on the Tuesday following her death, was taken by the Rev. A. E. O'Connor, of Torquay, and the Rev. Rudolf Davis, of Bridgwater. We add a passage from Mr. O'Connor's address:—

"Let us not sorrow, but thankfully and lovingly treasure up the memory of that life now hidden from us for a season. Long will her presence dwell in our hearts, and long shall we affectionately cherish her memory. We shall remember her unselfish devotion to others, to those nearest her, and also to those who would be held by many to have no claim upon her. She was ever generous with her time, her means, and, above all, her ready sympathy. We shall long remember her loyalty to her friends, her touching readiness to own herself in the wrong whenever she thought she had in any degree fallen below her own high standard, her love of simplicity, her disregard of the merely conventional, and attachment to all that is really good, true, noble, just, and beautiful—her earnestness and perseverance in the support of whatever she held to be right. She never shrank from taking an unpopular side, if it was the cause of justice, of peace, brotherhood, humanity, or equality. We who worshipped with her shall gratefully remember her love for her church and for the aims and ideals for which it stands, her faithful attendance at the Sunday services, and her liberal support of all the institutions of the congregation. While warmly attached to her own household of faith, she was never lacking in sympathy with and charity towards those of other communions. The Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man were no mere phrases, but realities to her. She regarded and treated those who came into contact with her as brothers and sisters. Her trust in God enabled her to bear her sufferings patiently, and to look forward to death with calm tranquillity and without a trace of fear."

MRS. E. J. NETTLEFOLD.

It is with deep regret that we record the death of Mrs. E. J. Nettlefold, which took place at Hallfield, Edgbaston, after a short illness, on May 13, at the age of 73. Her husband died in London in March, 1878, and soon afterwards Mrs. Nettlefold removed with her family to Birmingham, which has since remained her home. She was the mother of fourteen children, ten of whom—six daughters and four sons—survive her. All through life she was devoted to the welfare of her children, taking the closest personal interest in their education and work, and rejoicing always to have her sons and daughters and grandchildren meet at her home—a home made beautiful by her graciousness and large-hearted sympathy.

Mr. Edward John Nettlefold was a convinced and earnest Unitarian, greatly interested in the work of the denomination, having been treasurer of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, an office held during the last nine years by his son, Mr. Oswald Nettlefold. On her marriage, Mrs. Nettlefold was a member of the Church of England, but later she embraced the religious faith of her husband; and for many years she has been one of the most generous subscribers to the Unitarian Association, while many of our churches and societies up and down the country owe much to her liberality. She followed with keen interest the doings of the religious community to which she belonged, and formed her own judgments on the questions which were submitted to her. She was businesslike and methodical in her correspondence and work. In conversation, it was easy to perceive that you were in the presence of a woman of independent and vigorous mind, possessing also that mingled reserve and spontaneity characteristic of the older generation of Englishwomen. A pure and noble spirit animated her thought and life, and made her one of the saints of our household of faith. There was in her nature a deep undercurrent of piety and reverence: in the conduct of family worship in her own home there was a fine combination of dignity, strength, and tenderness. She was a liberal supporter of hospitals and other benevolent institutions in Birmingham for the alleviation of suffering and the brightening of the lives of the poor, young and old. The true greatness of England is largely built up by the quiet, ennobling influences which proceed from such a life and home.

A funeral service was held at Birmingham, conducted by the Rev. J. Worsley Austin, minister of the Church of the Messiah. The interment, after cremation, took place at Highgate on Friday afternoon, when the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie officiated.

MR. JAMES BROADBENT.

THE Westgate Unitarian Church, Lewes, mourns the loss of one of its oldest and most respected members—Mr. James Broadbent, whose death took place early on Sunday morning, April 28. His health had been indifferent for some time, but no one expected any fatal termination. He came from Ashton to Lewes in 1867, and became the manager of the foundry department of the Phoenix Iron Works, which occupy a most important position in the commercial life of the town. His lengthy service and his able discharge of the responsible duties which fell to his lot, gained for him the esteem of all connected with the works. He was an ardent co-operator. In politics a staunch Liberal, although not a member of the Town Council, he was an active worker in municipal affairs, and was closely identified with all movements which sought to raise the intellectual and moral life of the town. He was possessed of a large share of that clear-headedness generally credited to North country people, and having considerable ability as a public speaker, was frequently in the forefront when any question affecting the working classes was under consideration. His eldest son, the Rev. T. P. Broadbent, B.A., entered the Unitarian ministry and was settled at Cheltenham; but his early and sudden death cut short a very promising career, and came as a great blow to his father. For many years Mr. Broadbent was the superintendent of the Sunday school, and a very able lay preacher.

The funeral service was conducted on the following Wednesday, in the Westgate Chapel by the Pastor, the Rev. J. Felstead, and the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, an intimate friend of the deceased. There was a large concourse of men from the works, and of sympathising townspeople, both in the chapel and at the grave side. Mr. Broadbent leaves a widow, two sons, and a daughter.

THE REV. WALTER LLOYD.

ON Sunday morning, after a brief illness, our friend, the Rev. Walter Lloyd, of Gloucester, entered into rest. A recent brief report in the "Western Union Calendar" told of his inability to conduct service, and hopefully suggested that this would be but temporary. The end, however, came with swiftness, and to the great sorrow of many friends.

Mr. Lloyd was sixty-two years old. In his earliest days he was brought up, we believe, among the Wesleyans. In his early manhood, when he was a clerk at Somerset House, he became attached to the liberal ministrations of the Rev. Baldwin Brown at Brixton, and by and by he found his way to our church at Effra-road, then in the charge of the Rev. Jeffrey Worthington. Deeply impressed by what he heard and read, his keen and ardent mind was soon imbued with the desire to enter the Unitarian ministry if it were possible. But it was a serious step to give up his position, and, moreover, study was needed. Happily a way was open for his talents as a lay preacher, and he was soon recognised in the pulpits about London as a clear, thoughtful, and forceful speaker. When the Rev. W. M. Ainsworth succeeded to the ministry at Brixton, Mr. Lloyd and his wife became warmly attached to the congregation there and rendered valuable help in many ways. At last the critical step was taken, and in 1887 he relinquished the Civil Service and became minister at Newark. In 1891 he removed to Gloucester, and here amid more congenial surroundings, though still with a small congregation, his sterling abilities were specially shown. He was an interesting and informing lecturer, active in public duties, and held in high esteem far beyond the borders of our own community. Of his public work in Gloucester a local paper says:—"He was one of the most ardent supporters of the Public Library movement, and was a member of the Library Committee almost from the commencement. In another sphere, he was Chairman and Secretary of the Barton Ward Relief Committee from its inception, and devoted much time and energy to the work. In politics he was an earnest and consistent Liberal, and rendered much useful work on behalf of that party in the city, his speeches being always informing and to the point. He was one of the Vice-Presidents of the Liberal Association, Mr. Lloyd took a great interest in the doings of the Gloucester Philosophical Society, and also in the recently formed Dickens Fellowship."

Mr. Lloyd's skill as a writer was known far and wide, but few know how much he wrote as an essayist and critic of modern religious and philosophical literature. At one time he contributed frequently to the INQUIRER, and his connection with the Westminster Review was for many years a very important one. In addition to occasional pamphlets he wrote several volumes, all of them marked by distinct power and grasp of the subjects dealt with. In 1892 appeared a work entitled "The Galilean," dealing in a rational but reverent way with the story of the Gospels. He also compiled a sketch of the Gloucester Meeting-house and its congregation, with special inquiry into the history of Biddle, the famous Unitarian pioneer of Commonwealth times. A larger work and one involving much careful study was published in 1899 under the title "Protestant Dissent and English Unitarianism," in which he set forth, with copious illustrations, a view of our denominational origin, which he very earnestly held. His last published work, "A Theist's Apology" (1905), showed his mind at its ripest and strongest, and ought to render many his debtors for a long time to come.

Of Mr. Lloyd's personal qualities, his undimmed religious faith, uniform kindness, cheeriness, sincerity, courage, single-hearted devotion to duty, and loyal brotherliness many in the West could testify, while Londoners remember best his earlier years of service. They know how unselfishly and how well he served the cause of the congregations there for many years. At the meetings of the Western Union he was always a source of strength to his brethren, and he served as President of the Union in 1904. He will be greatly missed by them, as well as by his own congregation, and tender sympathy will go out in abundance to his widow and children.

The funeral took place at Gloucester on Wednesday, being conducted by the Revs. A. N. Blatchford and Principal Gordon, the former a close comrade, the latter an inspirer and co-worker with him in his historical studies.

THE REV. JOHN CUCKSON.

WE deeply regret to announce the sudden death on Monday, May 6, in his sixty-second year, of the Rev. John Cuckson, minister of the First Church, Plymouth, Mass. Many friends will read with painful surprise the tidings of his decease, especially those at Birmingham and Bradford, where he held his longest pastorates in the old country. Our friend was a Lincolnshire man by birth, who, as a boy, went to Sheffield as a pupil teacher in one of its large elementary schools. While there, he passed under the influence of Brooke Herford, by whose ministry the youth became a Unitarian. At the earliest possible age he went to Manchester and was admitted as a student of the Missionary College there, passing through its course with distinction. Settling with his young wife as minister of Hamilton-road Church, Liverpool, he still pursued his studies at Queen's College. Always an omnivorous reader, and of quick assimilation, he soon became widely versed in literature, history, and philosophy, his favourite subjects. Endowed with a good memory and the gift of expression, he passed at once into the ranks of thoughtful preachers, and the possessor of a good style. He could weave his thought into the seamless robe better than most men, as his published sermons, "Faith and Fellowship," amply attest. Always an ardent admirer of Dr. Martineau's works he steeped his mind in the philosophy of ethical types, and a "Study of Religion," which strengthened for him the foundations of his faith. While at Bradford he spent a brief holiday in the States. Preaching in the pulpit of the lovely Church of the Unity in no less lovely Springfield, Mass., an invitation followed him home to become its minister. This he accepted, and soon the beautiful building filled to his ministry, which was most fruitful, while his work in the city quickly found wide recognition. When Dr. Herford vacated the pulpit of Arlington-street Church, Boston, his old pupil, Cuckson, was asked to supply the pulpit for a Sunday. A unanimous invitation followed, which was accepted. It was no easy task, which was offered him, and it is no wonder that the strain upon his health, particularly towards the end of his ministry there, was too severe. When he retired from that famous pulpit, broken in health, ample assurance was given him by neighbouring ministers, within and without the denomination, that he successfully maintained the lofty traditions of the position. After a brief period of rest he became minister of the First Church of Plymouth. The traditions and memories of the old place suited him, and he was soon deep in the study of its valuable archives, which well fitted him to vindicate the claim of his congregation, disputed by the Congregational Church, to be in unbroken succession to the Pilgrim Settlers, in a chapter of most interesting history. Mr. Cuckson was a man of great force of character, a typical Briton in his fidelity to principle, which, if attacked, he resolutely defended, giving and asking no quarter. He was a faithful friend, and many there and here, will consider themselves the poorer for his passing. He leaves a widow but no children.

J. McDOWELL.

WHEN the Father's presence is felt like that of a visible friend, and the parental love of the All-perfect penetrates his inmost being, suffusing his eyes with tears of thankfulness, and lifting them upward with immortal hope—in such high moments, whence does he consciously derive this unutterable joy? By experience he then knows, as well as feels, that this peace past all understanding is the influx of the peace of God. With mingled gratitude and awe, he recognises then, that above, upon, within his own spirit is moving the Divine Spirit, bringing the light of an eternal day. Thenceforth the truth, written in his heart by the finger of God Himself, becomes a glorious reality, that to all who ask for His holy Spirit, the Father gives.

LEGENDS OF THE SAINTS.

II.—ST. CATHERINE OF ALEXANDRIA.

SIXTEEN hundred years ago a little princess was born in the famous city of Alexandria, who was destined to play a remarkable part in the history of her own time, and who left a name behind her that has always been associated with all that was wise and great. Her name was Catherine, and she seems to have lost both her father and mother when she was still quite young, but not before they had seen her growing up to be wonderfully beautiful and more learned than the learned men of those days. Sixteen hundred years ago ladies were not encouraged to learn, but Catherine's father seems to have done all he could for her. He gave her a tower in his palace, where she kept her books and mathematical instruments, and here she spent a great deal of her time studying and thinking. When her father died she was left his heiress and governor of his kingdom. But she only shut herself up in her tower, and seemed to care for nothing besides study. So, we are told, the people became discontented, and came and asked her at last if she would not be pleased to take a husband, someone who would govern the country while she read and studied. But Catherine had no wish to be married, and said, in dismay: "What manner of man is this that I must marry?"

Then the chief spokesman told her that as she possessed four great gifts, any king or prince would be pleased to become her husband. These four gifts were, first, that she came of very noble blood; second, that she inherited great lands; third, that in wisdom she surpassed all others; and fourth, that she was very beautiful to look upon.

The young princess considered for a while before she gave her answer. Then she said: "God has given me these gifts, and therefore he that shall be my husband must also have four great gifts. He shall be so noble that all men must worship him; so rich that he shall pass all others in riches; so beautiful that the angels shall desire to behold him; and so benign that he will gladly forgive all offences done to him. None other will I wed." At this all the princess's counsellors were much distressed, for they feared that such a king was not to be found, and that she would never marry. All the young nobles and princes that they invited to come and woo her were sent sadly away, because they did not come up to the ideal she had set herself.

Now comes the strange part of the legend, which is called the marriage of St. Catherine and Jesus Christ. You understand, perhaps, that those qualities which Catherine said must be in the man she would marry were just what the Christians of that time saw in Christ himself and in no one else. And so it happened that when a Christian hermit came to Catherine, and told her for the first time of Christ's life and death, and of all that he had taught his followers to believe of our Father in heaven, a great longing came over her to know more. One night she dreamed a wonderful dream. She thought she was borne away into a city whose streets were of pure gold and the gates of precious stones. Angels clothed in white and crowned with lilies came out to greet her, and led her into the presence of the mother Mary and Jesus Christ, before whom she knelt in adoration. Then she awoke, and after her dream she sought out the hermit, and learned all that she could from him of the Christian faith. She had another dream, and in this one Christ smiled upon her, and, placing a ring upon her finger, promised never to leave or forsake her.

This legend has always been a very favourite one with artists. In our National Gallery there are two or three pictures by Italian painters, one especially beautiful, by Borgognone. In this St. Catherine, in a scarlet robe, with a crown on her long, fair hair and a palm in her hand, is on one side of the throne, on which Mary is seated, with Christ as a little child standing on her knee, putting a ring upon the saint's finger.

There is a sad ending to St. Catherine's story. The Emperor Maximinus was the enemy of Christians, and, when he came to Alexandria, by his orders Catherine was put to death. The legend says that he had her fastened to a great wheel, which should dash her in pieces as it moved, but when, after praying for courage, she was made fast to the wheel, fire came down from heaven, and the wheel was shattered into a thousand pieces. Even then the Emperor would not desist, and his soldiers put her to death. In the National Gallery there are several pictures of St. Catherine besides the one of her marriage. Raphael painted her leaning on a great wheel, and sometimes she is painted with a book in her hand as an emblem of her learning.

MARCHING MUSIC.

SING, loyal hearts and cheery,
Sing as we march along,
There's ne'er a way so weary
But shortens with a song;
Beautiful things beside us,
Dutiful thoughts within,
The light of right shall guide us,
And Love the day shall win:

Sing, "Welcome, welcome Beauty,
Joy of this earth of ours,
Come, fringe the path of Duty
With sunny shining flowers;
Blush in the rose and heather,
Smile in the stars and dew,
And we will go together
Through all the world with you."

Sing, "Welcome, welcome Duty,
Life of this life of ours,
That walks the world with Beauty,
And brings to fruit the flowers;"
Sing, if the day be dreary,
"Is it not good to be,
With loyal hearts and cheery,
In glorious company!"

W. G. TARRANT:

ROBERT COLLYER has written to the minister of Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, to say that he is really coming over this year, and has taken passage by the Cunarder leaving Boston on August 7. He is coming to open a library at Ilkley, and that has determined the time of his journey.

RENEWAL OF LIFE.

ON the eve of Whitsuntide we are preparing for the gathering of many friends for religious fellowship and conference on our common work, and we rejoice in the thought of the eager interests that unite us. Many calls come to us for the renewal of energies and faith and courage, for the maintenance of the good work in our accustomed fields of service, and the successful launching of fresh enterprise.

In this glad season of the year we give thanks to the Giver of all good, and remember that there is one Source only from which we may hope for the grace and strength that shall make us sufficient for the tasks to which we are called. Samuel Longfellow gave us the words long ago, without which no anniversary gathering of our friends now seems quite complete:—

O Life that makest all things new,
The blooming earth, the thoughts of men,

Our pilgrim feet, wet with thy dew,
In gladness hither turn again.

From hand to hand the greeting flows,
From eye to eye the signals run,
From heart to heart the bright hope glows,
The lovers of the Light are one.

One in the freedom of the Truth,
One in the joy of paths untrod,
One in the soul's perennial youth,
One in the larger thought of God.

The freer step, the fuller breath,
The wide horizon's grander view;
The sense of life that knows no death—
The Life that maketh all things new!

And as we linger on such words, the memory is with us of those friends to whom that Life has come now in richer measure, but to the sorrowful loss of our immediate fellowship. We have this week to record an unusual number of such departures from our midst; but it is a record to make us at the same time very thankful for the deepening vision of life, richer and more beautiful which the thought of them gives to us. They bid us be of a good courage, strong of heart, patient, faithful, and to rejoice in the life which still they share with us.

And in this number of THE INQUIRER there is one special appeal, which we must urge again, and that is in the report of the London Domestic Mission, which follows here. It is the work nearest of all to the heart of our faith, through which most surely our strength shall be renewed as we give ourselves earnestly to it, in self-forgetting service. In the report, it will be seen, there is an appeal to the members of our churches for a still larger measure of that help which is already so abundantly given in many ways at the several missions. The field is limitless, and there is always need of more helpers. We ask especially the younger members of our churches to consider this, to get a copy of the report, and see all that is there told of the work done at the three missions, and then see whether there is not some way in which they might come in and lend a hand. Mr. PAGE HOPPS, at the annual meeting, told of his deep interest in the work, and of how when he went down to the George's-row Mission, he felt nearer there to the early Christians than he did in Westminster Abbey; and Miss ANNA SHARPE, in appealing for more helpers in the Provident work at Bell-street, for visiting the people's homes and collecting their pence, told a delightful little story, which may well be remembered as a parable of this whole work of ministry among the poor. She went recently on her Provident round to a house where a woman lived with her little daughter, and as she stood at the door she heard the child announce to her mother: "Mother, it's a lady, a nice clean one." That is exactly it, just the carrying of wholesome, pleasant, beautiful influences, as of friends going among friends, into homes and circles where too little that is wholesome and beautiful finds its way. "A nice clean one," whether in the visit of frank sympathy and helpfulness, or in the reading circle, the singing class, the drill or gymnastic class, in the friendly meeting of club or social entertainment—just the giving, the sharing of some of the good gifts of life, in true brotherly kindness, with those whose need is greater than our own—that is what this ministry means; and in it we might all have some part.

WE owe to him our spirits—this light of reason, these monitions of conscience, this power of making conscience and reason our guide. And we not only received these faculties at first, but they are constantly upheld by Him who originally gave them. Without God's indwelling energy, these inward spiritual forces would expire. As the light of the sun in the morning returns to us through God's power—so through the Divine agency the light of the mind rises anew when we awake; and without Him, we could not more bring back thought and moral feeling, than we could restore the dawn and the splendour of day.—Channing.

THE RELIGION OF UNITARIANS.

CHARLES BEARD.

1827-1888.

TWENTY years ago, on Trinity Sunday (in the year before he died), the Rev. Charles Beard preached in Renshaw-street Chapel, Liverpool, a sermon which was separately printed. It opened with these words:—

"Whenever Trinity Sunday comes round, and I know that in every church in the land is being read a creed which makes salvation depend upon the acceptance of a metaphysical doctrine of God, defined by a nameless theologian in the darkest of what are called the dark ages, I am moved to calm but decisive protest. I do not love controversy, as you know; I feel that it is better for us all to build up our own religious life than to attack the foundations of another's; and it is my habit far less to try to show how false are doctrines with which I find myself unable to agree than to detect in them, if I can, the germ of truth which gives them their hold upon the minds of men. But there are occasions on which it is desirable and necessary to adopt another course, and this is one of them. Ours is, no doubt, by principle and by inheritance, a free church, ready to welcome any fresh inspiration of truth, and refusing either to be bound by the past or to put the future in pledge; but we are, at the same time, ready to confess that our present theology is what is called Unitarian, and we stand by a theory of the Divine Nature which separates us from the rest of Christendom."

The sermon then went on to show how the thought of the undivided Unity of God was the central theological conception of the Hebrew literature, and that not even a dim premonition of a Trinity was to be found in the Old Testament; while now that, with the universal consent of scholars, the "Three Heavenly Witnesses" are expunged from the First Epistle of John, the New Testament no more than the Old contains a genuinely Trinitarian text. But the doctrine of the Trinity has a history, and the causes which led to its growth were indicated, and also the grounds of the hold it still had upon religious minds. And the sermon concluded:—

"I should lose my basal faith in religion if I thought that any radical imperfectness or limitation of my nature compelled me to put man in the place of God, or believed that the Infinite escaped me by reason of his infinity. I am ready to utter my 'O Altitudo!' and to declare the judgments of God unsearchable, and his ways past finding out, but not to deny the possibility of the access of my humble and devout spirit to its infinite Fountain, or to believe that God will not visit in help and blessing the least of his children. So that, last of all, trying to be Christ's disciples, we come back to Christ's words: 'The first of all the commandments is, Hear, O Israel; the Lord our God is one Lord: and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. This is the first commandment. And the second is like, namely this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. There is no other commandment greater than these.' Yea, Master, yea and Amen. And Thou, Father and Lord, have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to obey this law. Amen."

Dr. Beard's religious teaching will be found most fully embodied in the two volumes of his published sermons, "The Soul's Way to God" and "The Universal Christ," and in the lecture on "Jesus Christ" in the volume of "Ten Lectures on the Positive Aspects of Unitarian Thought and Doctrine," published in 1881 by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, with a preface by Dr. Martineau.

"The characteristic office of the religious seer," said Dr. Beard in that lecture, "is to report of the Eternal Realities what he has himself discerned: if he does not live with God, he cannot speak of God: if the awful touch be not upon his own soul, his words cannot convey to others the awe of the Infinite."

At the beginning of the lecture he confessed himself as one of those "who look upon Christ as the most signal manifestation of that infusion of the human with the Divine which is an universal fact, and who find in him the typical example of the method and finest achievement of human goodness." And of his own faith he said:—

"I look far beyond the complicated doctrinal systems of the Reformation, beyond even the Creeds in which an earlier Christianity strove to crystallise speculation, to Christ himself, in proof of the simplicity of all true religion. That there is one God and Father of mankind, whom we are to love with all our heart and mind and soul and strength; that all men are brethren, bound to one another by inseparable ties, making on one another inde-feasible claims; and that the one Divine Spirit lives and moves in us all, strengthening us for service and kindling us to love—to believe this is enough for life, for toil, for hope, for trust, for death."

There is a passage in Dr. Beard's Hibbert Lectures on "The Reformation in its Relation to Modern Thought and Knowledge" which may be quoted in this connection. (It will be found in the Popular Sixpenny Edition recently issued by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, p. 267.) In the lecture on "The Development of Philosophical Method and Scientific Investigation," Dr. Beard had been showing how profoundly the doctrine of Evolution modified religious thought, and, referring to the idea that the universal rule of Law left no room for a living religious experience, he said:—

"The only escape from this spiritual imprisonment lies in keeping open a region of free and intimate intercourse between God and the human soul. There is the less difficulty in this, as the existence of such a region, the reality of such an intercourse, are precisely the message which religious men in all ages bring, out of the depths of their own experience, to those who have less insight than themselves. This they announce as 'the fountain-light of all their day, the master-light of all their seeing,' and not their light only, but their strength and their consolation. And as this experience involves a series of facts as real and as little to be pushed aside as the embryonic changes and the aborted organs which are rightly regarded as so full of meaning, Religion yet retains the right of reserving to herself a space in which spirit may meet with spirit, on the one side in impulse and support, on the other in aspiration and self-surrender. Perhaps we have been too hasty in expecting to see the character of a perfect God reflected in the mirror of a material world. We ought to have recollected that only soul answers to soul."

And, again, in the third of the sermons on "The Soul's Way to God," we read:—

"Theology 'feels after God if haply it may find Him,' and that attempt implies of itself no answering motion of the Divine Spirit. . . . But religion is something more than this—more than knowledge, more than obedience, more even than aspiration and affection; it is aspiration and affection that have found their Divine Object, and are met by God half-way."

I cannot help feeling that there is a true and deep sense in which all religion is revelation. We cannot see God unless He is pleased to uncover His face. We do not ascend into heaven and there lay hold on Him; much rather He, the Omnipresent One, makes known His presence in the secret recesses of our hearts, and fills us with love and awe."

Another sermon in the same volume is on "The Fountain of Living Waters," bidding us trust in the abiding presence and inspiration of the Eternal, with the humble and the pure in heart, whose lives are lived wholly with God.

"It is difficult for those who have once fully entered into the thought, that the infinite and all-holy God is Himself the satisfaction of every human desire, to which He bends down in impartiality of tenderness, and who feel that contact with God is the condition of all true life in man, not to marvel, as they watch some interposing hindrance of priest and sacrament between their souls and the living waters, as if its life-giving virtue would manifest itself only in connection with the vessels in which they distribute it, and were not the universal source of health and strength. . . . To drink at the living spring as it issues from the earth, it is needful to bend humble knees, and to bow down one's face to the ground."

"In truth, we are not made to stand and live alone; it is not given to us to have life in ourselves. Like all the planets which circle round the sun in rejoicing quire, we reflect the light and live by the warmth of our great central Star. Our knowledge is inspiration; our holiness is grace; our strength is trust. The nearer we draw to God, the more we become our true selves. The farther we wander from Him, the more we shrink and fade out of even our poor humanity."

And to understand all the greatness of that humanity we turn to Christ. Thus Dr. Beard says in the lecture from which we have already quoted:—

"I claim this life, in all its strength, its beauty, its symmetry, for humanity: without it, my conception of what humanity is and may be would be maimed and incomplete. I cannot consent to make it a mere factor in a divine transaction; I want to feel its inspiring, soothing, liberating influence on my own soul. And that cannot be if I am to conceive of Christ as a mysterious being, altogether without parallel in the world's history: in whom was a side of strength to which nothing that is in me presents any analogy: who, while mortal, was immortal; while ignorant, was omniscient; while confined within the bounds of a human personality, was the Omnipresent, the Omnipotent, the Infinite, the Absolute. My sorest need is for the strong, bright, beautiful Son of Man."

The life of this truly human Christ is interpreted in the Fourth Gospel according to the theory of the divine Word. Of this (and this must be our last quotation) Dr. Beard speaks as follows:—

"Whence this brilliant manifestation of the force and beauty possible to humanity? Whence these pregnant and piercing words, this winning charm of goodness, this inspiring faith in human nature, this completeness of self-consecration, this sureness of ethical touch, this clearness of religious insight, this abiding sense of God's help and presence? What shall we call the force that has moulded a human life into such harmonious unity, into so symmetrical a strength? How does this manifestation of Divine power stand related to God's general dealings with mankind? When we look at Christ, what are we to think of patriarchs and prophets of old, of all sweet singers in Israel, of the strength of the hero, and the whiteness of the saint, and the wisdom of the Rabbi? Still more, can we bring into relation to him the old Greek sages, with their earnest, childlike search into the mysteries of the universe; and Socrates, with his homely human wisdom; and the reverent yet pitiful awe of Æschylus and Sophocles before the mysterious sadness of human destiny; and the sweetness of him—the Buddha—who, more than any other, preceded Christ on the path of self-sacrifice for man? The latest Evangelist supplies the answer. All wisdom, all goodness, all strength, are but manifestations of that Word of God, that Divine Reason, which is His essence. The true light is known by its universality; it is the light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world. It shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not; it cometh to its own, and its own receive it not; but not the less is it the source of all truth, the inspirer of all goodness, the light of all our seeing, the life of all our strength. No human soul but is warmed and illumined by some spark of this divine fire, a fire that, however neglected and quenched, can never be wholly extinguished; while there are those it kindles into heroism, or moulds, after long discipline, into saintliness, or inspires with thoughts that breathe and words that burn. And Christ is the finished manifestation of what God can and will do for a faithful human soul. He is the perfected type of a process which is begun in every man, yet complete in none. He is the most signal proof of the fact that God is not only about us and above us, but in us. Humanity finds its highest realisation, not in stoical self-reliance, but in childlike trust: he is most truly man who stands in closest union with God. Christ is the first-born of many brethren: humanity claims him as its own: his strength is our strength, his victory our victory, his God our God; the help which was his waits for us also, and he leads us into the presence of the universal Father."

MISS MARY BATESON.

WHEN the results of latter-day historical research are reckoned up, a very distinguished position will be accorded to the late Miss Mary Bateson. Her brief life of forty-one years came to a sudden and untimely end last November. What she wrought in that period is indeed marvellous. The marvel will not be removed, though it may be somewhat abated, when we remember that circumstances were decidedly favourable to her. The home of her father, the late Master of St. John's College, Cambridge, with its liberal atmosphere, was favourable to scholarship, as was Newnham College, which she entered in 1884, and where she took a first class in the Historical Tripos. Another priceless advantage was the quickening, stimulating personal influence of two really great historians—Mandell Creighton, who, to the loss of historical science, died Bishop of London, and the late F. W. Maitland. The first of these, who, it will be remembered, was Professor of Ecclesiastical History at Cambridge in the eighties, urged her to push her inquiries into that thick forest, mediæval monasticism. She responded to the call, and began to investigate its mazy paths, with the object of writing the history of monasticism. She spared no labour, transcribing her own materials, and, in this way, copied out the documents connected with "The Pilgrimage of Grace," which were printed. But the history of monasticism was not to be her life work. Not that the labour bestowed upon it was thrown away. No such labour ever is. The mastery she obtained over monkish Latin and mediæval French was indispensable to future investigations. Some of the work of this period was to appear later, as, for example, the learned paper on the "Origin and Early History of Double Monasteries," contributed to the Transactions of the Royal Historical Society for 1899.

Several years before the publication of this treatise she had exchanged monastic for municipal history, collaborating with the late Professor Maitland in an edition of the Borough Charters of Cambridge in 1891. A still more important work in the same field of research is her calendar, in three volumes, of the Municipal Records of Leicester, published in 1899, 1901, 1905. The result surpassed the expectations even of those who were not unaware of the rich treasures enshrined in the archives of that ancient town.

The Corporation of Leicester, in submitting their records to a competent historian for publication, set a fine example of local patriotism which other corporations might well follow. What interesting resurrections of the buried past would result if the records of such a town as Southampton, for example, were properly edited! "What a city to sack!" not in Blucher's method, but by way of the harmless and patient investigator.

Miss Bateson's exhaustive study of the Leicester records enabled her to achieve what has been described as her "most elaborate and matured work," the two volumes on "Borough Customs," the last of which appeared only a few months before her death. The Editor of "The English Historical Review," Dr. Reginald L. Poole, says of it: "In width of learning, and grasp of legal subtleties, it need not fear comparison with the best work of our most famous legal historians," and the same writer records this tribute of admiration from the late F. W. Maitland, than whom there could have been no more competent judge: "I do not know the man who both could and would have done so much and so well. She worked unselfishly for little pay, and for little glory, but her work will live, and for a long time to come anyone who writes about the history of our towns, or, indeed, about the growth of English law, will be bound to keep her book close at hand."

These mighty labours did not exhaust Miss Bateson's wonderful energy. She was ever ready for a jaunt in the bypaths of history. Thus, in 1898, she edited the Newcastle Letters for the Royal Historical Society, and in the following year "The Early English Text Society" published her edition of the poems of George Ashby. I doubt whether Ashby's poetry, as poetry, appealed to her. "It is hoped," she says in the preface, "that the present edition of the works of Ashby may prove useful to students of fifteenth century grammar."

Poor Ashby! I suppose that is hardly what he intended, and, indeed, his "Prisoner's Reflections" contains some tuneful verse; but it is something for a minor poet to be of any use at all to posterity.

In the article to which I have referred, and to which I am indebted, contributed to "The English Historical Review," Dr. Poole tells us that Miss Bateson's critics have accused her of too much technicality, and of presuming too much upon the knowledge of her readers. This is no doubt a defect in historical compositions, and Miss Bateson's work is not wholly guiltless of it. In her case it is probably due partly to her humility. It was difficult for her to understand that her learning was exceptional.

Another reason for it is, doubtless, haste. She did not give herself time to explain some things which almost demanded explanation, nor did she retouch and polish her sentences. She was an explorer, a pioneer, and not an artist. She made some brilliant discoveries. She had the instinct, so essential in research, of detecting the important in a mass of bewildering detail, but I think she was neither helped nor hindered by æsthetical considerations.

In this attempt at some appreciation of her work would it be irrelevant to say that that work reflected her character? In its absolute sincerity and rectitude, in its uncompromising faithfulness, her soul was mirrored, for those who knew her intimately have said: "As a friend she was absolutely loyal and faithful, she never changed"; and again: "Her big, generous nature was always ready to admire the work of others."

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE seventy-second annual meeting was held in the schoolroom of Unity Church, Islington, on Tuesday evening. Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, of Liverpool, presided, and the room was well filled with members and friends.

Mr. PHILIP ROSCOE, the treasurer, presented the accounts, with a balance of £11 in hand. The annual subscriptions amounted to £740 9s. 6d., and he called special attention to the donations, which amounted for the year to £204 17s. 6d. They had gained 26 new subscribers, which, as the mental and moral expenditure involved did not figure in the accounts, was a pure gain. The result was mostly due to the drawing-room meetings, but as they could not continually hold such meetings, he must renew his old appeal, Subscribe!

The Rev. HENRY GOW, the hon. secretary, read the report of the committee, which opened as follows:—

"The committee, in presenting the seventy-second annual report, acknowledge with gratitude and admiration the earnestness and courage and patient faithfulness of the missionaries, and thankfully remember the large body of helpers gathered about them at George's-row, Rhyl-street, and Bell-street, who do so much to strengthen and extend the beneficent influence of the three missions. This good work of devoted personal service among the poor, by its very success, requires a larger measure of help; and it is with our three missions, as with the kindred work at the Mansford-street and Blackfriars Missions, the appeal has constantly to be renewed, not only for the maintenance of a sufficient financial support, but for more personal help. Fresh volunteers are needed to fill up the ranks of teachers both for Sunday and week-night service, and of helpers in the various kinds of friendly effort centred in the missions, making for thrift and self-control, for health and enlightenment, and wholesome pleasures. In many quiet ways opportunities are open for personal friendship to take a share in the bearing of heavy burdens, to carry brightness into dark places, and to overcome the evils of a hard lot among those to whose welfare the missions are devoted. The committee desire once more very earnestly to urge upon the churches which have the interest of this work at heart the need for a constant renewal of effort, both in the matter of financial support and of personal service, since the ministry to the poor must be a first charge upon their faithfulness.

"It was in the hope of extending the interest in this work and deepening the sense of a common responsibility for its adequate maintenance that three drawing-room meetings were held last year in the West, South, and North of London respectively. Two of the meetings were recorded in last year's report. The third was held at Hampstead in May, through the kindness of Miss Lister, when Mr. P. M. Martineau took the chair, and the chief address was given by Mr. C. S. Loch, of the Charity Organisation Society. Dr. Read, Mr. Roscoe, and Mr. Gow also spoke. Mr. Loch gave a lucid exposition of the nature of true charity. It was not, he said, the mere giving of what, after all, might not nourish but only lead to further waste and degradation; it was rather a disciplined habit, which would remain considerate of the welfare of others, even were there no longer any need for the giving or receiving of outward gifts. It was, in the broadest sense, the ability in a good life to do good. On that principle the work of the Domestic Missions has been always based. Their great aim is to strengthen character, and, by personal influence, believing in the power of goodness, to bring out all that is best in the people themselves—to make them, as Mr. Loch said, “good want-fighters” on their own account. It has been the constant experience of the missions that those who come most completely within the circle of their influence are uplifted and strengthened, and rise superior to all degrading circumstances, and in their turn become helpers of their fellows. The reports of the missionaries will show in detail how much, and in what varied ways, good work is being done. They will, the committee trust, act as a strong incentive to other friends to come and take a share in it. No one can go down to help at one of the missions, even in the simplest way, without adding something to the power of its beneficent ministry.”

The report then referred to the loss sustained last year through the death of Mrs. Cash, and to the health lectures which had been given with good results at all three missions. The record of losses by death included seven other names besides that of Mrs. Cash—Mrs. Buckton, Mr. Wm. Colfox, Mrs. Sydney Courtauld, Mrs. Arthur Jevons, Mr. Rowland Lawford, Mr. J. E. Taylor, and Mr. Roby Waterall.

The report concluded with a sympathetic reference to the serious illness of the Rev. S. H. Street, who is now convalescent and is away at Sidmouth.

The reports of the Rev. F. Summers, of George's-row Mission, and Dr. Read, of the Rhyl-street Mission, together with a report of the work at Bell-street, prepared in Mr. Street's absence, had been as usual printed and circulated with the committee's report, &c., beforehand. We cannot attempt here to summarise these reports, and they should be read as a whole.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, expressed his pleasure in being there and his great interest in missionary work. He had been for forty-five years on the committee of the Liverpool Domestic Mission, so might claim to know something about the work, and it was never more needed than at the present time. Its object was stated in a resolution passed at the foundation of their Liverpool Mission:—“That the appropriate duties of the minister of the poor shall be to establish an intercourse with a limited number of families of the neglected poor, to put himself into close sympathy with their wants and feelings, to become to them a Christian adviser and friend, to promote the order and comfort of their homes and the elevation of their social tastes, to bring them into a permanent connection with religious influences; and, above all, to promote an effective education of their children, and to shelter them from corrupting agencies.” To that statement he should now have only one word to add, “an effective religious education of their children.” There was plenty of theology, and very poor theology, taught in the schools, but that was not religion. The influence of a good teacher, in any subject, was no doubt a religious influence, but the teaching of religion was a need they had to supply. In the work of all their missions they had the same difficulties to fight, and greatest of all, as they knew too well in Liverpool, was the drink evil. He saw it in his own experience as a magistrate on the Licensing Committee, and also as president of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. He referred with indignation to the recent medical manifesto on moderate drinking, though he was himself a moderate drinker; it was most unfortunate, and he was sure it would have most mischievous results. They could see that from the use the publicans were making of it. Referring to the work of their Licensing Committee in Liverpool, he said that two years ago they had asked the Head Constable for a list of 200 of the worst houses in the city, and thirteen of the magistrates had visited them all. In one street, about 1,000 yards long, they found three enormous houses, and on inquiry found that those three in a year drew £5,000 over the counter. It was not a street that led anywhere, so that the money was drawn from the immediate neighbourhood. They could see what an immense amount of waste that meant, and they had been greatly shocked to see how many women there were in those houses, sometimes with a baby on the counter and children playing at their feet. Now they had taken strong measures to put the evil down, and they had been well backed up by the publicans themselves. In connection with that work he paid a tribute to Miss Harriet Johnson, whom in Liverpool they thought of, he said, as the saviour of the children. Even before there had been legislation, they had told the publicans on licensing day that the police had orders to report houses where children were served, and it had the desired effect, and they did not allow a single public-house to have a back door. If people wanted to drink they had to do it openly. As to Mr. Lee Jones, of the Food and Betterment Society in Liverpool, he had the best of intentions, but he was too indiscriminate in his giving; and he had written to the papers to say it was unfair to speak of the £5,000 taken by those three public-houses as wasted, for the half of it, at least, was legitimate expenditure on the part of the men, a solace which should not be grudged them. That was an unfortunate thing to say, for the fact was the men could not afford to spend all that money on drink; it was needed in their homes and for the children. In his painful work in the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children he saw how much evil was caused by drink, and his advice to the men always was, to give it up altogether, as the only way. He did not care to argue as to what proportion of the evils from which the people suffered was directly due to drink. There was undeniably quite enough to make them do all they could to stop it. In the Society they had 3,000 cases on their books, and another 1,000 under surveillance, and drink was at the bottom of nearly all of them. In their work as magistrates they had been seriously hampered by the last licensing act. They had scheduled 80 houses to be closed, but in the one year had only been able to close 35, and now they were waiting for their laggard Government to bring in a proper licensing bill. They had heard of late, to his mind, a great deal too much about theology; what they wanted was more religion, more Christian-like thoughts. If it were possible to imbue every citizen with the pitifulness of Christ they would have done the work in a week.

The Rev. E. SAVELL HICKS seconded the resolution, and in doing so he offered on behalf of his congregation, a hearty welcome to the Domestic Mission Society to Unity Church, and expressed their pleasure in seeing Mr. Gow among them again. He had read the reports and felt it to be most admirable work. It was one of the best parts of their Unitarian work. The most striking thing in the report was, to his mind, the saying quoted by Dr. Read, of a certain working man: “There are some folks whom society has got to pay for either at the beginning or end of their lives, and it is much cheaper to pay at the beginning.” They had to recognise that they were responsible for one another, and as citizens they had to make certain sacrifices on behalf of the less fortunate, and if they did not do it early, in caring for the young lives, they had to pay for it later in the workhouse, the gaol, and the asylum. The one word to insist on was Educate. Not only for the boys and girls, but for the men and women, to teach them how to train their own children. That was what they were doing in their missions to no inconsiderable amount. The great aim, as the report said, was to strengthen character, to bring out all that was best in the people themselves. If the Domestic Missions were really doing that they deserved the earnest support of every Unitarian in London and throughout the country. Because that was their object, and because it was so largely accomplished, he had great pleasure in seconding the resolution.

The resolution was unanimously passed.

Mr. H. G. CHANCELLOR moved a resolution of confidence in the principles of the Society and appreciation of the earnest and faithful labours of the missionaries. For two thousand years, he said, they had been preaching a gospel of love and brotherhood, but all the time a gospel of hatred had been practised. In their own country the industrial revolution had solved the problem of wealth production, but had not begun to solve the question of wise and just distribution. At the bottom of society was the large body of those who did more than their fair share of producing and too little of the consuming. Those were the people their missions tried to help. Something of what their life was had been shown by the recent exhibition of sweated industries. The conditions under which they lived made it impossible for them to raise themselves. Thrift and temperance alone were not sufficient. One of the main objects of the missions was to bring to them some of the hope and helpfulness of religion. Much had been done by wise legislation and social arrangements, by factory acts, education, &c., to mitigate the condition of the poor, but until they restored to the people their inheritance in the land, the question of poverty would not be solved. He had hoped that more young people would be there that evening, and he would have appealed to them, as members of churches and as Christian citizens, to study those social problems and get down to the root of the evils, and so to educate themselves to be ready to remedy the evils in their midst. Their missions could not deal with those great problems, the community as a whole must do it, and they must educate and organise public opinion. And, meanwhile, their missions could go down among the people and bring into their lives fresh interest, hope, and helpfulness; and he could speak from personal knowledge of the varied and admirable work that was being done at all the missions in the spirit of comradeship and mutual help. No work in their midst was more after the mind of Christ himself. There must be no patronage in such work. What they did was done as for members of their own family. So only would they teach the people self-respect, and make them feel they had a character to guard. Mr. Chancellor went on to speak of the terrible evils of drink and overcrowding, and of the ignorance of mothers, and the evil wrought by the industrial system which forced them to such conditions of work that they could not care properly for their children, and then of what was done by means of health lectures and other means to mitigate the evil. He was glad the missions were helping in that good work, and provided an antidote to the public-house, and at the same time the inspiration of all, the teaching of religion, bringing to mind and conscience the sense of Divine Fatherhood, the Divine Presence in their lives.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS seconded the resolution, which was passed with much heartiness, and the Rev. F. SUMMERS and Dr. READ responded. Mr. Gow also delivered a message from Mr. Street, who pleaded for more teachers for the Bell-street Sunday-school, where they had been obliged to turn children away, because they could not ask their present teachers to undertake more.

Mr. SUMMERS, referring to what had been said as to women in public-houses, reminded the meeting that it was after all only a small proportion of the women who were like that, and as a class they must not be stamped with that character. The trouble was that the conditions of their work made it impossible for them to care properly for their children. In the country it was beautiful to see a young colt in the meadow with its mother. The farmer knew it was worth while to leave the mother free from work for that time for the sake of the little one. And they wanted the young colts of humanity looked after as well as that. Something was done by properly managed crèches to mitigate the evil, but it ought to be made possible for the mothers to nurse their own children.

Dr. READ in a very earnest address emphasised still further what he had said in his report as to the terrible infant mortality among the poor, and the sufferings entailed upon a large proportion of the children who survived by the conditions of their bringing up. When he received recently the Lord Mayor's appeal, "Will it please you to save the life of a crippled child?" he strongly felt how much better it would be to go to the root of the evil, and save the child from becoming a cripple. Much was being now done in many ways to secure better conditions of life for the children, by legislation, by municipal regulation, and the sense of responsibility was deepening. The social study circles in their churches were also a hopeful sign. If the immanence of God were a fact, it must be so in their physical as well as their moral and spiritual nature. They must work for cleanliness, decency, and self-respect among the people, and so prepare the way for higher things, and in all this remember they were fellow-labourers with God following the ideal He had quickened within them.

On the motion of the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS, seconded by the Rev. A. A. CHARLESWORTH, the officers and committee, as advertised in another column, were appointed, and a vote of thanks to the chairman and to the congregation of Unity Church, moved by Miss ANNA SHARPE and seconded by the Rev. H. Gow, brought the meeting to a close.

NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE churches in this district have been greatly favoured by an official visit from the Rev. Joseph Wood, President of the National Conference, and the impression left behind is not likely to be soon forgotten. An itinerary had been prepared by the committee of the Association, and everything done to secure the best possible results. And in this the committee has not been disappointed, for the utmost enthusiasm has been evoked. On Wednesday, May 8, Mr. Wood preached in Gateshead to a fairly large congregation. At the close of the service a conference of members and friends was held, and opportunity taken by the president of the Association to welcome Mr. Wood into the district. A stimulating address was subsequently given by Mr. Wood. On Thursday evening, May 9, Mr. Wood visited and preached in the church at South Shields. The attendance here was somewhat disappointing, but a thoroughly helpful service was experienced by those present. Barnard Castle was visited on Friday evening, May 10, and here the occasion of Mr. Wood's visit was marked with great spirit. A short welcome meeting was held to introduce our visitor, followed by a tea, generously provided by Mrs. Brass, who had personally invited her friends and acquaintances from other churches to take tea and to hear Mr. Wood. To that invitation between 60 and 70 responded, with the result that our beautiful little church in that quiet country town was almost filled with a sympathetic congregation, who greatly appreciated the preacher's earnest, broad-minded appeal. Large congregations greeted Mr. Wood on his visit to Middlesbrough on Sunday, and listened with delight and profit to his powerful sermons. On Monday, May 13, the Spring Conference of the Association was held, and proved one of the finest gatherings of the kind the Association has held. A report of the proceedings of the Conference tea and public meeting, which followed, is furnished by another correspondent. The addresses of Mr. Wood at both conference and meeting were hearty and inspiring.

Darlington was visited on Tuesday, May 14, and Sunderland on the 15th. It is difficult in a few words to express the value of such services as the gifted president of the Conference has been able to render to our churches in this district. A new life and a new spirit have been evoked, and the writer ventures to say that no better piece of work has been done here for the last twenty-five years. The churches have been made to feel that they are parts of a great church moved by the same spirit, and working for the same high and holy ends. And the Conference is to be congratulated on its choice of president, for by such generous and helpful services as he has been able to render, and the churches privileged to receive, the Conference ideal will best be attained, of welding our churches together and of making their influence felt on the community.

WESTERN UNION OF UNITARIAN AND FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

THE 61st annual meeting of the Union was held at Bridport on Thursday, May 9.

At the business meeting in the morning, the President, Mr. H. E. Thomas, took the chair, and on the appointment of officers and committee, Mr. T. A. Colfox was chosen as his successor. The accounts showed a balance of £13 in hand. On the motion of Mr. P. J. Worsley, it was decided to appoint an advisory committee.

After luncheon in the Town Hall, there was a service in the chapel, when the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, of Wandsworth, was the preacher.

In the evening a largely attended meeting was held in the Town Hall, Mr. T. A. Colfox in the chair. After the chairman, the speakers were the Rev. A. E. O'Connor, of Torquay, on "The Importance of Scripture Study;" the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, on "The Unity of Unitarians;" the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, on "The World Movement in Liberal Religion;" the Rev. J. H. Belcher, on "The Unity of Humanity," and the Rev. A. N. Blatchford on "Our Social Heritage." The Rev. H. S. Solly proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman, which was carried by acclamation, and the Benediction, pronounced by the Rev. Jeffery Worthington, brought the meeting to a close.

We regret that, owing to the lateness of the material placed at our disposal, we cannot do more than give this brief report, but may add that a good report of the speeches at the public meeting appears in this week's Bridport News.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

SIR,—As President of the London District Unitarian Society I have been asked to draw the attention of the friends of the Society and Unitarians in London generally to a generous offer which has been received of an additional subscription of £50 per annum for five years, which is made conditional upon £450 in subscriptions being raised before June 30 next.

The Committee have for some time past been desirous of appointing a Missionary or Ministerial Agent, and of organising lectures explanatory of Unitarian principles in the numerous populous districts where our message is practically unknown, but have been deterred through lack of funds.

In response to a private appeal new subscriptions amounting to £270 have been already promised, including the £50 before referred to. The Committee therefore now confidently appeal to the London Unitarian public for their support to complete the balance of £230 still needed to enable them to avail themselves of this generous offer.

Promises of new or increased subscriptions will be thankfully received by the hon. treasurer, Dr. C. F. T. Blyth, 22, Tanza-road, Hampstead, or the hon. secretary, Rev. E. Savell Hicks, 26, Marquess-road, Canonbury, N.

JOHN HARRISON.

Essex Hall, May 15, 1907.

SIR,—The report of the London District Unitarian Society just issued must, from its financial aspect, be very painful reading to all who have at heart the interests of liberal religion.

The objects of the Society are fully set out in the rules appended to the report, but they may, perhaps, be summarised by the comprehensive formula adopted by the Laymen's Club, namely, "To promote social intercourse amongst the members of the London Unitarian and Free Christian Churches, and to further the interests of liberal religious thought."

Bearing in mind the aims of the Society and the noble work it has done in the past, and is still doing towards the attainment of its objects, it would seem almost incredible, but for the fact disclosed in the financial statement, that the total subscriptions from the whole of the supporters of the London Unitarian and Free Christian Churches during the year 1906 amounted only to £210 18s. 6d.

This is surely a reproach to London.

An earnest appeal was made for increased support by the President, by Dr. Blake Odgers and others, at the meeting of the Society on Wednesday last, and there can be little doubt that if the supporters of liberal religion throughout London are brought face to face with the deplorable evidence of their indifference—as disclosed by the figures—the error of their want of thought will be repaired by the overflowings of their heart in the future.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.

SIR,—As a parent of one of the boys, I read your article on Willaston School in last week's INQUIRER with great pleasure. My boy has been at the school for nearly two years, and he has improved in all ways. The tone of the school is excellent, the method of teaching modern, and the physical requirements of the boys are well attended to. It is, however, the general atmosphere, and the varied interests, which are the striking features of Willaston School, and these are most important factors in character building—the end of all true education. The one need is the increase in the number of scholars, and I strongly advise parents who are seeking a school to visit Willaston, feeling confident that they will be most favourably impressed. The public school idea is indeed a fetish which it is time we ceased to worship blindly. In some circles it is considered the "correct thing" to send a boy to these schools (if the parents' purse is long enough), irrespective of other and more important considerations. I venture to assert that Willaston possesses all the advantages of a public school, without its dangers, and I sincerely hope your article will stir up Unitarians, at any rate, to take more interest in this excellent school, so that the present accommodation, ample though it is, may soon prove inadequate to the demands upon it.

TOWARDS CATHOLICISM.

SIR,—A few weeks back a letter appeared in your columns under the above heading, which, apparently, failed to win a response from your readers, save only Monsieur Paul Sabatier, who sent a message of cordial approval to the writer. Many people in many churches long for the establishment of a truly catholic church, in which all God's children may join in common worship and service regardless of individual theological opinion. The current number of the Hibbert Journal opens with a trilogy on the new reformation; truly, there is a "stirring of the sap"! The difficulties opposing its realisation are immense, but surely not insuperable. It is true that we do not know "in what outward form the great consummation shall finally appear," but need we say "it is not for us to know or to ask"? One would rather think with Sir Oliver Lodge, "we have to discover, but we have also to realise." "An idea must be incarnated before it is effective . . . and upon our terrestrial activity the date of this Advent depends. It is in our power to make ready the way"; and he concludes with a sympathetic reference to the ideals of our revered teacher and leader, Dr. Martineau. May the suggestion that we take the initiative in making an inquiry into the possibility of united action be carried a step further by adding that this appears to be a work for which the National Conference is eminently fitted, and in which it would naturally receive the support of our existing Provincial Assemblies? We can afford to build our trust where action is based on wisdom and love.

FOREST GATE CHURCH.

SIR,—Your report of the London District Unitarian Society's recent meeting states that "at Forest Gate . . . there was cause for anxiety." No such statement appears in the Society's own report, just issued, nor was any hint of the kind given at the above-mentioned meeting. Had there been, it would have been challenged by some who are fully acquainted with the conditions under which our worship and work are carried on at Upton Lane.

However, as one of a devotedly attached and absolutely united body of officers and members, I beg leave to assure friends, near and far, who know what kind of a ministry we enjoy, that any anxiety which disturbs our peace has reference only to ways and means—which, apparently, is the case with the London District Society, judging by its financial statements.

Our lot is the common lot of our struggling churches, but then we think our compensations are very uncommon.

Member of the Forest Gate

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Accrington.—The annual school sermons of the Oxford-street Unitarian Free Church were preached on Sunday, May 12, to large congregations, by the Rev. Charles Travers, of Preston.

Belfast: All Souls' Church.—The anniversary services were held on Sunday, May 12, when the preacher was the Rev. E. I. Frigg, of Clifton. There were large congregations, and there was a special note of joy and thanksgiving, owing to the extinction of the heavy debt on the building, which has been for many years a serious hindrance to the life of the congregation. The happy event was further celebrated by a large social gathering of the congregation held in the Central Hall on Monday, May 13. Messages of congratulation were received from the Revs. Dr. Drummond (of Oxford), Joseph Wood, and Henry Gow, and short addresses were given by the Rev. E. I. Frigg and the Rev. W. H. Drummond. During the evening Mr. J. F. Milligan was the recipient of a letter and resolution to be presented afterwards in a more permanent form, expressing the cordial thanks of the congregation to him on his retirement from the office of treasurer, which he has held for the long period of 21 years. All Souls' Church, now happily free of debt, is recognised as one of the most beautiful buildings in the north of Ireland. Next year, the congregation which worships within its walls will keep its bicentenary. It has been decided to celebrate the occasion by the erection of a Lecture Hall, towards the cost of which a substantial legacy has been received recently, and by commemorating the history of the congregation and the names of its ministers on a tablet to be placed under the west window of the nave.

Belper.—Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday, May 12, when Rev. T. J. Jenkins preached appropriate sermons to large and appreciative congregations. Special hymns and anthems were rendered by an augmented choir. Collections were made in aid of the Sunday school funds.

Burnley.—The annual sermons of the Burnley-lane Unitarian Mission were preached in the mission-room on Sunday, May 12. The preacher in the morning was the Rev. J. M. Whiteman, who spoke on Christ in the Temple. The preacher, afternoon and evening, was the Rev. A. Cobden Smith, of Manchester, formerly of Burnley. In the afternoon he took for his subject "There is a lad here." In the evening he spoke on St. Paul. He also expressed his pleasure at being again at the mission after an absence of eight years. The services were very well attended, the room being crowded afternoon and evening. There will only be two more Sundays in the present room. The new mission-room in Rushworth-street is to be opened on Sunday, June 2.

Halifax.—The Sunday school anniversary services were held at Northgate-end Chapel, on Sunday, May 12, when the Rev. Frank Walters, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, preached morning and evening. There was a children's service in the afternoon, with an address by Mr. Fred Sharp, of Halifax. The collections for school expenses realised £19 2s. 6d.

Leeds, Holbeck.—Successful Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday last, when the Rev. C. J. Street, of Sheffield, preached morning and evening. In the afternoon a service for parents and scholars was held, when a number of scholars recited a series of selected poems from Longfellow, under the general title, Psalms of Life. The anthem and some of the hymns were also from Longfellow. The congregations were larger than formerly, the collections improved, and Mr. Street's sermons interested and impressed all who heard them.

London: Lewisham.—In May, 1897, Dr. Brooke Herford and other ministers and friends inducted the present minister, the Rev. W. W. Chynoweth Pope, into all the privileges and work of this newly established congregation, and every year since that date the anniversary has been kept with gratifying results. This year the usual course has been pursued, and, by general consent, the anniversary meetings were the brightest and most enthusiastic the congregation has known. In addition to the Sunday services, when there were large congregations, there was a public meeting on May 9 with an attendance of nearly a hundred. Mr. Harold Wade presided, and the friends assembled half an hour before the meeting to make his acquaintance. Several of those present had a lively recollection of Mr. Wade's father and the keen interest he took in Sunday-school work and denominational affairs. Inspiring addresses on "Theology in the Twentieth Century" were given by the Revs. Charles Roper and E. Savell Hicks, and were much appreciated.

London: Mansford-street.—Last Saturday, May 11, the Guild again entertained a hundred blind folk with their hundred guides, a substantial tea being supplemented with a feast of good music and fun. Needless to say, the pleasure was mutual; Guild members find in such acts of simple service a source of great joy and strength.

Manchester: Bradford.—The seventh anniversary of the Mill-street Free Church was held on Sunday, May 12. The Rev. Dendy Agate preached at both services, afternoon and evening. The sermon at night, "A Glorious Church," was enjoyed by a fair attendance. Special music was rendered by the choir.

Middlesbrough.—The anniversary services were conducted at Christ Church last Sunday by the Rev. Joseph Wood, President of the National Conference, who also attended the spring conference of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association held on the following day. At the afternoon Conference the President, the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, took the chair, and the following four papers were read:—"Our Young People and the Guild Movement," by Mr. W. Harrison, of Middlesbrough; "The Social Service Movement," by the Rev. G. A. Ferguson, of Gateshead; "The Duty of the Church in Relation to Sunday-schools," by Mr. C. M. Slater, of Newcastle-on-Tyne; and "Our Special Difficulties," by the Rev. S. S. Brettell, of Darlington. After tea a public meeting was held in the church, the chair being taken by Alderman Sir J. B. Ellis, of Newcastle, when addresses were given by the Rev. Joseph Wood and others.

Mottram.—The church has just suffered a severe loss in the death of Mrs. Hannah Shaw, a life-long friend and for many years a faithful, devoted worker. The past winter has been unusually heavy in losses to this church by deaths.

The Sunday-school anniversary services last Sunday, preacher Rev. Jenkyn Thomas, of Glossop, were attended by crowded congregations. The collections totalled about £19 10s., a little less than last year.

Poole (Appointment).—The Rev. H. Shaen Solly, M.A., of Bridport, has received and accepted a cordial invitation to become minister of the Unitarian Church here, and will enter on his duties in the beginning of July.

A MAN might as well write a treatise on the passions and affections who never felt an emotion, as talk of theology without having his heart moved with the life of God. The questions to be solved are not within his apprehension; their constituent elements are to him things unknown; and no one will ever speak a profitable or reconciling word on the deep unclosed questions of atonement, or depravity, or conversion, or the everlasting forfeitures of sin, who does not know how these questions take their rise out of his own personal relations to God, who has not trembled at the contrasts of the intreating nearness of His grace, and of the awful distance of His righteousness. It is a knowledge of the fundamental facts of all our evil and of all our good, brought into consistent relation with a Parent Spirit and with a kingdom of heaven, which can alone save any class of theologians, on the one hand, from being professional scribes and doctors of the law, living on empty traditions and speaking by rote; or, on the other, from being a mere school of sentimentalists, without a growing nucleus of positive truth. What are the fundamental beliefs, capable of being stated in a doctrinal form, and which as far as we can have a system of faith give it to us, is the great question that throws light over the whole field of comparative religion; and it was when he who is the head of that religion which, as we believe, sums up and perfects all the rest, in that discourse which contains more of affirmative teaching about God than can be found anywhere else, laid his foundations, as in the Beatitudes, on the rock of inward knowledge, on that contact of the Holy Spirit with our spirits which alone makes real ground, that the people stood astonished at the irresistible power of his doctrine, and surrendered to the authority with which he taught.—John Hamilton Thom.

WHIT-WEEK ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS.

"BEAUTIFUL summer weather," "perfect weather," our Whit-week record for the last two years, has not been our fortune for 1907. We had our midsummer at Easter this year, and during the present week, up to Thursday at any rate, have not quite known where we were. But that did not dim the beauty of the flowers in Little Portland-street Chapel at the Anniversary Service, or mar the "sunshine on our faces." It has been a thoroughly good week, overflowing with the constant pleasure of such a great gathering of friends, and the meetings have had the more zest from the presence of so many visitors from other lands. The greetings from America, personally delivered, have already brought to us a foretaste of what we are to enjoy in the International gathering at Boston in September.

The absence of an Essex Hall Lecture this year brought the public meeting forward to Tuesday evening, and the Conversazione in the King's Hall, Holborn, was on Wednesday instead of Thursday, so that the latter evening was open for the Temperance Association. Into that day, in addition to the Conference of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, were also crowded, as usual, the Postal Mission and the Ministers' meetings, and for the first time the annual meeting of the National Conference Union for Social Service. If we survive, we shall in due time have some report of all these to give.

The annual meeting of the Sunday School Association made a very pleasant beginning of the week's meetings, and its conference, as will be seen from our report, was on a high level of inspiration and practical helpfulness. The speeches at Tuesday evening's public meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association included an address by Mr. GROSVENOR TALBOT, the President, the greetings of the Rev. R. W. BOYNTON, from the American Unitarian Association; of Prof. EERDMANS, of Leiden, from the Dutch Protestantenbond; and of Miss MARY E. RICHMOND, of Wellington, from the Unitarians of New Zealand; and speeches by the Revs. CHARLES HARGROVE, W. H. DRUMMOND, J. PAGE HOPPS, and CHARLES PEACH. These reflected admirably the variety of thought and of temperament in our religious communion, and furnished abundant matter for serious thought.

The anniversary sermon, by the Rev. ALEXANDER WEBSTER, of Aberdeen, appears in full in our present issue. There was a good congregation to hear it on Wednesday morning, and the service, as usual, in its music owed much to Mr. JOHN HARRISON, whose absence, and the reason for it, we so much regretted last year. Of the sermon, greatly as we honour the preacher for his strenuous and ardent work in Scotland, we are bound to say that it repeatedly raised a protest in our mind; with its fundamental claim and final appeal we are in complete accord. Revelation must indeed be widened to Nature, Incarnation to humanity, and the terms of our theology must be universalised. But the keen spirit of the fighter, who through sore conflict has won his own spiritual freedom, leads Mr. WEBSTER, as it appears to us, to do very far from justice to the older forms of religious life which have now to be left behind. He does indeed recognise in a phrase the value of the Psalms and "the ethical humanism of the regenerative prophets," but we cannot believe that the religion of Israel, and Christian Orthodoxy which he sets down as merely the successor to a false Judaism, were so void of vital religious force as one would conclude from the method of the sermon. A devout Jew, whether of the orthodox or critical school, would, we feel sure, indignantly protest against such a picture of his people's religious past. The wisdom of our progressive life surely is to recognise and take with us all the spiritual truth which quickened the older forms of religious life.

THE RELIGION OF UNITARIANS.

RICHARD ACLAND ARMSTRONG.

NEARLY twenty years ago I was in Norway with my friend, Richard Armstrong. The sun had set, and the northern twilight was settling down on the mountains, and glaciers, and the lake and the fiord. No sound was to be heard save the mysterious "mighty voice" of the mountain torrents. We were not all in an equally serious mood, and some of us were indulging in trivial conversation and friendly jokes, and a song was suggested. Armstrong protested so seriously that the suggestion dropped at once; and he told me afterwards that he felt anything trivial or frivolous would have been quite as much out of place, and quite as irreverent then and there as it would have been in the midst of divine service in the church where we had worshipped together on the preceding Sunday.

Amid grand and impressive scenery, he seemed to be always distinctly and consciously in the presence of God, or at least whenever he rested from actual exertion or movement. Even in a cathedral you may stroll up and down, talk, admire, examine and even criticise; but as soon as you sit down to rest, and think, silence becomes imperative, and worship inevitable. So it was with him in nature's vast cathedral.

It was another part of that very same visit to Norway that he referred to in his sermon on "The Theism of Nature":—

"I steal along a little path on the cliff side, skirting the western margin of the fiord, and the sound of voices dies away, and I am alone with the mountains and the waters and the skies. . . . Alone with the mountains and the waters and the skies? Nay, not alone! Less alone a thousand-fold than in the chattering hotel, or in the streets of the huge cities at home. . . . Less alone there in the solitude than on any other spot of earth. For never with such enchanted voice on any other spot of earth did all the elements seem to murmur 'Our God is here. He holds us and he moulds us. Our form is from the pressure of his hand; our tints are from the fragrance of his breath. Our God is here and we in him, and he in us and in thee too whilst thou standest in this temple which we are.'"

In nature he saw a constant manifestation of the divine power and the divine love, so that in communion with nature man was really in communion with God, and with a God who had made a world not only worthy of our admiration and love, but worthy also of his own love, and full of spiritual human life which no less than the physical life of the world was a manifestation of the divine creative power and a field for divine love.

After speaking of the witness of the natural world to God, he continues:—

"Still more eloquently persuasive, still more powerfully convincing should be contact with those who are his children, beings in his image, partakers of his life, delegates of his mysterious will power, sharers of his holy love. Of all witnesses to God before us these should be the most convincing, our fellow-men. In their presence, above every presence of,

'Mighty mountains, purple-breasted,
Peaks cloud-cleaving, snowy-crested,' should be borne in upon us the solemn certitude, 'God is here, the God of might and love.'"

And as I have said, he interprets this world of nature and man as a worthy field for the love of God, and a source of delight to him.

"The only explanation of the universe, of the creation of the innumerable spirits of intelligent and ethical beings, lies in the thought that God has brought them into existence because to him also the fullest realisation of self consists in entering into relation with a world of souls capable of some fellowship with him. And the most reverent conception we can form of our relation to God is that it is a holy delight to him to enter into relations of love with us, to love us from the depths of his own eternal being, and to be loved by us with the sacred love of spiritual beings for their God and Father. . . . It is always with faltering lips and hesitating tones that we must apply human terms to him who is above all humanity. But yet I think we may dare humbly and reverently to say that God is glad when we do the difficult right, when we bravely, steadfastly, lovingly do the best and highest we know."

Armstrong's religion is founded in admiring love of the universe which God has created, and reverent love for God who created it, and a sense of personal communion which needs no vindication, no bridging over of any gulf, save that natural bridging over of the dividing line between two conscious beings which God Himself has provided as between will and act, so between man and man, so between man and God.

"The central, living, enduring, priceless essence of Christianity was the fellowship of man with God, the reality of the life of prayer, the truth of the communion of the human soul with the divine, as of a child with his father."

But this consciousness of direct personal communion with God never involves him in any confusion of persons. "It is absolutely essential to the balance of truth that we keep our grasp on the fundamental fact that the man's Ego, the human self, is not God's Ego, the Divine self, however fully the soul feels itself penetrated and permeated by the God who encompasses and sustains it." Harmony with God, union such as is possible between friend and friend, is the ideal relation between man and God. The union may be similar to that of children with their father, or even like the union of marriage—a figure which almost startles one now, but is common enough with the Old Testament writers. But it is always union with another than self.

To Armstrong, God and the human soul are always absolutely distinct persons, and his belief in the freedom of the human will is so strong, that when confronted by the objection that if man is absolutely free God cannot always know beforehand what man will do, he accepts the limitation of the fore-knowledge of God rather than of free-will of man.

Law—the absolute inviolable law of God—reigns throughout what we call the natural world.

"And yet with all that sweep of law, so wide yet so minute, to each human soul is known one place which God himself has cleared, one spot where law itself stands back before a power other than itself, one tiny territory where God refrains from all compulsion, no longer rules with the iron sway with which he rules the seas and the hills and the stars of heaven, but only persuades, entreats, strives by love to win. For, mystery of mysteries though it be, each man finds in himself a power to say, 'I will' or 'I will not.'"

"God neither dooms the world to be for ever the prey of evil, nor will God, without man, ever sweep the evil away. It is our wonderful, awful, sublime prerogative that this—the most tremendous sphere of evolution—is given over to us. On us it is that it depends: on our faithfulness or faithlessness, on our devotion or indifference, on our urgent resolute labour or our laxity and idleness. . . . No-where else than in the will of man can we find the faintest traces of any other energies than those which are the direct working of God himself through the objects of the universe. . . . But here in man, locked up in his weak frame, you have an energy which is not God, the mystery and marvel of the human will, self-determining, made free by Divine decree to do or not to do. We stand alone, we men and women, in all the universe, so far as it is known to us, free agents by the side of God."

"And to us—to us whom God has thus made monarchs of the world—he confides this mighty task of destroying the evil and consummating the good. . . . God himself will do all else. He will keep the planets in their places. He will provide the sunshine and the rain. He will cause the seasons to roll and the centuries to pass. . . . But he will not without us make his kingdom come. He will not without us, decree that next century or in a thousand centuries, faithfulness and goodness and purity shall prevail. But to every one of us he says, 'Come, help me.' And every one of us confronts a task which he may or may not do; but on his doing or not doing depends, in the measure of his capacity, the coming sooner or later of the day when humanity shall have risen up to the full fruition of its sacred heritage."

Such is Armstrong's theism and his humanism. His doctrine of God and of man. It is a religion of personal responsibility, and of personal faith which does not shrink from the responsibility. It is a religion of manliness and strength and light, as he himself describes it in a sermon preached after the Bishop of Liverpool had spoken of the "darkness of Unitarianism":

—"The Unitarian Christian, while rejoicing to the full in the flood of light concerning God and his love revealed by Jesus both by his word and by his life, loving and honouring him with full and devout heart, longing for his spirit, seeing in him a marvellous realisation of the true relation of our human kind to the Eternal, does not believe that this is the only avenue lying open from the divine heart to the human. The Unitarian Christian looks out upon a world flooded with the divine light. From all quarters of the heavens, to his vision streams the light of God. There is no dark quarter. He believes that the love of God was poured out upon his children millenniums before the name of Jesus was ever spoken, is poured out now on millions who have never heard that blessed name. He finds witness of God in every branch of knowledge. In the loveliness, the splendour, nay, in the stern awfulness of outward nature, he hears whispers of the eternal voice. He finds Christs—many and many a Christ—who penetrate to the depths of the soul, in mothers nursing their children, in fathers teaching their boys and girls, in wise teachers, in great and noble books, in all the varied life and thrill of our human race; and from all of these he delights to learn more and more of God. I speak of Unitarianism at its best and highest. The Unitarian, alas! no more always lives up to the exaltation of his gospel than the Evangelical to that of his. But this, this receiving of and rejoicing in the light that floods the world from God the Father everywhere and always, is the ideal of Unitarian religion."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Carlisle (Resignation).—The congregation of the Viaduct Church met on Sunday evening after service and accepted "with profound regret" the resignation of the Rev. A. Thornhill. A resolution was unanimously passed placing on record "the high appreciation of the members of the services Mr. Thornhill has rendered to the church under somewhat trying conditions, and in especial of the work he has done in bringing the Sunday School to its present state of efficiency." Mr. Thornhill hopes after a short period of recuperation to resume active work. In memory of his late wife, Hannah Thornhill, a new church hall and class room has been formed by the removal of the vestibule screen toward the interior of the church, thus effecting a great improvement in the general convenience and appearance of the building. The work has been done at the expense of the minister, several members of the church undertaking the work of redecoration.

Horsham.—The Whit Sunday anniversary gathering was held for the 134th time, when able discourses were delivered by the Rev. Alfred Hall, of Norwich. The usual arrangements were made by Mrs. Martin and her helpers for the comfort and convenience of the guests. Rather a smaller number of visitors than usual were present. The collections for the Provincial Assembly and B. and F.U.A. were over the average.

Taunton (Farewell).—On Thursday, May 16, the Rev. F. A. Homer gave a tea to the children of the Mary-street Schools, and the men of the Bible-class also had tea later, and afterwards farewell presentations were made to Mr. Homer on his leaving Taunton. The smaller children gave him a brass letter holder and a bouquet of flowers for his wife, and the others gave him a handsome inkstand and fountain pen. The members of the Bible-class said they hoped for another occasion to make their own gift.

THE ASSOCIATION SERMON.

THE SOUL'S REST.*

THE SOUL'S REST UNDER THE EASY YOKE AND THE LIGHT BURDEN.

By THE REV. ALEXANDER WEBSTER.

"Come unto Me, and I will give you rest."—
Matt. xi. 28.

THIS is an echo of a primitive promise, a reverberation of an ancient prophecy.

In the period of pioneering, the Hebrew leader, despairing of attainment, was cheered by the Divine declaration: "My presence shall go with you and I will give you rest."

After the dispersion from Canaan, Israel was again homeless and captive, and the spirit of comfort came with the prophetic message, "My people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, sure dwellings and quiet resting places."

Israel's quest for rest is pathetic; the failure of it is tragic. The literature that chronicles it shows its illusiveness. The selfish vision of conquest and possession; the Messianic mirage appear in history as pious phantasms.

"Still bent to make some port, he knows not where,

Still standing for some false impossible shore,"

Israel appears as the perpetual wanderer seeking rest and finding none.

The discovery of myth and legend in the Bible, of inveterate chronicles, of deliberate colouring in the interest of party, is not the most important result of Biblical science. The most vital significant fact is that the Bible reveals the inherent untruthfulness and ineffectiveness of Autocratic Theology and Ceremonial Religion. Without intending it, the Biblical writers show Israel's unrest, the futile endeavour of its soul to find quietness within the yoke of an imagined Infinite monarchy, and peace under the burden of appeasing ceremony. This is the philosophic issue beyond all literary criticism, the inward spiritual tragedy which the Bible impressively discloses.

There are two acts in the revealed tragedy. The first scene assumes Yahweh, enthroned as sole monarch whose authority is absolute. His invisible presence is a terror; his demands are imperious; his wrath is insufferable. A priesthood is appointed to mediate sacrificially, and the blood of beasts flows incessantly for the Divine appeasement. The people have no access to God; they are not permitted to touch anything in which His presence is manifested.

In the second scene we see the temple rising by kingly persistence, and ceremony elaborated and established. Piety is sensuous. A moral spirit is not in existence. The glamour of monarchical magnificence is upon the people, and they sacrifice willingly. They have no civic power, but are entirely subordinate to king and priest. Their one duty is to obey and pay. There is no sense of spiritual value; even in God's sight they appear as nothing, or only as a mass of disgusting life.

In the second act, the prophet appears with moral idealism and enthusiasm.

* The Annual Sermon of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, preached in Little Portland Street Chapel on Wednesday morning, May 22.

He impeaches the priestly rulers in their bloodiness, treats the burnt-offering as an abomination, and introduces the forces of revolution. He suggests the divineness of human nature, and touches the soul for finer issues. His main cry is for a man,—whole, capable, devoted—as an agent of the Infinite Righteousness, anointed for truth and peace.

We see the altar overturned, the priest dismissed, the temple desolate. The evicted sensuousness wails over the desolation, but the evolved spiritually rejoices in the prospect of purity of heart which will realise a holier vision.

But the prophet was not free from illusion. He dreamt so vividly of Messiah that he made his dream a doctrine. The great effort was an attempt to humanise God and gain fresh access to Him, but it was a reconfinement of God, a limitation of his inspiration to one individual, a consignment of his power to a single magnate.

The prophet was a patriot, and in his patriotism he made the chosen people supreme alone in divine favour, the centre of regard for tributary nations.

The idea was inherently selfish. The Messianic Kingdom was the old Theocracy in a delegated form. Its yoke was that of external obligation; its burden was statutory rule. Obedience was not the spiritual response of an intelligent conscience, but the submissive yielding of an overawed servility. The Messianic idea brought God near in a vicarious way, but it did not raise a sense of worth in man himself. It did not authorise conscience or endow mind. It was not democratic. The spirit was to be upon Messiah, not immanent in the mass. The people were still unmoralised subjects. There was no vivifying motive in the idea, no impulse of personal consciousness, no pressure of intelligence.

As the herald of the new era of sanctified humanity and religion of the spirit, Jesus stood announcing the easier yoke and the lighter burden, and promising the rest they had to give.

Is there any truth in his paradox of rest in labour and ease in burden-bearing? What yoke and burden did he present? Is this but a new illusion that he suggests? Another thousand years of pursuit of the impossible?

A philosopher of our day has said that "To find a legitimate satisfaction for the religious emotions is the problem of problems of our age." That problem burdens us. In an endeavour to solve it we are associated. The endeavour would be impossible had we not some restful impulse, some quiet of soul. We are sensible of a yoke deliberately entered into, conscious of a pressing burden, and we desire to be sure they are of truth. We do not seek to be unyoked or unladen, but to bear restraint easily and carry obligation joyously. How can we have this divine experience, this ecstasy of labour?

We have, first of all, as those who would be yoke-fellows with Jesus, to apprehend his ideal, to perceive what it was that he saw in his review of the theology and religion of Israel, and what was actually in his mind when he spoke of the rest for the soul.

We come upon him as an active, critical, regenerative force in a close, sacerdotal environment. He boldly expresses his antagonism to the autocratic authority. He indignantly impeaches the priestly system, pronounces condemnation of its hypocrisy and inhumanity. The priests feel that he is their foe; the lawyers know that he disapproves of their methods; the elders realise that he lives in another world of thought than theirs. His conception of Deity is heterodox, anti-Judaic. God to him is not monarch, but parent. He discards sacrifice of life and adopts instead the sanctified preservation of it. The people realise that he has sympathy with them. He views them in the light of God's Fatherhood, and opens to them the kingdom of heaven. The old standard of wealth was cattle; his was souls. He said to those who left their boats for the discipleship: "Be fishers of men!"

His influence is invigorating, his word has power. He has a Gospel. He speaks of God as never man did before; his utterance is a surprise, his presence a charm. There is a sense of rest in his company; the stress of things is remitted, the strain of pain is relieved. The yoke of service is easy, and the burden of care is light under the spell of his faith in the perfect goodness. Trust in God is spontaneous while he speaks. Disease departs. The demons disappear, misery has no hold, heaven opens, blessedness has come.

"Was it that as he preached, the sky, the hillside, the sun-glow, the sun itself lightened, that the heart of each man and woman lightened, that the mind of each lightened, that even the white innocence of the little children grew more fair to see!"

The invitation to rest is the reflection of that experience in the soul of the people. It is an embodiment of the feeling of regeneration and elevation which comes with the renewal of mind and freshening of heart.

There is much in the Gospels that is not history, but which is better than any mere chronicle of fact. We have to deliver Jesus from materialising and metaphysical influences. His work was specifically moral and spiritual; its physical effects sprang from his enthusiasm for life. The eyes he opened were mental. The deafness he dissolved was intellectual. The death he counteracted was moral. The water he turned into wine was in the soul. The sea he walked on was in the conscience. The storm he stilled was in the heart.

We may, without doubt, credit him with the realisation of the falsity and failure of Judaism. He perceived the foolishness of its egotism and the futility of its attempts at supremacy. He detected the want of ethical warrant in its theology, the inconsistency of its sacrifice of life, the unspirituality of its ceremony. He sought to show that in the sphere of the mind itself there are means of immediate relations with God, and that, through these, first hand and direct apprehension of Him was possible.

He profoundly discerned the law of spiritual life. He recognised the necessity for constant fulfilment of thought and action. He perceived that spiritual progress up to perfection was possible for man, and set the soul for it.

He saw that a perpetuated code, an unalterable set of statutes, a permanent ceremonial were disallowed by the nature of things. The method of dictation, with its correlative of unintelligent unspiritual acquiescence is against the law of the mind. Therefore he sought to arouse intellectual and moral life in the common mind, to educate the spirit of the individual so as to evoke effective personal power, and have assent to righteousness made intelligent and spiritual.

It is evident that he was a naturalist and a humanist. He turned concern from synagogue and temple to nature and humanity. From roll and rite he took thought out to living things. He instituted a new line of inquiry and a new kind of speech regarding God. He took theology into the field of natural science, and brought conscience into religion. He connected himself with the poetic naturalism expressed in the sacred lyrics of Hebrew faith, and the ethical humanism of the regenerative prophets.

The revolution of thought and feeling he presented was complete. The old-time ideas were thoroughly fulfilled.

In the view of Jesus, the radical effect of the autocratic system lay in its powerlessness to produce character in the people. They had no voice or part in it. They were mere spectators—little more than stocks or stones—under it. The vicarious mediation involved in it made them of no account, they had neither to think nor act in any living way. The worship prescribed was codal, not spiritual. To Jesus, the worship of God had its spring in a sense of worth in the individual soul. A personal moral consciousness was what he aimed at as a basis for religion. He desired to have religion felt as the soul's own aspiration towards an ideal worth. He saw that there could be no life for the soul but in continuous aspiring, no rest but in persistent thought, no peace but in perpetual effort to reach the highest.

The most painful thing to Jesus was the suppression of soul he saw. There was an elaborate code, a magnificent priesthood—all the pomp and circumstance of an official religion, but no real soul life. It was a ghastly simulacrum, a terrible pretence. Under it the spirit of the people groaned and festered, full of sores that the priest did not touch.

The ritualists were more concerned for altar material than for moral spirit. When Jesus suggested that reconciliation with a brother was more essential than the temple tithe they took counsel to destroy him. His dissolution of the yoke and burden of imagined appeasing dues to an Infinite Autocrat cost him his life. His advocacy of the soul brought upon him the cross.

A primary condition for sharing the enthusiasm of Jesus in yoke-bearing and burden-bearing is readiness and integrity in labour. The rest is not preferred to idleness and burdenlessness. The boon of ease is not for libertinism, irresponsibility or separateness, but for restraint, obligation and association. The delight of lightness is not for emptiness, carelessness, or thoughtlessness, but for fulness, seriousness and strenuousness. The yoke must be glorified before it is easy, the burden must be honoured ere it becomes light.

"All ye that labour," all that welcome intellectual activity, and are willing to continue the pursuit of righteousness, are included in the invitation to rest. Not cessation, but absence of strain; not deliverance from yokement, but the joy of its ease; not the riddance from burden, but the rapture of lightness in the persuasion of rightness are offered.

The invited are the enthusiasts of labour, who have the emotion of perfection. The self-satisfied, the shirkers, those who are pre-occupied with worldly interests are not bidden. The heedless, the unsympathetic are not called.

Nor are those asked who have surrendered their mind to any vicarious system, who have adopted a final creed and stopped thought at the bidding of a dogmatic authority. There can be no true rest for faculty unexercised. Reason suppressed is more burdensome than reason freed. The yoke of a statute laid on by dictation is more irksome than that of a principle borne by the conscience in enlightened freedom. The burden of science, by reason of its buoyant intelligence, is lighter than that of superstition.

The invitation is from a worker to workers. He has yoked himself to an ideal, he has taken up his load of compassion and thus speaks.

His invitation marks an evolutionary departure from the old-time thought and practice which was arrested. The rest he offered was not entered into. The Hebrew mind could not throw off its egotism and carnality. The autocratic theology, with its accretion of sacrificial servility, was too deeply impressed on Israel's mind to be erased at once. The priesthood had so strong a grip of the overawed soul that its power outlasted its actual presence.

The mediæval mind (which assimilated Judaism) was imperious and sensuous in its own way, and its literature and art reflect its lordly dominance and splendour. Its dogmas glorified an irresponsible absolutism, its ritual sanctified slavish homage.

Whether we take Papalism or Protestantism, we find both in the seat and garment of Omnipotence, acting as if all authority and power had been given to them from on high.

We look through the smoke of polemics and perceive that the theology which comes victorious from the struggle embodies the old autocratic and sacrificial Judaism with some unimportant modifications. The Deity is still monarch, with bliss and bale at his arbitrary disposal. The old altar, red with the blood of bullocks and goats, is merged into the mercy seat wherefrom substitutionary intercession arises. The vicariousness of sacrifice has become the vicariousness of belief. The priest is exchanged for the dogmatist; the creed takes the place of the burnt-offering; the ceremony is connected with the articles of faith. There is no essential difference between the Jewish and the orthodox Christian theologies; nor any between the Papal and Protestant. The distinction is wholly formal, it is mainly in the apparatus. What was at Jerusalem has been transferred to Rome and to Westminster, clothed, named, and organised anew.

The fulfilment intended by Jesus was arrested and turned aside. It seems as if he had spoken and lived in vain. The "chief Judaic error" has been set up as the "chief Christian verity."

More than the conversion of Jews does orthodoxy need to seek its own deliverance from Hebraism.

The history of the dogmatic period reveals the futility of the attempt to eternalise Judaism. It is being borne in upon the philosophic mind that the records of Jewish thought do not bring with them any obligation of assent and assimilation. They come, as all historic documents do, to inform and enable us to see, by the experiments they present, what the way of right is. Orthodoxy is realising, in bitterness of thought, the tremendous mistake of endeavouring to perpetuate the autocratic theology. There is now a more tragic event upon the consciences of the Churches than the crucifixion of Jesus on Calvary, viz., the suppression of his spirit in the dogmatic re-embodiment of the conception which he repudiated.

The churches have killed their Christ in a worse way than the Jewish priests did. It was but his body that was impaled on the cross; his mind has been silenced in the creeds. With the principle of evolution in our hands we can see the vitiating elements in the dogmatic period. We can see that the law of the mind implies freedom, persistent inquiry, continual review, constant evolution. We are away from the dictations of councils, and stand with the intuitions of conscience. We have emerged from the era of speculation, and are in that of science. We are released from creeds and yoked with facts. The burden of dogma is cast off, and we carry a far more exceeding weight of glory in the consciousness of universal principles.

The old ideas have no warrant for us. The old standards do not appeal to us. Our age is humanistic. We have become aware of the implications of humanity, of the power of intelligence, and of the validity of conscience. We are convinced of the benefits of freedom, of education, of progress. The old polemics lie on the ground behind us; the old speculations moulder in the surrendered forts; the old dogmas are with the owl and the bats.

We are the children, not the slaves of our fathers. They, as their great son said, "Wanted not so much other doctrine, as more latitude; not a different uniformity, but a freer variety." The necessities of fulfilment which urge us do require other doctrine, and liberty even for revolution. The pioneers of Biblical review brought more light upon the Word; we, out of a deeper need, ask for more Word.

"Scope for conscience, an open margin for the spirit of God, a transparent way for the soul to turn about and try the paths to God," is the meaning of our cry as of theirs, but ours has in it the pressure of a fuller intelligence and the inspiration of a more luminous faith.

Since the Nonconformists spoken of lived, nature has been interpreted anew, if not altogether discovered, and the interpretation has produced theological revolution. Forty-five years ago, Martineau said "Nature has been characteristically subordinated, not to say neglected, in Christendom." Now, by the pressure of science, nature is being apprehended, and its worth for theology discovered. In the philosophy of our age "Nature is reconsecrated as the handiwork of God; and a reverent curiosity seeks for true links of thought by which to connect the divine order of the outer world with the divine inner laws of our humanity. Precisely, and only in proportion as the intellect has been released from the restraints of a fixed dogmatic system, has the interest in natural religion deepened, and the foresight of science been formed compatible with the insight of faith. Care for natural religion is the constant attendant on breadth of Christian faith."

That breadth is now being seen as the only state productive of soul rest. The wistful modern spirit utters the invocation: "One lesson, nature, let me learn of thee, One lesson which in every wind is blown, One lesson of two duties kept at one, Though the loud world proclaim their enmity.

Of toil unsevered from tranquillity!
Of labour that in lasting fruit outgrows
Far noiser schemes, accomplished in repose,
Too great for rest, too high for rivalry."

A new task rises before us. The spirit of our age calls us to it. "To connect the divine order of the outer world with the divine laws of our humanity."

Is its yoke easier and its burden lighter than those of Biblical connection? We have passed from canonised books to a universe, from texts to organisms, from words to facts. The study is changed, the ministry is different, the issues are altered.

The question pressed upon us by all the weight of science is not the inspiration of the Bible, but the inspiration of the universe. Is nature essentially mechanical or vital, material or spiritual? Have we to deal naturally with a power without a purpose, and the moral ability to bring life up to goodness? Has humanity any veracious significance in nature, or is man but a climber in a "mere fortuitous hour, Child of a thousand chances 'neath the indifferent sky?"

These cast their yoke and burden upon us. Not the Bible dissector; not the guardian of doctrine, not the warden of ritual, but the materialistic monist, the Hæcklean journalist, the atheistic determinist are the challengers that beset us. The objects of vital theological concern are not the Gospels and Epistles, but brain-matter and soul cells. Questions such as the virgin birth and the resurrection of Jesus, though they linger in the shades of dogma, are foreign to the mind intent on essentialities. To theologians of the old school we may leave them, with some myrrh for their burial.

"When half gods go, the gods arrive."
We need a spiritual discernment, a naturalistic equipment, a humanistic sympathy. The Universe is the revelation we have to read. We have to take up with heightened interest the seed, the leaf, the flower in the spirit of Jesus to see what they reveal in the newer light. We have to let the little child come to us as he did, that we may discern the divineness of the human germ. We have to observe the soul more intently with holy psychological intuition that we may know how to save it wholly.

We are encouraged by the scientist's experience. To him nature is fascinating, wonderful, revealing. He has discovered unity in it, and law and ascension. He finds man in it as the highest expression of its essential vitality, the incarnation of its spirit. It is the infinite reality presented to human consciousness, the Divine Being to be realised. He is yoked for its interpretation. The burden of its significance is upon him. He has his function in following the lines of its activity, delight in discerning the tendency of its curves, and eternal life in thinking the thoughts with which it throbs.

The theologian has to get hold of nature also, and find his special function in realising its soul. He is challenged to its interpretation, and must needs endeavour to produce a philosophy in accord with its character. Whatever implications are in nature he has to face them. The perplexed soul, driven out of all dogmatic shelters, comes to him for a quiet dwelling-place. The earnest thinker is haunted by a sense "That he has not made what he should

That he has still, though old, to recommence,
Since he has not yet found the word God would.

One day, thou sayst, there will at last appear

The word, the order which God meant should be.

Ah! We shall know that well when it comes near,

The bond will quit man's heart, he will breathe free."

For the quittance of that bond, for that free breath, the theologian has to work. He has been trained in Greek and Hebrew for the exposition of a book; it was well enough in its day. It is impossible now to revive interest in the authorship of the Pentateuch, and concern for the writers of the Gospels will soon be superseded.

Those who deal with theological literature know how soon it gets old, and how worthless is the lumber of it. Old divinity suffers a very pathetic depreciation. We travel fast spiritually. Since Colenso discussed Deuteronomy and Robertson Smith ventured his heresy regarding the pen of Moses, we have gone through an epoch. We are in another era of thought, and have to consider radium. Questions beset us that we cannot answer by concordance and lexicon. The "Encyclopædia Biblica" marks the terminus of the old Biblical superstition, and intimates a journey of a different kind—a philosophic excursus requiring a new outfit.

The presentation of a Christology will not serve; however unctuously or magically "Christ" is said it cannot avail the soul in its quest for the ultimate. "In that day ye shall ask me nothing." The theology required must be homocentric; it must find its basis in man, in the divine essence that vitalises the human spirit, and have its circumference in the holiest qualities manifested in the great souls of the race.

Theology needs philosophic ground; but even more it requires an ethical basis. It is necessary to emphasise the immanence of God, but there is a deeper necessity for emphasising his Fatherhood. The moral relation is the essential one. To know that God's spirit is in us would be terrible if we did not realise that it is there with the inspiration of love. If the cosmic process be not the Father's purpose, our part in it cannot have the joy of worship.

As we widen revelation to nature we must widen incarnation to humanity. We cannot acquiesce in an atonement which refers to any elect class only, nor in a Christhood which includes but one anointed ambassador.

We have to universalise all the terms of our theology and make them fit mankind. When revelation was identified with the Bible, and God was measured by Christ, the preacher's task was comparatively simple and small. He had but to marshal texts, present miracles, and the thing was done. But now, when revelation has a universal dimension, and God is seen to be more than Christ, the preacher's work has enlarged immeasurably. He has the cosmos upon him and is in league with Buddha, Zoroaster, and Mahomet, as well as Jesus. He cannot confine his attention to Palestine, nor narrow his sympathy to Christianity. Out of all the moulds of ancient thought, out of all creeds, out of all dogmatic limitations God has gone into the vast universe with its multiform life. Into that larger and sublimer sphere we have to go for him, hearing the while the Leading Voice saying:

"Yearn to the greatness of nature, Rally the good in the depths of thyself."

Brethren in the ministry of the Universal God; fellow-workers in the faith of the Infinite Worker, feel ye not the glory of the yoke, the grandeur of the burden? Ye are out, in the freedom of truth's sanctioning, for the pursuit of the Omnipresent; you may be sure you cannot miss Him.

You think of immensity, and are for an instant appalled; but the sense of unity comes, and you are comforted by the assurance that even the nearest and minutest corresponds with the furthest and the greatest.

You see the red tooth and claw, and your declaration of goodness becomes tremulous. The "Amen" to the ravin sticks in your throat; but as you shudder you feel that under all the gore there is sympathy and security.

You are painfully distressed regarding social iniquity, economic wrong, industrial suffering, and are tempted to say: "There is no absolute goodness else these were not." Amid the din of competition, the strife of selfish interests, the swelter of impoverished labour you feel rebellious. The billows of compassion go over you, the tempest of indignation rages in you, and you are like to sink among the waves which sympathy raises. Let the sense of the trade winds which cross the wide ocean of life from eternity come over you, and you will look up into the untroubled and impassionate heaven and realise "How fair a lot to fill is left to each man still." To the sympathetic and strenuous worker for social adjustment the ease of the yoke and the lightness of the burden come. The reins of unwillingness are more galling, and the load of selfishness is more burdensome than those of eagerness and altruism. In the thick of labour for the solution of poverty, vice and misery the bridle of justice is but a scarf, the weight of righteousness is but a feather. The fervour of the fighter makes his armour easy and the pressure of the foe light.

Science has warrant for religion that superstition had not. There is more assurance in law than in miracle. The Churches shook when it was said, "John did not write the fourth Gospel"; they are shaking now at the scepticism gathering round the resurrection. We are delivered from such terrors; till a law of nature fails we will not be alarmed; till the soul's hunger for righteousness is proved to be a false appetite we will not fear.

We are not without anxiety and responsibility. We are anxious to be unsectarian, open-minded, comprehensive; we feel the responsibility of reflecting the universe, of co-working with its forces, of assimilating its evolutionary intent. But these do not worry; to the theologian who has this vision of the general law the description applies:—

"Thou hast laboured, but with purpose hast become

Laborious, persevering, serious, firm.

For this, the track across the fretful foam
Of vehement action without scope or term
Called history, keeps a splendour due to wit

Which saw one clue to life and followed it."

Bind the soul, then, to that larger, goodlier, easier yoke with the forces of the Universe; bend and receive that greater and more solemn burden of atonement with natural laws.

The scientist marvels over the revelations of the telescope; small and great are glorious with vitality; depths and heights disclose energy and beauty. Fear not that any exploration of the spiritual realm will find it void or vile. The preacher's message should be richer, surer, more radiant than ever, with a commanding power more awful than of yore. The spirit that enlists men for truth's labour says to us: "As ye go, preach, saying the Kingdom of God is at hand." Preach it with intelligence, with wisdom, with ecstasy; perfect goodness is your Gospel, the universe your witness, God's love your yoke, His truth your burden, His immortality your rest.

Bolton District Sunday School Union.

—The annual scholars' services took place on Whit Sunday afternoon at Bolton (Bank-street) and Chowbent, and were even more largely attended than last year. At Bank-street, Bolton, there was an attendance of close upon 700. The service was conducted by Mr. Kildyard, of Leigh, and the Rev. J. Bellamy Higham gave a most admirable and interesting address to the scholars upon the value and right use of books. The service at Chowbent was conducted by Mr. H. Pilling, of Blackburn, a former secretary of the Union, and the address was given by the Rev. J. J. Wright, whose bright and practical speech kept, as it always does, even the youngest of the audience interested. The collections for the funds of the Union were up to the level of former years.

Manchester Unitarian Sunday School

Union.—The annual scholars' festival was held in the Free Trade Hall on Whit Sunday afternoon. Over a thousand scholars, representing fifteen schools, occupied the body of the hall, and the gallery was well filled with parents and friends, though the cold, dull day affected the attendance. The Rev. A. Cobden Smith (Lower Mosley-street) conducted the service and gave an appropriate and interesting address on "Faith." Mr. Oliver H. Heys conducted the choir and Mr. Arthur G. Baker, M.R.C.M., officiated at the organ. The platform was prettily decorated with plants (kindly lent by Mrs. Wallwork) and cut flowers sent by Miss Phillips and Miss Gaskell. The anthems "Lord of all power and might" and "The Lord is my strength" were rendered by the choir, and the children sang the Whit-week hymns selected from the Manchester District Sunday School Association's new number of hymns and choral song.

SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE seventy-third annual meeting of the Association was held at Essex Hall on Tuesday afternoon, preceded by the morning conference of delegates and luncheon at the Holborn Restaurant. There was a capital attendance, and it was a happy beginning of the week's meetings.

THE PRESIDENT, Dr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., took the chair, and in opening the proceedings expressed their great regret that Dr. Herbert Smith, their treasurer, could not be with them, though they were happy to know that he was recovering from his serious illness.

MR. ION PRITCHARD, the hon. secretary, presented the report, and in doing so mentioned the receipt of letters of regret for absence from Dr. Drummond, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, Mr. Hall Brooks, president of the Manchester District Association, and other friends. He called attention to several points in the report, and with special pleasure noted in the returns from the schools the increase of the number of scholars over sixteen. Whereas ten years ago there were 8,098, now the total was 9,876.

The report, pointing out the increasing importance of Sunday-school work, in view of the position of religious education in the country, noted the admirable work done by the Sunday School Union by the appointment of Mr. G. H. Archibald, an experienced and eloquent teacher, who had lectured in various parts of London and elsewhere on "How to Teach." The lectures had been of great help to teachers, and were to be continued. The testimony of the Rev. R. J. Campbell to the value of the Association's text books: "the only really critical and up-to-date manuals of the kind," was also noted, and the year's publications recorded: Young Days, Monthly Notes, the Rev. A. Hall's "Moral Teaching of James Martineau," and Miss F. E. Cooke's "The Children's Hour" (a collection, chiefly of INQUIRER children's columns). New editions of Miss Cooke's "Dorothea Dix" and of the Sunday School Hymn Book were announced, and three new books, Pastor Giran's "Jesus of Nazareth," translated by the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, "The Practical Teaching of Jesus of Nazareth," by the Rev. A. W. Fox, and a history of the "Early Christian Church," by the Rev. A. H. Thomas, a companion to Mr. Addis's well-known manual. The work of the Oxford summer session for teachers was duly chronicled, and other conferences in which the Association had taken part, and the President's helpful New Year's letter to teachers was included.

THE PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, dwelt upon the great and increasing importance of the work. The fact that the State had now relieved them of the duty of giving secular education to the children made it the more incumbent on them to teach the elements of religion. And to that end they must teach the teachers. Nor must they neglect the children of their own congregations. They must urge that duty upon the parents and press upon their attention the books published by that Association. There was movement on every side, and men were struggling after new truth. They must not let others outstrip them, but welcome them as comrades upon that forward, upward way.

The Rev. A. W. Fox seconded, and spoke of the report as a record of the best work done by the Association since he had known it. In their teaching the real difficulty was not books, but the use of the books. He warmly commended the teachers' library mentioned in the report, and said how much they had valued the President's new year's letter.

The resolution was unanimously passed, and the officers and committee were then appointed, on the motion of the Rev. J. E. STRONGE, seconded by the Rev. A. H. DOLPHIN. The new president is Miss Edith Gittins, of Leicester. Mr. W. Blake Odgers, jun., takes the treasurership, which his father held for twenty-five years.

Mr. Stronge, in moving the resolution, which included thanks to the retiring officers and committee, referred to the formation of the Stourbridge and District Union, formed by five schools which were close together, and felt that they wanted to be brought nearer to one another, and into direct and vital connection with that Association. He also said that for himself he was more and more of a denominationalist, and felt that in the teaching of their schools they ought to lay more stress on the theological foundations of their common Unitarianism.

The resolution of welcome to the representatives of Sunday School Societies and schools, moved from the chair, was responded to by the Rev. J. J. Wright, on behalf of England, the Rev. W. H. Drummond on behalf of Ireland, and the Rev. A. Webster on behalf of Scotland.

MR. DRUMMOND, speaking of Ireland, told of the work of their Orphan Societies, which had a local treasurer in every congregation, and had been of the greatest service in the support of orphans belonging to the congregations. They had at present about thirty cases on their books. It was an example which might well be followed in England.

The Rev. H. HAUGERUD, of Christiania, also responded, and spoke of the pleasure it was to him to be there, and what an inspiration it was for a lonely worker to be in such a gathering.

THE CONFERENCE.

After tea the Conference followed, at which the Rev. H. D. Roberts read a paper on "The Right Use of Power and Knowledge in the Sunday-school Class."

Knowledge and Power.

Any teaching, he said, is the endeavour to bring knowledge and power into vital relation. Knowledge without power is ineffective. Power without knowledge is terrible. The Sunday-school teacher is not primarily concerned with acquiring and communicating any particular branch of knowledge, not even so-called "religious knowledge," but with the cultivation of the religious sense, or of the ideal. In orthodox circles it was insisted that this could only be done in connection with a dogmatic assertion of their own views of ultimate truth, as, e.g., through the Church catechism. But after such instruction they knew that the process of unlearning had dire results. In the endeavour to awaken the ideal slumbering within, there had, of course, to be some assertions, for vagueness did not appeal to the child's mind. To it all things were definitely divided into "true" and "untrue," "good" and "bad," "black" and "white," and they must beware of confusing those issues; they must not try to feed children with food which only grown men could assimilate.

In their desire to cultivate and foster the religious sense they were forced to some statement of what they believed to be religious truth. They should, for instance, as the basis of their endeavour, make to the children the tremendous assertion of God, the eternal validity of righteousness, the everlasting distinction of right and wrong. And just there the teacher needed knowledge, and to beware of a zeal not according to knowledge. On the assertion of God hinged the great and crucial controversy of the time. The teacher ought to be aware of that, not, of course, with the view of suggesting to children arguments for or against, but in order to be fortified with some of the best thought of the time to help him in his expositions. There was danger of belittling that august subject in the attempt to be intelligible to the child. The very first step to the ideal was a sense of reverence. Knowledge, unproductive of reverential awe could have little moral effect. They must give the children some glimpse of the profound wonder of the universe, of life, of the vastness of the Divine mystery behind it all and permeating it all. Make them realise that our tiny measure can by no means hold the immensity of truth. Reverent humility would never have to be unlearned. That alone was compatible with the highest conception of God.

To waken wonder and reverence for life in the child's mind was an important part of the teacher's responsibility. For that he must have knowledge, not that of the technical scientist, but that which lifted a man above the plodding attitude into a definite realisation of the splendour and mystery amid which the strange adventure of life was passed, the adventure, as they dimly felt, not bounded by the daily nightfall or that seeming darker nightfall they called death, but rather bound up with the great unifying Spirit, which permeated the universe, and spoke, when they had ears to hear, in their own souls. The greater their own reverence the greater would be their power to kindle it in their scholars' hearts.

Their great need was the power of realising common knowledge and using it. Common things were quite as wonderful as uncommon. The "birth of a rose," Browning said, was quite as marvellous as the rush of a comet. Plato imagined the breathless amazement of one who should see for the first time the marvel of the dawn. Emerson pictured the reverential wonder of men at the revelation of the city of God if the stars came out once in a thousand years. The ordered and recurrent harmonies of the universe were more marvellous than a cataclysm. If they could not see the marvel of the common, their imagination was dormant, and perhaps no sign would be given them to awaken it. It was the old story. "If they hear not Moses and the prophets neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead."

As to the practical question of how to make a class share in the teacher's feeling of reverence, one thing was certain. They would never make another feel what they did not feel themselves. If they did feel strongly, the chances were they would communicate something of that feeling to others. That power lay that way was psychological truth. One person might describe or comment on some tender or tragic event, say, the martyrdom of our master Jesus. He might use exalted and ornate language, and push home the pathos of it all in realistic and harrowing terms, and yet leave you cold and untouched. And then another, using perhaps the simplest words, might tell of the same thing, and you do not notice what sort of language he is using, but with a sob in your heart and an unbidden tear in your eye, the tremendous and transcendent pathos of it all overwhelms you like a flood. You cannot help but feel it because the speaker feels it. That was the secret of power—to get into the heart of another something out of your own heart, strange and subtle influence of deep upon deep. How true the insight of the old seer who said: "Out of the heart are the issues of life."

To make the children feel, they must get back to the child's plane, see with his eyes, hear with his ears, as well as their own. And so, in conclusion, Mr. Roberts said of the true teacher: He feels with the child as a child—feels the wistful, intermittent, childish hunger, inexpressible and unexpressed. He knows as a man that the growing soul needs real food; not the mere husks of the past, but the living thought of our present day made into that which babes can assimilate, and not turn from in disgust in later days. And so, tenderly and gradually, he hushes the young soul into listening for "that apocalyptic voice, above us, below us, around," which is telling you and me and the child alike, amid the myriad voices of the world, "The Master is come and calleth for thee." All things have become possible, and joyfully possible, when once the answer has flashed forth from the awakened heart, "Here am I, Lord, send me!"

Knowledge and power! That knowledge which is not merely a list of attainments or a category of information, but which is a profound and constraining sense of reverence for life, the divine mystery within life, the awful meaning of lie; an habitual awareness of all those things which make life great—the sweet, the strong, the manly, the womanly things of life; a never-failing tenderness for the pathos, however ordinary and common-place, which underlies all life; a kindly alertness for the humour which glances through and plays over life; and an invincible and robust hope in the outcome of consummation, in the divine purposes of life. Some one has said—I think a suggestion from a Greek writer, but I forget the exact quotation: "What a vast field of idealistic impulse we leave unexploited in the young!" How true that is. We play about the shifting surface and never get down to the depths at all! An impressionable year or two, and the boy has become a man, and his idea of life is partly—perhaps greatly—what we helped to make it. Once more I remember, in "Peter Pan," how he is left for a few moments with the tide rising around him, and there is a momentary solemnity. The boy, who would not grow up, looks out of wide eyes touched with that fathomless seriousness we do at times surprise in a child's eyes, and which makes Wordsworth's words true to us suddenly—

"Trailing clouds of glory do they come From heaven which is their home."

He gazes over the advancing tide, and exclaims, "It will be a very big adventure—to die!"

Yes, that is true; true for all of us, and it does happen that the child on the threshold realises it at times more keenly than we to whom that "big adventure" is nearer. But, meanwhile, we want strong wise voices to sound in our children's ears, telling them not only of the wonderland of death, but the equally strange, solemn, fascinating wonderland of life. "It is a very big adventure—to live!" Above all, and at all costs, let us press that home. And then, like that other human child, who, in the lilies and the stars and the sorrowing prodigal, and the seed-sowing and growing, and all the common every-day things, came to see, as no man has ever seen, the wonder of God and of man, and brought them together into the wonder of union; our children may grow and wax strong in spirit, and be filled with the wisdom of living; and the grace of God will be upon them.

Miss E. DAVY, of Leicester, by way of opening the discussion, gave an address of the greatest practical value. Speaking as a practical teacher, she said that knowledge was indeed power, but knowledge implied assimilation; it must become a part of ourselves and so of our force. Power could only arise from assimilation of knowledge. Sir John Cockburn had recently startled many people by asserting that muscle was more important than brain. Physiologists and psychologists alike would agree with him that it was largely through muscle that the brain received impressions, and only through muscle was able to express itself. But teachers in the past had too largely confined their methods of teaching to the use of one set of muscles—those of the voice, and children had only exercised that sense which required no use of muscle, that of hearing, providing no opportunity for the child to reproduce the impression received. Yet all knowledge, and certainly that which the Sunday-school teacher tried to produce in the child as religion, must bear fruit in action, or it could not be assimilated and become part of the child's being. Their very morality could not live except by expression through muscle. Good thoughts were useless, and tended to fade away and die if not acted upon. The child should no longer be expected to be a sleeping partner in Sunday-school work; he must be made an active agent. The teacher of a class of lively boys might think that remark quite unnecessary; but the child must be active in the direction of Sunday-school work, guided by the teacher, restrained perhaps, but not stopped. The actual modes of self-expression would vary with age. With the tiny child it might be bodily action in the little hymn, acting the simple story, playing a kindergarten game. Modelling in clay, folding and cutting objects from paper, and drawing with coloured crayons, all might be used with children up to eight or nine, and the same principle should go all through the school. Every lesson should be followed by reproduction, sometimes spoken, sometimes written or drawn. Let the children tell what they remember, what they think, let them ask questions, and make suggestions for applying the ethical lesson. Children should also take more part in the services, audibly repeating the prayers, though not in set forms frequently repeated, and should be encouraged to choose hymns suited to the lessons of the day. They should also take part in the "orderly" work of the school. In the senior classes the self-expression would take the form of discussion of papers prepared at home, which might sometimes be sketches of lessons for the little ones; but this would only be possible where the training had begun in the lower classes. Their best work was in taking the children quite young, and preventing them from becoming unruly. They must make the school attractive, not by bribes of prizes and treats, but by providing teaching which satisfied the child's nature, teaching which compelled involuntary attention by appeal to eye as well as ear, and engaged the child's all-round activity. The essential of earnest Christian character in the teacher and its influence on the children by love and sympathy she had taken for granted as the sine qua non. What they had to realise was that the resultant blessings might be immeasurably increased by the use of good methods.

Mr. JOSEPH SHIPPEN, as a visitor from the Pacific Coast, and a lifelong Sunday-school worker, expressed his great pleasure in being present, and said the importance of the subject could not be overstated. The hopes of the future lay in the youth of the present. In the home and in the churches they felt the urgency of that duty of preparing young lives for the coming of the kingdom of God; in pressing upon them the true, the beautiful, and the good. They must not be discouraged in that work, even when there seemed little response. The memory of a chance word or a hymn learnt in school often came back in after years, and they heard of the great things effected by the school influence in the lives of men.

Miss MARIAN PRITCHARD said the work of their schools was the cultivation of the ideal, to draw forth reverent love and wonder of this beautiful life. It must be in the heart of the teacher first. If the root was sound the fruit would be good. Much depended also on the right use of discipline. The children should be made to understand that punishment was given like medicine for a sick body; then there was no sense of injustice, and it did its proper work. To build up character was the great thing. They had to use tools, the best they could get, but must always remember they were only tools.

Dr. FOATE expressed his great admiration of Miss Davy's paper, and Mr. ROBERTS made a brief response on the discussion.

The Rev. JOHN ELLIS moved, and the Rev. A. E. PARRY seconded a vote of thanks to the President, to Mr. Roberts, and to all who had contributed to the usefulness and success of the meeting.

Dr. ODGERS, in acknowledging the vote, referred to his twenty-five years' service as treasurer, and afterwards as president. The Association, he was convinced, was doing thorough good work, and there was sterling common-sense in its management. His son was taking up the treasurer'ship, and he now went off the list of their officers, but his interest in the work would never cease, and he would also be glad to help when he could.

EVEN now the free heart of the happy and triumphant shall be ours, in proportion as we are true to the condition of faithful service, which alone can make us one with them. The communion of saints brings to us their conflict first, their blessings afterwards; those who will not with much patience strive with the evil, can have no dear fellowship with the good; we must weep their tears, ere we can win their peace. This sorrowful condition once accepted, the sympathies of heaven are not slow to arise within the soul: it is the tension of sacred toil, that on the touch of every breath of life brings music from the chords of love.—James Martineau.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE eighty-second annual meeting of the Association was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday afternoon, the President, Mr. GROSVENOR TALBOT, in the chair.

Mr. OSWALD NETTLEFOLD, the treasurer, was unable to be present, owing to the death of his mother, and the accounts, together with the report, which had been previously printed and circulated, were presented by the secretary, the Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, called attention to a number of points of special interest, and said that the Association had never done more strenuous or better work or over a wider field, and they had earnestly to call for more support that they might still receive the one annual subscription of £1,000, and maintain the work at its present high level.

The report should be read as a whole. It gave a systematic account of a large amount of work arranged under the heads of Home Mission, Publications, McQuaker Trust (for Scotland), Colonial and Foreign, Meetings and Deputations. The section on Home Mission work had the following passage on the Unitarian Van Mission :—

"How to reach the people with the message of a reasonable, reverent, uplifting religious faith is a question often discussed by Unitarians. The services held in public halls and in theatres, organised by the Association, were frequently successful in attracting large numbers in the great centres of population; but they proved very expensive, and they left untouched the people in the villages and country towns. The experiment made in the summer of 1906 by the Unitarian Van, provided by the generosity of Mrs. Bayle Bernard, of London, and worked with such enthusiasm by the Rev. T. P. Spedding and his fellow-ministers in Lancashire and Yorkshire, made a deep impression upon the Committee. The members of the Council at their meeting in October, were also convinced of the importance of the Van Mission. After careful consideration, and feeling assured that the Unitarians of England would provide the necessary funds, the Committee undertook the organisation and financial responsibility of the Van Mission movement, and invited the Rev. T. P. Spedding to become the Missionary Agent of the Association. Mr. Spedding accepted the appointment, and his engagement began March, 1907. The Van, along with the balance of £327, held by the Missionary Conference, was transferred to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, February, 1907. Three new Vans, contributed by private donors have now been built, making four in all. During the summer and early autumn months of this year one of these vans will be in use in a district within easy reach of London, another in the south-west of Scotland, while two others will be employed in the Midlands, Lancashire, and Yorkshire. It has been no light task, especially in view of the large number of ministers who will be away in America in August and September, to secure a sufficient number of men of apostolic zeal, prepared to go into the highways and byways to preach the gospel of the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man. It is gratifying to report that Mr. Spedding has had a gratifying response to his appeal for workers."

On Finance there was the following passage:—

"The income for the year 1906, including a balance of £46 from the previous year, amounted to £8,319. It was made up as follows:—Subscriptions, £4,478; collections, £574; investments, £1,275; book-room, £1,772; miscellaneous, £76; transferred from investment account, £98. The expenditure for the year 1906 was £8,309. It was made up as follows:—Home Missionary work, including grants of books and tracts, £4,156; foreign missionary work, £1,038; expenses of book department, £1,949; salaries and wages of office and book-room staff, £827; anniversary meetings and deputations, £117; maintenance of hall and rooms, and postages, stationery, &c., £222. A balance of £10 was carried over to 1907, being £36 less than the balance of the previous year. It will be seen that it was necessary also to transfer £98 from the investment account. The ordinary expenditure of the year exceeded the income by £134. The losses by death, and of subscriptions which had been promised only for a specified time, amounted in 1906 to £282. Already during the present year additional losses by death of subscriptions amounting to £370, and subscriptions promised for a specified time of £265, have been sustained. The total losses thus reach the large sum of £917. Towards meeting these losses new and increased subscriptions of £300 have been paid or promised within the last few months, including £100 from Mr. T. Alfred Colfox, £100 from Miss Colfox, and £50 from Mr. Charles W. Jones. It is still necessary to raise upwards of £600 in new or increased subscriptions, in the present year (1907), if the anonymous subscription of £1,000 is to be retained."

The record of losses by death included the names of Mr. William Colfox, of Bridport, for many years the largest annual subscriber, always deeply interested in the work of the Association; Mr. Edwin Clephan, of Leeds, and the Rev. F. W. Stanley, two members of the Committee. Mr. H. Blessley, Mr. Doughty Browne and Mrs. George Buckton, members of the Council, and a large number of other supporters of the Association.

The Report concluded with the following appeal:—

"Our Unitarian forefathers were the friends, not infrequently the leaders, of educational and social movements which aimed at the betterment of the world; their Unitarian faith was an incentive to a noble and useful life. May we, with our larger opportunities of freedom, live up to their level, and serve our generation as faithfully as they served theirs!"

The Rev. RUDOLF DAVIS, who seconded the adoption of the report, said that it was in its arrangement a model of what such a report should be, crammed full of information, where often a few lines represented a great amount of patient labour. The past hundred years had seen great changes. Their present faith differed as much from the Unitarianism of their grandfathers as that did from the theology of the Council of Nicaea. And they must not suppose, because they had liberal preaching in a few other churches, as in London and Bradford, that it was so throughout the country. That was far from being the case, and their work as Unitarians was only just begun. No church could live on the search for truth, or on freedom alone; that was the atmosphere they breathed, but the truth they had attained, their theology, which was the expression of their religion, was the food by which they must live. He urged that the Association might do a very helpful thing by sending down more men to visit congregations as special preachers; if possible, it would be good to set apart three or four men for that special work. In London and Manchester ministers might easily get exchanges, but in country districts it was very difficult, and such help would be a great gain.

The report and accounts were unanimously adopted.

On the motion of Mr. JOHN HARRISON, seconded by the Rev A. W. Fox, Mr. Talbot was warmly thanked for his services as President, and Mr. W. B. Bowring, of Liverpool, was elected President for the coming year.

The officers and committee were then elected, on the motion of the PRESIDENT, seconded by the Rev. J. A. PEARSON, of Oldham. Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke takes Mr. Oswald Nettlefold's place as treasurer, and new members of the committee are Miss Clephan, the Rev. C. J. Street, and Mr. Harold Wade.

Mr. PEARSON, in seconding, congratulated the Association on its courage in taking over the van mission, and carried still further Mr. Davis's plea for the visiting of congregations, suggesting eight days' visits by vigorous ministers, where there was need for fresh stimulus in the work.

The PRESIDENT then moved:—

"That the Association extends its sympathy and goodwill to the men and women who in all lands are striving to unite pure religion and perfect liberty; and sends hearty greetings to the forthcoming meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at Boston, U.S.A., in September next."

The following were among the foreign and Colonial representatives present at the meetings (22 in all) to whom a hearty greeting was accorded:—

American Unitarian Association, Rev. Richard W. Boynton (St. Paul's, Minn.), Dr. M. J. Savage (New York); Mr. Joseph Shippen (Seattle); Protestantbond of Holland, Prof. B. D. Eerdmanns (Leiden); "Christliche Welt," Germany, Pastor Lic H. Hackmann; Unitarians of Iceland, Mr. M. Jochumsson (Aukureyri); Unitarians of Norway, Rev. H. Haugerud (Christiania); Unitarians of New Zealand, Miss Mary E. Richmond, Mr. W. F. Kennedy; Brahma Samaj, India, Prof. P. N. Chatterji, M.A.; Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, Japan, Mr. Z. Horikiri.

Letters were received from Bishop Joseph Ferencz, of the Unitarian Churches of Hungary; Baron F. de Schickler, Union Nationale des Eglises Réformées Unies; and a number of others, mentioned in a separate column.

The Rev. CHARLES TRAVERS who seconded this resolution, spoke of the way in which religion in the past had separated peoples, but the new spirit of religious sympathy was drawing them together, so that every solitary liberal thinker might now feel the strength of that union in which all were working for the coming of the Kingdom.

The Rev. H. HAUGERUD made an eloquent response, telling how the message of Unitarianism came as a veritable gospel of new life to those who had drifted away from religion, after losing faith in the old orthodoxy, and then quoting Dr. Martineau's well-known declaration, in his letter to the first Liverpool Conference, on the need for missionary zeal and evangelising work in every Christian Church.

Mr. H. CHATFIELD CLARKE moved a resolution of grateful thanks to Mr. Oswald Nettlefold for his services as Treasurer for the past nine years, a resolution passed by acclamation.

The resolution of greeting to representatives of district societies moved from the CHAIR and seconded by Dr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., was responded to by the Revs. DENDY AGATE, W. H. DRUMMOND, and Mr. L. N. WILLIAMS.

The PRESIDENT then moved:

"That this meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, representing many varieties of social and political interests, but united in the deep desire that truth, righteousness, and peace should prevail throughout the world, earnestly trusts that the representatives of the several Governments constituting the Hague Conference will be untiring in their efforts to establish such a spirit of intelligent goodwill and friendly relationships as may render unnecessary the ever increasing growth of the armaments that press so heavily on the mass of the people throughout the world, and begs to assure our English representatives at the Hague of cordial sympathy and support in all wisely directed measures to this end."

That a copy of this resolution, signed by the PRESIDENT, be sent to the Foreign Office and to the Secretary of the Conference at the Hague."

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT who seconded, said that resolution made for the cause of humanity, not to say Christianity. It asked nothing impracticable, but the cultivation of intelligent goodwill, to make it clear that the nations of the earth had common interests, of which the highest was peace. It was high time that this was brought home to the so-called representatives of the people, the publicists and diplomatists, who too often seemed to be seeking ends of their own, and neglecting the real interests of their peoples.

The resolution was unanimously passed.

Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON moved, in the absence of the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, and the Rev. CHARLES TRAVERS seconded:—

"That the members of this association in annual meeting assembled, declare their belief that in any future legislation the only satisfactory solution of the education difficulty is to be found in recognising that for distinctly religious education, the parents and the churches are alone responsible, and that the State cannot on principle undertake the duty."

There was no time for discussion, and the meeting had greatly thinned, but the resolution was passed by a considerable majority of those who voted.

A cordial vote of thanks to the Rev. A. Webster for his sermon, to the Little Portland-street committee, and to London friends for their hospitality, moved by the PRESIDENT and seconded by the Rev. H. B. SMITH, brought the meeting to a close.

GREETINGS FROM ABROAD.

Among the greetings received by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was a letter from Bishop Joseph Ferencz, of the Unitarian churches of Hungary; a telegram from Herr Schrader, President of the German Protestantenverein, which was also meeting this week at Wiesbaden; the Rev. A. Altherr, President of the Swiss Verein für Freies Christenthum; the Rev. E. Rochat, of Geneva, on behalf of the Union Libérale of that city; Dr. Gerold, of the Liberal Verein von Elsass-Lothringen, who mentioned that the Evangelical-Social Congress was meeting this week in Strassburg; the Rev. E. Giran, of the Walloon Church at Amsterdam; the Rev. G. Fayot, of Nîmes.

Baron F. de Schickler, of the National Union of the United Reformed Churches of France, wrote:—

We have received your cordial invitation to the Whit-week meetings with gratitude, and regret extremely that we are not able to send a delegate this year. We are still deeply absorbed in the transformation that is taking place in the position of our Churches through their legal separation from the State.

At an assembly of representatives of our Liberal Churches, held at Mazanet from April 9 to 12, we completed the organisation of our presbyterian synod by the adoption of rules for the National Synod for the internal government of our churches. Our churches will now belong to district societies, each of which will send its delegates to the National Synod, and those churches who affiliate themselves will be known as the "United Churches."

Instead of the "Délégation Libérale," which has resigned its powers, and in order to conform to the law that now regulates religious associations in France, we have elected a "Directing Committee," composed of nearly all the old members of the "Délégation Libérale," and also a few others, and of which the officers are as follows:—President, Baron F. de Schickler; vice-president, Professor Jean Réville; secretary, M. Jalabert, sen.; agent-general, Pastor Reyss. It is certain that our difficulties are great, and that, deprived of the subsidies given by the State, our churches, which do not possess the considerable resources of the orthodox churches, and comprise the Cevennes and Poitou districts, which are very poor, will have great difficulty in providing the means of daily existence. But with the help of God, and sustained by the affection of our friends at home and abroad, we are full of courage, and hope that "our labour in the Lord will not be in vain."

We know that the sympathies of our Unitarian friends will not be wanting, and we are sincerely touched by it. Will you please thank the president, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, for his invitation, of which, unfortunately, we cannot avail ourselves; and express our good wishes for the advancement of your Christian work and the success of your efforts.

Greetings from Iceland.

MR. MATTHIAS JOCHUMSSON, of Akureyri, though at the President's luncheon, where he spoke, was unable to be at the Annual Meeting. The following is his written greeting:—

Dear and Worthy Friends,—With deep-felt gratitude I beg leave to address this assembly of English Unitarians and other friends of liberal and progressive Christianity. I praise God that I am allowed to be present in this hall, to tender to you my hearty thanks for your brotherly aid and encouragement in many ways during the last 33 years in my endeavour to prepare the soil in my distant country for a more enlightened Christianity. Allow me to explain to you in a few words my humble work and efforts to promote this end since the first beginning of our mutual acquaintance, so that you may understand the present state of liberal Christianity in Iceland.

We Icelanders are, as you know, the fourth branch of the Scandinavian group, and the only one which has preserved the ancient common tongue, so little altered that our people can still read our famous literature from the eleventh and twelfth centuries as easily as you read your "Canterbury Tales." In the thirteenth century our old republican commonwealth came under the rule of the Kings of Norway, and a century later under the Kings of Denmark, a dependency that still exists.

At the 1,000th anniversary of the colonisation of Iceland in 1874, our late good King Christian came in person to see us, and, at the same time, to give us Home Rule. At that time we were considered to be a century behind our neighbours, but, as statistics will show, we have since materially developed in a way that many people consider remarkable.

To go back to my first visit to England, in 1873. A fellow countryman, living at Cambridge, got from Dr. Martineau an introduction to the Rev. Robert Spears, who asked me to his house, where I arrived on a dreary December night, a lonely widowed man without friends, but with your Newman's Lead, kindly Light in my heart, and a good acquaintance with Dr. Channing's writings. I need scarcely say that Mr. Spears proved a true brother and friend to me. He helped me to start a weekly paper at Reykjavik, which is still one of our foremost liberal journals. Afterwards, your Committee aided me liberally for three years to rent a hall where I preached and gave addresses, frequently to an audience of several hundred people. Nevertheless, I failed to establish a self-supporting congregation, and the grant was afterwards withdrawn. I continued my work somewhat on the same lines till the year 1880, when my increasing family made it necessary for me to accept a pastorate in Oddi, offered me by our Government, and with the consent of our Liberal bishop, who well knew my Unitarian views. May be the time had not fully come, for, although in 1873 I really believed that the Kingdom of Heaven was at hand, I soon discovered that several other kingdoms were to come first. After King Christian and his gracious Home Rule came the kingdom of material and social strife, prejudice, indifference, and what not.

But, whatever my own shortcomings may have been, my aims and endeavours were always on the same lines, I have striven to give my people the fruit of my ministry; and to prepare the soil for better men to follow.

You may not have heard that in my own country I am chiefly known as a poet and man of letters. Our Government gave me in 1900 the choice of continuing as a preacher and minister of religion with a pension, or of devoting myself to literary work, for which latter a public grant of 2,000 crowns was offered me. This offer I accepted, desiring to be free from dogmatic restriction or restraint. Ever since that date, I have continued, when occasion offered, to write articles for our papers and periodicals, as well as to give addresses intended to lead the way towards higher morality and purer religion.

In spite of the reaction that set in after the death of our Bishop Petersen, I believe that the majority of my people are interested in liberal views of religion, and the Icelandic press takes my side.

On the whole, my conclusion is this, that the general tendency of thought and feeling in Iceland at present is towards a higher moral standard and a truer and more liberal Christianity.

No doubt much indifference still exists, as is always the case in a creed-bound church, but the number of those who are awakening to progress is rapidly increasing. Even the orthodox missionaries may do us some good. They are very numerous in Iceland. In my own town of Akureyri, in the far north, we have a Salvation Army station, another belonging to the Plymouth Brethren, and several preachers of the Norwegian and Danish Domestic Missions. They are all finding it rather hard work to influence a rationalistic people who read the Bible as they would any other ancient literature. But if their theology does not suit our people, they may awaken desires for better things.

I should myself like once more to attempt to establish a Unitarian or liberal Christian Mission in Iceland, and this time not in Reykjavik, but in Akureyri. Should my life and health be spared, I desire to begin regular religious services next winter, but to do so, I should need the help of an Icelandic Unitarian preacher to help me. I might take him into my own house, and then rent a hall for preaching. I have spoken to the Secretary of your Association about my plans, and he will place my suggestions before the Committee.

I would once more tender to you my heartfelt thanks, and I pray Almighty God to bless and prosper your great work, which, in the interests of religion and freedom, is concerned not only with Great Britain, but with all lands and peoples.

May 21, 1907. M. JOCHUMSSON.

"THE Third Day: A Sermon for Easter-Tide," is the title of the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermon in this month's Mill Hill Pulpit.

THE ASSOCIATION CONFERENCE

THE NEW SITUATION.*

BY THE REV. W. G. TARRANT, B.A.

MR. CAMPBELL'S book, The New Theology, opens with a chapter on "The Name and the Situation." As to "the Name" we need say little or nothing—we have more than enough to do with names ourselves. The material subject of the chapter was "the Situation;" it was this that prompted the book. The questions for us are, how far its publication has created a new situation; how far the new situation, if any, affects us; and how far we may dutifully and with reasonable hope aim to affect it.

About the importance of the book, doubtless, there has been some exaggeration. The newspapers made temporarily what they call a "sensation" out of it. The comparative quiet that has followed comes like an anti-climax, and lends colour to the verdict of those who say there is little significance in the whole subject. Such a verdict, however, is not likely to be given by any who are adequately acquainted with the number and influence of those who, in greater or less degree, share the new views. A shrewd observer may rather detect in this sudden calm a symptom of peculiar importance, in consideration of the profound differences between the new views and the old. If we are able to avoid erroneous extremes we shall conclude after candid inquiry, I believe, that while the new theology may not be all that its missionaries fondly hope, nevertheless it implies much, and its reception implies more. At least that is the conclusion this paper is intended to support.

At the outset, let us consider the situation as it appeared to Mr. Campbell before he wrote his book. It was surely a most serious one. From his watch-tower at the City Temple he observed—what, indeed, only a very blind person could fail to see—a far spreading alienation from public worship, a profound indifference to religious observance and appeal. He also observed and reported a characteristic of modern life upon which his personal testimony, as a man with special opportunity for judging, demands the gravest attention. Not only are there these multitudes who are apparently without any religion, but among religious people themselves, he being witness, there exists an uncertainty, an inconsistency, fatal to enterprise. There is, in short, to use his own words, a "divorce between the six-days mind and the Sunday mind." The fault is not so much with a worldly laity, as with a defective ministry. "Pulpit and theological college Christianity," he says, fails to interpret life as it really is. Hence, in his opinion, the "dogmas, institutions, and ordinances," which embody that kind of Christianity are doing nothing to "save the world."

And yet, if we may say so, the world seems to be well worth saving. Mr. Campbell points to the amazing activity of men to-day in various directions, and especially in matters pertaining to science of all kinds, including Biblical research.

Still more deeply impressive to his mind is the spectacle of the vast social struggle which is going on in this country, and in all civilised countries. If in this ferment of our times Christianity is not to be left hopelessly behind, it must adjust itself, he maintains, to the fresh world-life about us. It must no longer be "an insurance policy for the life to come." What is needed is "a re-statement of Christianity in terms of the modern mind." We must dig down through the crumbling forms of doctrines no longer tenable to the "moral values" which he believes to abide beneath them. Theology must be thought out afresh in the presence of the transfiguring idea of universal evolution; the besetting materialism of the age must be overcome by an idealism that sees deity in all things and all things in deity.

With such impressions and aspirations Mr. Campbell's New Theology was brought out. To systematic completeness the work has, it must be confessed, but little claim. Probably the author would be first to admit that his own presentation is partial and defective, and that the full implications of his school of thought must be gathered from the study of many books rather than of one. He has many contemporaries who have published and are still publishing works tending in the same direction, and he has had many predecessors—as need not be said to those who remember the "New Orthodoxy" discussion of years ago, and the "Down-grade" agitations of a still earlier date. The term that serves for the title of his book was similarly used at least sixteen years ago—which is a sufficiently respectable period, now that things move so fast! But everyone will admit that Mr. Campbell has imparted a fresh aspect to this familiar story. The word "theology" he declares to be almost a misnomer for what is really a "moral and spiritual movement." What he seeks to cover by the term "New Theology" is "the religious articulation of the social movement," or, as he says again, it is "the religion of science." Similarly, one of his ablest allies, a Scottish divine, says—with a glance over the restless world of Christendom,—the "theology" is but a "part of a larger thing." Be it so, let "mere theology" have nothing more than its rights; but let it have them. It has occurred to some, in view of the indefinite, not to say chaotic character, of much that appears in Mr. Campbell's pages, that a little more of the old spirit of patient toil characteristic of the great theologians would have added to the permanent value of his work. We may warn ourselves that it is not usually those who are really versed in a science, even though it be merely the science of man's deepest thought, who most readily treat that science with contempt. But however we may feel as to that, surely none of us would ignore the deep earnestness and full-pulsing energy of many of these men; and none of us would willingly lose in narrow-minded criticisms, or sectarian bickerings, our sympathy with their feeling that a great age is dawning upon the world, an age in which it behoves every intelligent mind, every true heart to be doing its utmost. It is entirely consistent with this sympathy, it is just because we also are very much in earnest and aim at the highest and truest that we ask how far Mr. Campbell's valiant attempt really relieves the situation he deplored. Has it any actual and abiding contribution for us? I think it has—but it may not be in the way he specially desired.

We all know that Mr. Campbell has accepted Emerson's advice and tried to "hitch his wagon to a star." The luminous thought that has led him on, and perhaps a little dazzled him, is the thought of the Divine Immanence—not as that great thought was presented long ago by our own teachers, but involved in the Hegelian type of modern philosophy. Now whether that bright particular star will serve as a trusty steed, or whether it may not already have played strange tricks with the wagoner, are points that each may consider for himself. One thing is evident to all—the wagon is quite off the old lines and must inevitably come into collision with such wagons as remain on. To do him but justice, Mr. Campbell does not shirk the collision; he means his theology to be new, and our old friend "the man in the street," though but a poor judge of rival philosophies, can have little difficulty in discerning that if the "New Theology" is anything it certainly implies a new method of dealing with matters of religion. People have been so long accustomed to being told that they "must thus think" about one point or another that it really takes some energy to ask "upon what compulsion must I?" None at all, says Mr. Campbell in effect; the old authorities are dethroned, the "Seat of Authority" cannot be tenanted any longer for the modern mind by Church or Scripture. Reason and conscience sit there—that "spirit of man which is the candle of the Lord." Of course this announcement is no news to us, any more than the word that the Divine is everywhere and at all times very close to man, the Life within his life. It is not the announcement but its sequel that is novel; but in order to appreciate the sequel aright let us first see some of the critical results following from Mr. Campbell's resolve to follow his "own mature judgment," as he phrases it, in matters Biblical and doctrinal.

In looking through his book in search of these critical results we cannot but feel how true it is that one man in his time plays many parts. Mr. Campbell is no exception to the general rule. On one page he appears as the rather poetic philosopher of idealism, by and by he emerges as the plain rationalist, and yet again he is evidently a wistful inheritor of traditions from which he is loth to part. Poetry and sentiment are a necessary part of every great preacher's outfit, they are prominent in Mr. Campbell's method; but when these are laid aside for awhile and his rationalism gets unimpeded scope, see what havoc he makes of the creeds! In twenty terse lines he states the orthodox belief according to "conventional theology," setting forth the Incarnation of the Second Person of the Trinity, his birth of a virgin, his miraculous powers, his death, resurrection, and ascension; the outpouring of the Third Person by the Father and the Son, and the future "grand assize" of quick and dead before Jesus enthroned upon the judgment-seat. Then, having rehearsed the articles of the ordinary Christian's belief, he calmly says of it all—"Literally understood, it is incredible." Elsewhere, he just as frankly dismisses the Fall, the Infallibly Inspired Word, the Substitutionary Atonement, and Hell-fire. Clearly the appeal to the authority within, to the man's "own mature judgment" in defiance of all external pressure, has been to some purpose. The uninformed reader, it is true, ignorant of Mr. Campbell's past utterances during the lengthening years of his ministry, and in possession only of this confessedly hasty book, might hesitate to say that all these old-fashioned doctrines have been deliberately, as well as frankly cast away. But those who know how often and how consistently he has in substance anticipated the present formal statement, cannot suppose that in this respect the book represents any but the settled opinions of its author.

Well, the treatise may not exactly rank along with Anselm's "Cur Deus Homo"—(Dr. Horton never said it did; what he said was that "if it proved to be true" it would so rank, and later reflection on his part seems to have led to extreme doubt as to the "if.") But here the book is, we may say, before the whole English-reading world, and translated into I know not how many other languages. It repudiates with a directness and with a reverberation never attaching before to any specimen of the "New Theology" literature, that which for generations and centuries has been held as the creed necessary to salvation. Surely the effect of these negations—which, be it remembered are those of an extending school of preachers and writers, not of an individual, however prominent—cannot be evaded. The man in the workshop and the woman by the hearth will hear Mr. Campbell's "No" much more plainly, I think, than his "Yes." "The evil," writes an eminent Welsh divine and author, "lies not in what Mr. Campbell's book teaches, but in what it denies." Of course, we all know that now and again the traditionalist supervenes, or tries to supervene, on the rationalist in Mr. Campbell, and nowhere does his new theology seem so weak, so confused and confusing, as where we see him trying to snatch something, if he only might, from the débris of the creeds that lie shattered around him. "In a sense," he says, the Virgin birth is "true." In what sense the plain man asks, wondering how a fact can be and not be at the same time. Was there once a child in Jewry who was born of only one human parent? No, that is "literal," and it is "incredible," as was said before. But the doctrine, we learn, sets forth "the truth that the emergence of anything great and beautiful in human character and achievement is the work of the Divine Spirit operating within human limitations." Is this really what Christians generally, from Irenæus to Bishop Gore, from the martyrs of the Roman amphitheatres to the lasses of the Salvation Army, have understood by the phrase "born of the Virgin Mary"? Is it using language fairly, honestly, to stretch phrases in this way? Again, says Mr. Campbell (to take but one more illustration of a tendency that weakens the book in many places) the doctrine of the Fall is true, not indeed in the sense that man was first made perfect and then succumbed to temptation—but, mirabile dictu, the Fall is true in the sense that the Eternal, being originally infinite, takes on Himself finite conditions. If I may quote from Mr. Campbell himself at this point a few admirably apposite words occurring in another part of his discussion of the same subject—"it is impossible to square the circle in this way, and to contrive to get the doctrine of the Fall in by the back door, so to speak." One can almost hear the rough critic of the market-place say, "Is not this form of new theologising, with its 'literally false' and its 'true in a sense,' suspiciously akin to sharp trading? I ask for what the shopkeeper doesn't happen to have in stock—for reasons of his own—but wishing to oblige me if he can, he offers me something else under the same label." The modern mind is considerably less alert than it thinks itself, or than Mr. Campbell gives it credit for being, if this kind of re-statement of Christianity is going to satisfy it long. Would not a more thorough-going policy prove more helpful to the world than this can ever do?

Some have suggested that the New Theologians are "trimming" in regard to these things, and especially in regard to their Christology. I do not think it for a moment. I believe that, unable to hold on the old grounds doctrines that have been long dear to them, they are honestly seeking to transform the doctrines to suit the new grounds. But such re-statements cannot deceive many. That there is in the New Theology a very definite departure, not on minor doctrines, but as regards matters of life or death to the Old Theology, none of us, at any rate, can doubt. The full significance of the new situation can only be duly appreciated when we notice how typical men other than ourselves have estimated the breach that has been made. Mr. Campbell assuredly does not minimise it himself. True, he has deprecated in advance the verdict that he means Unitarianism; but he has deprecated very much in vain. Of course, we see the difference between his presentation of Christianity and ours; some of us would be very sorry if Unitarianism were held responsible for the slippery language and hazy philosophising that too greatly characterise the system he offers to the world. But many of those who know of us Unitarians chiefly what we deny, hearing substantially the same denials from the New Theologians, may be excused if they conclude that we cannot be very far apart. However that may be, and on whatever new continent of thought, neither Unitarian nor Trinitarian, but somehow both, these men may stand, it is difficult to see how, on its old principles, orthodoxy can admit kinship with them. Dr. Meyer, for example, perceives that there must result "an irreconcilable break" between Mr. Campbell and evangelicalism. "Whatever this is," says another authority, Dr. Fitchett, the Australian Methodist, "it is not Christian doctrine." Another witness (whether competent or not), Mr. Blatchford, of the Clarion, declares that he, "Nunquam," is as much a Christian as Mr. Campbell. How the learned and sometimes courteous heads of colleges have dealt with their erratic friend and critic may be read in the denominational chronicles under the headings, "Barrett," "Marshall," "Forsyth," and "Fairbairn." In many a gathering of earnest evangelicals there have been grave searching of hearts and shaking of heads, and to hear a word of cheer we have to turn (as frequently) to the brethren across the Atlantic. Dr. Cuyler, of New York, says he has "witnessed the funerals of seven New Theologies, and the hearse awaits to take this last to the Aceldama of defunct heresies." That is all very well for America, but matters are, with good reason, felt to be more serious here. The Evangelical Alliance, with Sir Robert Anderson to the fore, is about to flood church and home, so far as possible, with literature intended to counteract a poison felt to be so deadly and so widely diffused. Bishops have already given battle to the new foe, and not without effect. Meanwhile Dr. Clifford says: "Mr. Campbell's utterances represent the high-water mark of change of the thought of God which has taken place during the last forty years."

Yes, the change has been long preparing, and, as was admirably said by the Chairman of the Congregational Union a few days ago, the flames would not have spread so rapidly if the heather had not been already dry. Mr. Campbell's New Theology, seventh or eighth of the dynasty as it may be, has struck the public mind with all the more force by reason of their labours who, year by year have been fling away, as it were, at the old fetters of thought. Now he and his allies fling those fetters defiantly away, and ask who shall prevent them doing so—who, in the churches or out? For this seems to me to be the new Situation—Heresy, open, loud, even boastful, whatever may happen to orthodoxy, is not going to be driven out of the pale. I do not think there is as much disposition now as once there was to drive it out, and in that we see a very remarkable sign of the times. Were this otherwise I am convinced it is too strong, too vigorously and widely rooted to be expelled. Look at the demonstration of the eminent Scottish ministers who have been writing recently in the Glasgow Herald in urgent behalf of Creed Revision. Different in many things from the new theologians of Mr. Campbell's type, they are one in asserting the rights of the inner authority, conscience and reason—rights at least to be heard, if not always to override the august traditions of the Church. But neither he nor they are "coming out," nor can one see who will put them out. We Unitarians may be allowed a smile as we remember how zealously we were kept out of the Free Church Council; we should be profoundly grieved, I venture to affirm for all, if the new movement led to schism in that truly remarkable federation.

But what we have seriously to attend to is how the new movement affects us and our work. We Unitarians know well how prevalent is that popular alienation from the churches to which Mr. Campbell's opening chapter points. That symptom of modern life is not going to be cured by one book or twenty, still less by our criticisms of one another. We only criticise in order to discover the truth that shall at last conquer and win men to itself. Are we content to let Mr. Campbell's, or anyone else's, hindered Unitarianism be the last appeal of the rational, reverent mind to the people at large? Must not our recognition of the defects in the form of his appeal move us to do better if we can? It seems to me that we Unitarians have of all men a special duty imposed upon us as the heirs of a long line of earnest thinkers who never allowed themselves to "palter with language in a double sense," but who at all costs, and sometimes at great costs, sought the honest truth for themselves, and tried to express it in the unambiguous language of simplest veracity. To name only one of them who but a little while ago used to stir us to the depths by his firm, clear, manly words, what would our honoured and beloved Richard Armstrong counsel us to do in such a crisis? Writing in the New World Review fourteen years ago, in that measured, quiet manner of his which embodied the more trenchant force, he said: "This movement, which has won for itself the name of the 'New Theology' or the 'New Orthodoxy,' may be either thorough or the reverse. That is to say, it may stand steadfastly by its principles, or it may, from time to time, at convenient places, slur them away. In the former case I venture very diffidently to believe the result is hopeless self-contradiction, in the latter it is a hazy vagueness which lulls the intellectual conscience, and can afford no real intellectual help to anyone." Surely the duty of every Unitarian to-day is, to the extent of his power, to stimulate in all brotherly sincerity, our friends the New Theologians to that "thoroughness" in the application of their rational and critical principles which will reveal to themselves the false positions they seem to us to have taken up, and lead them to a firmer fulcrum from which to try to move the world.

But whatever may be our duty with regard to this particular group, and however engrossing may be the problem, to us as spectators, which besets the federated Free Churches now that such a startling leaven is working in their midst, the time is not one when we can rest and be thankful. Opposed to all Free Churches, and especially to those churches which are clearest in their ideas of freedom, are time-tried forces that will not let us off cheaply. Sacerdotalism is strongly entrenched, use and wont fortify it, and the men who espouse it are sometimes very able and very often in dead earnest. The old claimants to authority will not surrender without a struggle—a long and stern struggle we may be sure. Well, we know our part in such a struggle. It is not the part of those who seek a party victory. Our cause is the emancipation of the minds of men from the yokes that hinder all their best life. We have not only to protest, but to demonstrate, and no demonstration will be so effective as a vigorous, helpful, religious life in our congregations, schools, and families, a living proof that to think freely does not imply to think negligently. It is only by such a practical proof that we are good for something effective in all this seething life of humanity, with its problems, and tears, and sins, and longings for better things, that we can make out any right to exist as a religious community. And if not above all, certainly amidst all our work, we must be incessant in teaching. It was well said a generation ago that ultimately all churches are reduced to two—the church of the priest and the church of the schoolmaster. Let us "give ourselves to our teaching," whether by pulpit, or class, or newspaper, or book, or pamphlet, or—van. If we believe in the paramount claims of truth, let us remember the simple lines:—

"Truth has failed, will fail again,
If not backed by truthful men."

The victory of spiritual independence for all men is far from being won; and it will be long, I fear, before the simple, healthful religion of Jesus of Nazareth triumphs over the artifices and subtleties that have so long held the field of Christendom. The longer the task before us, the sooner let us get to work.

LITERARY NOTES AND NEWS.

THE article on the New Stoicism by Professor Sonnenschein in the current number of the Hibbert Journal has called attention to the relationship between some modern forms of Christian teaching and the higher pantheistic thought of the Roman Empire. In the circumstances it may not be amiss to mention some of the books which are available for a further study of the question.

In addition to Dill's Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius and Caird's Evolution of Theology in the Greek Philosophers, which are mentioned by Professor Sonnenschein, we may recall specially Bishop Lightfoot's essay on St. Paul and Seneca, and the long and interesting account of the teaching of Epictetus in Dr. Abbot's Silvanus the Christian. It is no discredit to the New Theology that it reaches out a hand to some of the noblest teachers of the ancient world. Incidentally it seems likely to revive reverence for the Stoic and interest in his word and speculative ideas.

Readers who are interested in contemporary religious thought should not miss a small book by Dr. Horton on "The Holy Spirit," published at the Kingsgate Press. It consists of five sermons delivered to his own congregation. Slight as it is in texture and in the treatment of a difficult theme, we do not hail it as in any sense a permanent contribution to religious thought. It is intended to help the present distress of many earnest minds to face with traditional theological terms which have lost their meaning, and it does so along the lines not of dogmatic iteration, but of radical re-interpretation in the light of religious experience.

This is not the place to discuss Dr. Horton's arguments on the adequacy of the new language which he proposes to substitute for the old. We are not satisfied with it ourselves, and it strikes us that when Dr. Horton has thought out clearly all the implications of his position, he will have to face a far more radical breach with traditional evangelical theology than he proposes at present. "In one sense of the word 'person,'" he writes, "you cannot say that there are three persons in God. If we are to say that there are three in God, we must find another word than 'person' to express our idea. If we use the language of to-day, if we get the knowledge that we have acquired from the systematic investigation of the human personality during these last twenty-five years, I think we shall say, not 'There are three persons in one God,' but 'The Personality of God is, humanly speaking the relationship of Father and Son.'" He tells us that this relationship makes the universe. "Everywhere, from the beginning, world without end, worlds without end, the Spirit, God, the paternal-filial relation, lives, creates, works and achieves." Language like this marks a decisive breach with traditional orthodoxy. It is not the language of the creeds, and it does not mean the same thing. Whether we agree with it or not it is the expression of thought which moves.

Mr. Frederic Harrison's "The Creed of a Layman," has a twofold interest. It is partly autobiographical, an apologia pro fide mea. It is also a popular account of the Positivist group and their teaching and activity. Mr. Harrison has included in his volume a number of addresses delivered by himself at the meetings at Newton Hall on special occasions. This religion without God does not attract us; and the attempt to preserve some elements of Christian ritual and commemoration without the central spiritual impulse of the Gospel is curious rather than inspiring. But here is Positivism at its best, and those who want to understand the thought and the corporate activity of a company of remarkable men of the last generation cannot do better than read Mr. Harrison's eloquent pages. Their social and political idealism and their noble advocacy of freedom, justice, and peace have made us all their debtors.

Messrs. A. R. Mowbray & Co. have added two new volumes to their excellent series of "Leaders of the Church during the Nineteenth Century," namely Dr. Pusey, by Mr. G. W. E. Russell, and Frederick Denison Maurice, by Mr. C. F. G. Masterman. Previous volumes have dealt with Dean Church, Bishop Wilberforce, Dr. Liddon and Bishop Westcott. For readers who are without the time or the inclination to immerse themselves in big biographies they offer just what is needed. Our only complaint is, that the term "Church" is interpreted in a strictly Anglican sense. It is a pity not to let our dead prophets speak from a more inclusive platform and in company with other leaders of religion.

A guide to the Mediæval Room in the British Museum has just been issued by order of the Trustees. It is a substantial volume of 300 pages, admirably printed and illustrated with a wealth of beautiful pictures of the objects described. It is to be purchased for the modest sum of eighteen-pence. In these days of cheap books it is a marvel of cheapness, for, like its predecessors, it is a popular manual full of information based upon the best expert knowledge. Here the curious reader may wander at will through the social customs and the minor arts of the Middle Ages. Whether he is concerned with the astrolabe, or backgammon, or armour, or ivory carvings, or engraved gems, or domestic utensils, he will find something to his taste.

REMINISCENCES OF MRS. WILLIAM HERFORD.

BY SOME OF HER OLD PUPILS.

THERE are many of us who were pupils at Brook House, Knutsford, between 1860 and 1870, who are now dwelling with mingled feelings of affection, gratitude, and sorrow, on the strong and lovable character of one who helped to mould our unconscious youth and became a valued friend in after life.

Miss Louisa Carbutt took up teaching as a profession in early life, not because she needed to earn money, but because she loved young people and felt that she had a message to give them. The enthusiasm and energy which enabled her to work cut her purpose, spite of many difficulties and discouragements, made itself felt by all who came into touch with her vivid and original personality.

She was intensely in earnest and absolutely sincere, in small matters and in great. The indifferent were stimulated into interest, the easy-going were made ashamed of their slackness by contact with her vigorous mind. You might grumble and protest, but you could not ignore her quickening influence, which found a warm response in many young hearts.

She was keen alike to arrive at the truth and to convey it to others. The impression left by her teaching was that we learnt together; she was so entirely humble in acknowledging her ignorance or her mistakes, and so exhaustively thorough in working out with us every detail of the lesson, even to an extent that sometimes wearied quicker or shallower minds, who would have gladly taken more for granted.

In looking back we can see that one of her most uncommon and effective characteristics was the fearless and direct simplicity with which she could speak to her pupils on matters of serious import, or on the minor moralities which she held to be the foundation and the outcome of life's larger laws. Sometimes the occasions were as painful to her as to us. Her's was a sensitive nature, but she never flinched because of her own feelings; and though the timid might shrink, or the conventional affect to be shocked, the truths thus simply expressed went home with never-to-be-forgotten force; all the more so that they were constantly tempered with quaint humour,

"Sword of common sense!

Our surest gift: the sacred chain
Of man to man."

One of her earliest pupils and latest friends writes of Miss Carbutt: "Her word—even her wish—if we did but know it, was law to us. We really hated to have done or said anything she disapproved, and I have no recollection of any punishment." "In greater matters her own high aims and deep feeling carried her girls along with her, so that to this day there are many women past middle life who consciously measure not only their aims, but their practical problems by the test of her attitude and counsels."

The school, under her influence and Mr. William Herford's, was before the time in many ways. One notable feature was the study of hygiene: We all had to learn human physiology. Outdoor games were encouraged, and a high standard of fresh air and exercise, soap and water, and wholesome food was kept up in the school régime.

Miss Carbutt taught us from Theodore Parker's writings, before he was admitted among orthodox Unitarian literature, at a time when "an apology was needed for reading him, and his books were not left conspicuous on the table. Her mind was always open to the "forward view," and this was the secret of much of her sympathy with young people. Who can tell fully of her large, warm heart and generous appreciation of others, her demonstrative expression of feelings which encouraged the diffident and endeared her to pupils, teachers, and servants? Wherever her path through life has taken her there have been neighbours, friends, and humble acquaintances cheered by her hearty, homely greetings, and her kindly, humorous words which have made them feel their common humanity and sent them on their way refreshed with a pleasant or a merry thought.

Of her most truly might be quoted George Meredith's beautiful sonnet:—
When I remember, friend, whom lost I call,

Because a man beloved is taken hence,
The tender humour and the fire of sense
In your good eyes: how full of heart for all,

And chiefly for the weaker by the wall,
You bore that lamp of sane benevolence;
Then see I round you Death his shadows dense

Divide, and at your feet his emblems fall.
For surely are you one with the white host,

Spirits, whose memory is our vital air
Through the great love of earth they had: lo, these,

Like beams that throw the path on tossing seas,
Can bid us feel we keep them in the ghost,

Partakers of a strife they loved to share.

BEAUTY is the chief mediator between the good and the true; and this is why the great poets have been also prophets.—

THE MODERN WOMAN.

The modern woman has modern ways and adopts modern methods—In her house you will be sure to find the "Dalli" or "Dallinette" (a smaller "Dalli"). To use these irons is the best, most simple, and most comfortable way of ironing. Self-heating with non-inflammable fuel without noxious fumes, therefore no risk from fire. Healthier and safer than any other iron.

The "Dallinette" is a smaller "Dalli." Really excellent for light work and travelling. For general household work use the "Dalli." Having a larger ironing surface and greater heating capacity, every description of ironing can be done with it.

Price of the "Dalli" 6/6, price of the "Dallinette" 5/9. "Dalli" Fuel 1/9 per box of 128 blocks. Of all Ironmongers and Stores. If any difficulty apply to THE DALLI SMOKELESS FUEL Co., 4 and 6, Moor Lane, London, E.C.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AN article on "The Restatement of Catholic Thought in France," by M. Paul Sabatier, with special reference to the work of M. Le Roy, appears in our present issue. This is the first of the series of monthly articles on the Religious Crisis in France, which, as we have already announced, M. Sabatier has been good enough to promise us for the INQUIRER.

THE second Bulletin of the International Congress of Religious Liberals, to be held at Boston, Mass., September 22 to 27, is issued as a supplement to this week's INQUIRER. It will be seen that the programme of the week's meetings is taking shape, but we shall have to wait a month or two before full particulars are in our hands. Tremont Temple is to be the chief meeting place, and there on Monday the American National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian churches will compress its meetings, which usually occupy much more time, into one day, so that it may have a place in the larger International programme; and then Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday are devoted to hard work for the International. Thursday, we are very glad to see, is to be a Cambridge day, when the Congress will be welcomed to Harvard by President Eliot, the father of Dr. Samuel Eliot, who is president of this fourth International as well as of the American Unitarian Association.

THE list of honorary Vice-Presidents of the Congress is of the greatest interest. It is a most welcome token of the widespread sympathy which this International meeting has evoked in America. It proves that the ideal of the Congress, as being by no means a sectional Unitarian gathering, is there, at any rate, clearly appreciated. Of public men who have thus signified their goodwill and sympathy, we note especially the names of the Hon. William H. Taft, United States Secretary of War, and the Hon. John D. Long, former Governor of Massachusetts and ex-Secretary of the Navy. Literature is represented by Samuel L. Clemens (Mark Twain), Professor C. E. Norton, Richard W. Gilder, editor of the Century Magazine, and Edmund Clarence Stedman; the Universities by President Eliot of Harvard, President Schurman of Cornell, and many others; while it is delightful to see also the names of such veterans as Dr. Edward Everett Hale, Thomas Wentworth Higginson and Goldwin Smith. The inclusive representation of religious liberals is marked by the names of Dr. Lyman Abbott, Dr. T. T. Munger, Dr. J. M. Whiton, and Henry W. Wilbur, secretary of the Friends' General Conference, Philadelphia. On the executive committee, as we have already noted, is Dr. George A. Gordon, the leading liberal Congregational minister of Boston.

WE understand that a supply of membership tickets for the International Congress has been received at Essex Hall, and intending visitors from this country can now be supplied, on payment of the necessary dollar. It will also be good news to our friends on this side that 106 members, of whom over 50 are ministers, have now booked their passage, and thus the promised reduction of fare is secured.

GIPSY SMITH is reported by some interviewer as saying that Boston was the most difficult centre for his Mission; that he had to face all the pride of intellect; that the religious teaching that is influencing the town is mainly Unitarian. Such statements do not add to one's knowledge; a man who had remained three thousand miles from Boston and depended merely on vague rumour could say as much. More definite is the statement: "I had three hundred letters from minister in and around Boston telling me what God had done for them during the Mission. Many ministers told me they had entered into a new experience and had begun for the first time to preach Christ crucified." Those who waited so long before preaching Christ crucified were probably not the Unitarians.

BEFORE this paper sees the light the one hundredth anniversary of Primitive Methodism, which dates from May 31, 1807, will have been celebrated. There was the meeting at Mow Cop, which began not long after sunrise and continued till sunset. Preaching, praying, singing, all in irregular fashion, but full of enthusiasm and life, were going on all the time. No living man can exactly reproduce the scene of that day. In the absence of the surviving memory we have to look up written records of the movements of the men who, expelled from the Wesleyan body for persisting in holding these camp meetings, became the founders of a rival Methodist Church. Someone has said that the early Primitive Methodists were the Salvation Army of their time. And those who have seen one of the early Primitive hymn-books, with its choruses:

"I'm glad I ever saw the day, Sing glory, glory, glory," &c.,
will easily admit the resemblance.

A COMPARISON of the character, say, of Hugh Bourne with that of the "General"; a comparison also of the discipline of the Primitive Methodists, and their methods, with those that distinguish the more modern movement, the announcements of the one and the war cries of the other, might furnish suggestions valuable to the religious historian. Primitive Methodism, one hundred years after its birth, is found to have gained much in culture, yet to have retained much of its enthusiasm. Bent still on saving men's souls, it takes its due part in enlightening their minds; it preaches the Gospel, but it also expounds the Scriptures. Above all, as Mr. Redfern has said, it remains "splendidly democratic in its sympathies, its aspirations, and its programmes."

MOW COP is a hog's back, rather more than 1,000 ft. in height, running north and south on the borders of Stafford and Cheshire. Here the centenary was celebrated by a renewal last Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, of the camp meetings, to which "Primitives" flocked in thousands from all parts of the country. Professor Peake, of Manchester, and Mr. W. P. Hartley, M.P., it will be remembered, are leading members of the Primitive Methodist Connexion, and they both took part in the closing meeting of the celebration on Monday evening at Tunstall.

THE British Congregationalist of May 23 contains an interesting article on Japanese Students and Christianity which is well worth consideration for the subject of which it treats. But we draw attention to it in this place because of an inaccurate remark which has little to do with the proper subject-matter, and is a gratuitous if not calculated offence to some of the writer's own countrymen. The remark is this: "The result in certain sections is the deadness always characteristic of Unitarianism, a want of desire to preach the gospel they hold." We should be the last to assert that all Unitarians have life abounding, but we doubt whether our critics would be so eager to find fault with us if we were all dead or likely to die. The gospel of Unitarians may not commend itself to our contemporary, but such gospel as we hold we are not slow to preach. The Unitarian Vans may shortly convince those who doubt our zeal that, so far from declining, it is more eager than ever to preach the gospel to the people. Mr. Frank Lenwood, M.A., the writer of the article, is among the more instructed members of his Church, and ought to have known better, and we enter a mild protest against this attempt to kill us by innuendo.

THE foreign mission bodies have just been celebrating the Centenary of Protestant missionary effort in China. Those meetings in Shanghai were attended by some 1,000 delegates, native and foreign, including visitors from the West. The early progress was almost incredibly slow, and more than half a century of pertinacious evangelisation resulted in only the gain of 1,000 members. But recently the growth has been more rapid, and since the year 1900 about 50,000 converts have been added to the church roll. The number is small when compared with the vastness of the population, but it must prove an encouragement to the missionaries who for so long had worked against hope. Dr. Griffith John, indeed, with the splendid buoyancy of old age, sees signs of China becoming a Christian country. "Christianity," he says, "is moving among them, Christian ideas are taking possession of them, and they are putting on Christian civilisation with a rapidity which seems to some of us simply astonishing." In curious proof of this thesis, Dr. John continues: "Think of their great educational scheme, including schools for female scholars, of the prohibition of opium, and the suppression of foot-binding, of the granting of a Constitution to take the place of absolute despotism, of the rapid multiplication of newspapers, all discussing public subjects and advocating reform, of the flooding of the country with translations of Western books on all conceivable subjects by the native press, and of the introduction of the railway, the telegraph, the Imperial postal service, and other Western inventions and appliances. All these things are new in China and distinctly Christian."

THE problem of the town church is always with us, and while that is the case there is need for such conferences as that reported in the last week's issue of the British Congregationalist. The meeting was held in connection with the Association of Town Boards, to which we have previously called attention. It is sought in this way to draw together the forces of Congregationalism so that they may with the more effect act in the densely crowded districts of our cities. Interesting particulars were given of the growth of these

Town Boards in Newcastle, Hul', Manchester, Leeds, and other centres, where we read of amalgamation of churches, funds for new buildings, the provision of joint ministers, &c. One of the influences against which this new movement for closer co-operation has to contend is what some of the speakers referred to as "exaggerated independency." Incidentally we note the statement that in Newcastle district, with a population of half a million, the Congregational churches count only 2,000 members. The figures are a startling reminder of the small hold which even a powerful denomination has upon the modern democracy.

A CORRESPONDENT who heard Mr. Page Hopps's Whit-week speech on "The Man in the Street," sends us the following suggestion:—

"Perhaps some simpler course than renting a popular theatre to which to tempt this coy personage might be practicable. Why should not the evening services in the chapels be specially adapted to meet the case of the Man in the Street? Who would object to his presence there? Or who would object to treatment in a direct homely way, and in a Christian spirit of the everyday topics in which the man is really interested? What if each minister of a Unitarian chapel made it known throughout his district that it was intended, as a rule, to deal in his evening sermon with the 'humanities' in which the working man is interested, and with a view to that took measures to put himself in touch with the minds of the men? It could be very simply done. A small basket, placed on some convenient spot in the chapel, in which the most modest hearer might drop a note of any question he wished to ask, or of any topic he desired to be discussed, might let the minister know what the thought condition of his audience was, and suggest to him how to choose his subjects and mould them into acceptable shape. Such sermons might be made to serve the purpose of a course of Applied Christian Ethics, in which the real teaching of the real Jesus could be brought home to the mind and heart in a way and with an effect that does not seem to be possible otherwise. The addresses need not be laboured; the homelier and simpler, the more like the Master's parables the better, spoken right off from conviction and the heart, without any manuscript to divert the eye of the preacher from its proper focus.

"There is another advantage which might accrue from such a method. Unitarian congregations are often widely scattered. The minister must have difficulty in keeping in mental touch with his people. The basket might often be used as a convenient means of letting the minister know of the state of mind of many a timid inquirer who would shrink from closer personal communication."

THE May Atlantic Monthly contains a very interesting article on the late Thomas Bailey Aldrich by Bliss Perry, concluding with Aldrich's last sonnet, of which the closing lines are:—

"In years foregone, O Soul, was all not well?
Still lovelier life awaits thee. Fear not thou!"

THE fiftieth anniversary of the stone-laying of the present New Gravel Pit Church, at Hackney, is to be celebrated by the grand bazaar, to be held, as advertised, in the King's Hall, Holborn, on Wednesday and Thursday next. The proceeds are to go to the Guarantee Fund which the congregation is engaged in raising, and the help of friends in and about London is earnestly invited. The Gravel Pit congregation has a fine history, with which the names of Priestley, Price, Belsham, and Aspland are connected, and its present duty in a crowded quarter of London, under greatly changed conditions, it is facing with steadfast faithfulness. There will be no raffling at the bazaar, for which friends in all parts of the country have been sending contributions. Now what they want is plenty of buyers.

At the semi-annual meeting of the Connecticut Valley Conference of Unitarian Congregational churches, held at Springfield, Mass., May 14 and 15, the following resolution in reference to the recent death of the Rev. John Cuckson was adopted:—"That this Conference desires to record its appreciation of the high character, the exceptional ability as a preacher, the faithfulness and devotion as a pastor, and the affection, wisdom, and loyalty as a friend, of Rev. John Cuckson, formerly pastor of the church of the Unity and a member of this Conference, whose recent sudden death at Plymouth, where he was pastor of the Pilgrim Church, has brought serious loss to our body and cause. As a preacher he was eloquent, stimulating, and inspiring, as a pastor he won and held the love and respect of his people, as a man his character held our admiration, as a friend he bound others to him by cords that death hardly can break. He was a Unitarian from study and conviction, finding in our free atmosphere the best opportunity for the expression of his profoundly religious nature and his firmly and clearly held convictions. In a ministry of many arduous years, both in England and in this country, he served liberal Christianity well."

At the monthly Postal Mission Conference to-morrow (Sunday) at College Chapel, Stepney Green (advertised in another column), "Peace" will be discussed. Mr. Chas. Weiss will introduce the subject, and Mr. C. E. Maurice, of the International Arbitration and Peace Association, has kindly consented to take the chair.

THE RESTATEMENT OF CATHOLIC THOUGHT IN FRANCE.

"The question has been stated, and it will avail no one to deny it."—EDOUARD LE ROY.

I REJOICE to devote my first article in THE INQUIRER to the consideration of a book which marks an epoch in the history of the thought of the Church. I refer to M. Le Roy's "Dogma and Criticism."*

I am far from meaning that M. Le Roy has suddenly disclosed a new system of philosophy. Rather does the importance of his work consist in making manifest that it is the result of a long evolution and of a combined effort. The ideas to which he invites our attention were in the air, or rather in the minds of men. His special merit consists in having been able to express clearly and compactly what many of us were thinking more or less vaguely and incompletely.

Viewed in this light he is eminently an historian, and an historian whose gaze is directed towards the evolution of present day thought. He sees, he examines, and he reports, advancing a little ahead of us with his light. But at no moment, as we follow him, do we experience any of that sensation of extra-human or purely verbal dizziness that so many systems of philosophy engender in us.

The beneficent radiance of these pages, the quality which gives them their power and beauty, consists in their truth, their sincerity, and their searching force. M. Le Roy is not content to be merely nominally a Catholic. He aspires to be a Catholic in reality, with all his heart and soul and mind. He would invest his Catholicism with an element of virility. He is less concerned about receiving from the Hierarchy the ribbons and good marks, with which, after the manner of some mothers, it rewards the obedience of its babes, than he is concerned to be able to receive for himself the satisfaction of the witness of a life lived in and for the Church. The Government is not the Fatherland, nor is the Hierarchy the Church. But so soon as I perceive beyond the sway of the Government, which claims my submission, the sway of the Fatherland, my allegiance undergoes a transformation; it assumes an unwonted grandeur and scope. My allegiance becomes intelligent. I obey not by right of force, as a slave, but by constraint of love, as a citizen. It is in the direction of such a complete obedience as this—an obedience which converts every religious man into an increasingly conscious fellow-labourer with the Divine Will—that all M. Le Roy's thought has been setting.

Seeing that many believers are daily becoming more isolated, establishing themselves on positions that no one any longer dreams of refusing to them, he unhesitatingly avails himself of the situation, whilst we are speedily reassured, by his calm bearing, as to the strength of his hopes and faith. He begins by establishing that the intellectualist conception of dogma proffered by certain Catholics as alone orthodox is irrevocably condemned by modern thought. Indeed, to say that it is condemned is doing it too much honour, for it has become absolutely foreign to our methods of thought.

Those who have grieved over this conception, and doubtless reproached themselves for finding it unintelligible, and void of anything that they could assimilate, will be grateful to him for the sober vigour with which he places upon record its irretrievable bankruptcy.

In a few luminous, measured, and delightfully discreet pages (pp. 6-13) he summarises all that has been said against this conception of dogma. He brings all this artillery to bear, marshalling it in battle array, and employing it to the highest advantage; and over against it he shows us a redoubt already dismantled, and where there is to be found henceforth nothing but a garrison which will defend itself with the admirable—but blind and fruitless—daring of the desperate.

But perhaps the question was wrongly put? Is the indefensible redoubt on which unwise adherents have erected the Church's standard, is this really the Catholic conception of dogma?

This is the question which M. Ed. Le Roy, with all respect, puts to authority. For a Catholic authority is, in fact, alone entitled to answer it from a theological point of view. But there is nothing to forbid a layman to examine the answer that may be offered on grounds of fact and history. Now, from this point of view, the answer is not open to doubt. "The conception of dogma, condemned and re-proved by the modern conscience, is not the Catholic conception of dogma."

"A dogma," says M. Ed. Le Roy, "has, in the first place, if I mistake not, a negative sense. Its concern is rather to exclude and condemn certain errors than to determine positively what is true. . . Consider a given dogma, such as 'God is a person.' I do not in any wise see in this statement a definition of divine personality. It gives me no information whatever about this personality, it does not reveal His nature, it furnishes me with no explicit idea of Him at all. But I do see quite clearly that it tells me that 'God is not an impersonal being,' that is to say, that God is not a simple law, or formal category, or ideal principle, or an abstract entity, any more than He is a universal substance or some cosmic force or other inherent in all things. In short, the dogma 'God is a person' conveys no new positive conception, nor does it guarantee the truth of any one of the particular systems that the history of Philosophy shows to have been successively advanced, but it notifies me that all given forms of Pantheism are false and must be rejected."

"The same may be said of the dogma of the Real Presence. It in no wise declares any theory about this Presence, not even enlightening me as to what it consists in. But it does very explicitly tell me that it is not to be understood in this or that sense that has at some time or other been advanced, and that, for example, the consecrated host is not to be regarded solely as a symbol or figure of Jesus" (pp. 19-20).

This is, in fact, one of the aspects of dogma, and the history of the Church makes clear that the decisions of councils do not constitute, in general, declarations of philosophic theorems, but are catalogues of errors to be avoided.

"Hence it arises that dogmatic formulas frequently borrow expressions from diverse philosophies without going to the trouble of welding together and harmonising these heterogeneous terms. There is nothing objectionable about such a proceeding, as there is nothing objectionable about the employment of concepts originating in different quarters, so long as the dogmas do not tend to constitute in themselves a reasoned theory or an intelligible system of positive affirmations, and so long as they confine themselves to opposing pleas in bar to certain theories and conjectures of the human mind; while it is natural, on the other hand, that every dogma should assume the point of view proper to the doctrine it interdicts, so as to strike home beyond the risk of doubt" (pp. 22-23).

And M. Ed. Le Roy concludes this first part of his study by making it clear that the true method of studying dogmas is the historical method.

Nevertheless, dogma has not solely a negative sense. It has more particularly a practical sense.

"God is a person" means "Let your attitude to God be such as is your attitude to human personality." Similarly, "Jesus was raised from the dead" means "Be in your relation to him what you would have been before his death, and what you are in relation to those who live now." "In the same way, again, the dogma of the Real Presence means that it is needful to assume in relation to the consecrated host, an attitude identical with that which we should assume were Jesus to become visible" (pp. 25-26).

I cannot hope to have given even a faint idea, through this meagre summary of mine, of the force, vitality, and energy of these pages. The attacks which they have called forth from one quarter of Catholicism they are now about to call forth from certain Protestant as well as Free-thinking quarters. The Conservatives of the right, as well as of the left, will combine once more to contend with this marplot that claims to tell them that they are committing the same error. But in pointing out wherein consists the identity of thought in men who are otherwise opposed to each other, the new philosophy will very shortly bring about a new combination in the intellectual orientation of the churches. People who believe themselves to be and call themselves Free-thinkers, strict Calvinists, and zealous Papists, will really find themselves constrained to disclosed their intellectual fraternity; whilst those who come from every point of the compass, the poor in spirit, and those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, and those who have reached no finality in religious development, will readily comprehend that the dogmas of the past constitute neither final truths nor coarse errors, but are the utterances of a people of stammering lips, of a human society ever striving to give expression to its moral and religious will.

Those who, after having read the work of Edouard Le Roy, will raise their eyes to see, will find that on all sides, in the Church as well as outside the Church, are coming to light works inspired by the self-same spirit, and those who will listen to the echo of these labours in the most varied quarters will find no trouble in comprehending that the present Catholic Reformation possesses nothing in common with those spasmodic fits of Liberalism which history has placed on record in the course, for example, of the nineteenth century. It is no mere consequence of external events that we see before us, but, far otherwise, it is the manifestation of a profound and heart-searching effort, against which nothing can prevail, for it is the manifestation of a living force.

The Giovanni Selvaggi are legion, as M. Fogazzaro has so well expressed it, and such a quite external indication as the following is evidence of the strength of their position. Some years ago a Catholic bookseller would not have been able, with the best will in the world, to offer for sale a book in which views, mistakenly regarded as traditional, would have been called in question. And here, to-day, is the great firm of Bloud flinging its doors wide open to a work by M. Le Roy. I congratulate them most sincerely upon it. They have comprehended the irresistible force of the movement which is hurrying Catholicism towards new horizons.

And I trust that this has been comprehended in other quarters also. The article, "What is a Dogma?" appeared in the Quinzaine of April 16, 1905. That is, therefore, more than two years ago. It was immediately denounced to ecclesiastical authority by a host of journalists and amateur theologians, who daily fly to the rescue of the Church. M. Ed. Le Roy and his friends were accused, as usual, of being Protestants in disguise or covert Rationalists.

This agitation gradually subsided, and the whole hubbub raised by the purveyors to the Index and to the Holy Office has not yet succeeded in drawing these congregations from their attitude of reserve. Perhaps Rome has delayed so long only to strike better? Or has she, perhaps, on the contrary, learnt to understand the sincerity and the fidelity of these sons of hers, who worry her a little by their ways, but whose invaluable spiritual worth she now perceives?

At any rate, until there is evidence to the contrary, I shall live in hopes that she is making salutary reflections, and beginning to feel disquiet at seeing herself surrounded by too many of the kind of people "who regard orthodoxy in the light of a monopoly or of a flag, and who are found for ever the same, snapping at the heels of any man who dares to think" (p. viii.).

PAUL SABATIER.

Assisi (Umbria, Italy), May 8, 1907.

IN most of the relations of life we find it a tough lesson—yet we are far the more robust for learning it—to be content to do good for the doing of it only. One has achieved heroic self-conquest when one's habit of mind takes it as a thing of course that the best life is to be one of unthanked self-denial. That is a discovery which we all have to make, in the economies of beneficence, if we have any persistent plan of unselfish living.—Austin Phelps.

THE SOCIAL GOSPEL.*

THIS volume is one of the Crown Theological Library, and well sustains the reputation of this excellent series. Germany is to be congratulated on having professors who have studied the social problems of their country so thoroughly, and can write upon them so lucidly. The first essay was read by Harnack at the Evangelical Social Congress held in 1894, and is marked by the painstaking thoroughness of good German scholarship. It starts with a recognition of the fact that the duty of Christian charity is no longer a problem with which the individual can deal, and that the object of the Congress is to take counsel for joint action. Its general tone is hopeful, with generous recognition of what has been already accomplished, and of the fact that the new duties now felt to be urgent are a sign not of decay but of healthy growth. Harnack strikes the religious note strongly and clearly, saying: "The Gospel is the glad tidings of benefits that pass not away. In it are the powers of eternal life; it is concerned with repentance and faith, with regeneration and a new life; its end is redemption, not social improvement. Therefore it aims at raising the individual to a standpoint far above the conflicts between earthly success and earthly distress, between riches and poverty, lordship and service. This has been its meaning to earnest Christians of all ages, and those who are unable to appreciate this idea, fail to appreciate the Gospel itself. The indifference to all earthly affairs which proceeds from the conviction that we possess life eternal, is an essential feature of Christianity." Hence are derived two principles, the one urging men to resignation, the other urging to renounce the world and live for something new, this latter principle sometimes leading to strenuous endeavours to abolish the existing order of things. But the Gospel which preaches indifference to the world also insists on another principle, "Love thy neighbour as thyself." This is an active, social principle, drawing no distinction between the wants of the body and those of the soul; "sickness is always sickness, and want is always want." So, with the advent of Christianity, religion had to embrace a two-fold duty—to scorn earthly misery and earthly prosperity alike, and yet to relieve distress of every kind; and it has succeeded only as it has fulfilled this two-fold duty. Harnack is clear that Christianity has no economic programme, and that a set of self-consistent economic precepts cannot be taken from the New Testament. He asks, "May a Christian never settle vexed questions of inheritance? Is it right for him to make large outlay, as in the Gospel story, only on ointments; or is this always justifiable?" And, again, "An age in which capital was almost always hoarded in a useless way, as a dead thing, cannot be compared with an age in which it is the greatest economic power; and an age which believed the end of the world approaching is not to be compared with one which recognises as sacred the duty of working for the future." So far, Harnack speaks clearly and strongly, and he takes another step with equal decision.

* "Essays on the Social Gospel." By Adolf Harnack and Wilhelm Herrmann. Translated by G. M. Craik. (Williams & Norgate. 4s. 6d.)

He notes how the early Christians urged the Government of their day to enforce the abolition of practices that were offensive even to a heathen conscience—"privileged unchastity, secret murder, exposing of children, and wholesale prostitution." He considers that religion should undertake a similar task to-day with regard to duties which are felt to be imperative on the modern conscience, but he does not think it is for Christianity to take the lead in economic reform. He says: "It is enough if religion prepares men's minds for great economic changes and revolutions; if it foresees the new moral duties which these impose; if it knows how to adapt itself to them, and perceives the right moment at which to step in with its forces and do its work. A religion which aims at saving the soul and transforming the inner man, and which regards a change in outward circumstances as but a small matter in comparison with the power of evil, can only follow in the wake of earthly changes and exercise an after-influence; it is not qualified to lead the way in economic developments."

Harnack's next chapter contains an admirable historical retrospect, and he then concludes his essay with one dealing with the social mission of the Church to-day. Here we have found less of practical interest to ourselves; perhaps because of the difference between our two countries. It leads up to the recognition of three great duties—the defence of the Evangelical faith, the relief of distress, and the encouragement of education and culture. Good, but some of us want to go a little further than this.

His next essay, a paper read May, 1902, deals with the moral and social significance of modern education, and is full of accurate observation and suggestive thought, and we regret that we have not space to notice it at length. The last essay is by Dr. Herrmann, of Marburg, who also contributes a preface, and is on "The Moral Teachings of Jesus." Its main purpose is to liberate Christian disciples from a slavish obedience to the precepts of their master, and make them feel that only in a life of free and willing obedience can they render him the required service. With what is said about the spirit of Jesus most of us would find ourselves in full accord, especially when we remember that the German "Evangelisch" is mainly used in contradistinction to "Katholisch," and does not convey all the implications of its English translation, "Evangelical."

CHRISTIAN LIFE.*

IN attempting to deal with the simple things of the Christian Life, we are not sure that Dr. Morgan has done well at the outset to perplex his young reader with the subtleties of Christ's conversation with Nicodemus. The things said to Nicodemus were spoken as to an expert teacher who needed to be puzzled and humiliated. But how shall we aid the Christian who is not expert, and who needs to be instructed and guided, by telling him that "No man knows God by his first birth, and because of his ignorance he is at enmity with God?" ?

One of the least profitable mental exercises a young Christian could engage in would be the attempt to divide human beings into the once born and the twice born; only one exercise would be worse, a constant worrying to find out which of the two classes he belonged to himself. Such profitless exercises are distinctly suggested by several statements in Dr. Morgan's first essay. The other chapters, dealing with Holiness, Growth, Work and Temptation, are not worthless, but they are calculated to make one sympathise very deeply with the Rev. R. J. Campbell's effort to re-state the truths of Christianity. They need to be stated in simpler terms, and to be followed by healthier advice than is here given. "It is absolutely important that you begin the day with God's Word. Man's words will be crowding upon your soul all day. Prepare it then with the Word of God, that you may measure and estimate rightly the words of men, accepting or rejecting them according to their relation with God's great Word."

It is made perfectly clear on the next page that God's great Word means the Bible. Why inculcate this piece of private ritual? Why speak of the Bible as if it were altogether unlike the other gifts of God's providence, as if it had a constant and uniform value, as if it were not merely relatively beautiful and helpful, but absolutely essential? There are a few happy thoughts in these pages. The turn given to the saying, "My Father worketh hitherto," if arbitrary, is suggestive. But on the whole we may wish the young Christian the fortune of meeting with some teacher who, while earnest and arousing, will be less narrow in his thought and less antiquated in phraseology than the author of this little volume. THE WAGNER STORIES.

In writing poems for his own music, Wagner followed closely, or adapted freely, or modified largely the legends and sagas which had fastened upon his imagination, as it suited his dramatic purpose. In the present volume,* Mr. Filson Young gives the Wagnerian versions. We had almost described the book "told by Young for the young," for, with a few changes by way of simplification, the tales would be welcome to our boys and girls. In fact the author confesses in his introductory note that to ply the novice to the Wagner operas with information about leading motives and musical characterisations is too formidable a process of initiation. The first essential is to know what the operas are about. This he provides in a narrative form which is smooth, persuasive, and beguiling. "Once in that world which never was, but which is and always will be—the world of myth and fantasy—there lived," so he begins, and takes us on through the stories of the operas, from "The Flying Dutchman" to the "Mastersingers," which last he regards as "the greatest and perhaps the ultimate expression in music of a sane, mature joy in life and the world" (p. 283). Then follows an account of the Trilogy of the Nibelung's Ring and of "Parsifal." The value of the work is enhanced by the inclusion of successful translations of some of the lyric songs by Eric Maclagan. The author is deep enough in love with Wagner to have been able to communicate to his story-telling something of the spirit of mystery that belongs to the music of the great master. Now that we have the stories in so pleasing a form, we are ready for the interpreter. Mr. Fripp began the work in a series of happy sketches published some years ago in the Seed-sower; and in his "Nibelung's Ring" Mr. W. C. Ward attempted a study of the inner significance of a portion of Wagner's music-drama. And when the exposition of the parable comes along, we have no desire for a more graceful style than characterises the volume under review.

SHORT NOTICES.

Monothelism, Hebrew and Christian, by R. B. Girdlestone, M.A. If Canon Girdlestone thinks that by this feeble little effort he is going to batter down the walls of Judaism, that for all these centuries have defied the assaults of the Trinitarian Christian, he is likely to be much mistaken. The Jew who repeats daily, "Hear, O Israel, The LORD our God, the LORD is One," does not need a Christian to come and tell him what he really means by it. And when he finds that the exposition of its meaning includes the doctrine of the deity of Christ, he will smile a wise smile, as who should say, "I thought it would come to this." Why do not the Jews get up a society for the conversion of Christians? Some Christians need it! (Longmans, 3d. net.) R. T. H.

The third volume of the Poems of George Crabbe completes the fine edition edited by Dr. A. W. Ward, the Master of Peterhouse, in the "Cambridge English Classics" series. This volume contains the rest of the "Tales of the Hall," a number of posthumous tales, and nearly fifty fragments of tales and miscellaneous verses not previously printed. The Bibliography at the end, compiled by Mr. A. T. Bartholomew, of Peterhouse, shows that Crabbe has found translators into German, Dutch, and Russian. (Cambridge University Press. 4s. 6d. net.)

The Old Faith Re-stated, by the Rev. James Hyde, of the New Church, maintains that the Second Advent of Christ was accomplished in the middle of the eighteenth century. It took place in the spiritual world, and reasons are given why the Lord could not appear in person on the earth in his second advent. What he did was to send a servant whose name is Emanuel Swedenborg. The great seer has sore need to be delivered from the house of his friends. (Fredk. Warne, 1s. net.)

The Garrisoned Soul, by the Rev. C. E. P. Antram, consists of meditations on Bishop Bickersteth's hymn "Peace, perfect peace." Evangelism, with pathetic persistence, due to reverence for the sacred letter, still talks, in Mr. Antram's language, of "the whispering blood of Jesus, the speaking blood of the Lamb." To appreciate the meditations one requires the penetration to peer through the terminology of an objectionable symbolism into the depth of earnest meaning below. (James Clarke & Co., 1s.)

NATIONAL UNITARIAN TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE fourteenth annual meeting of the Association was held at Essex Hall on Thursday evening, May 23, the Rev. W. G. TARRANT, one of the vice-presidents, presiding in the absence of the President, the Earl of Carlisle.

The meeting opened with hymn and prayer by the Rev. J. C. STREET, after which Mr. J. BREDALL, hon. sec., read the report. Under the heading "Literature" it was noted that with Mrs. Armstrong's kind consent a sermon by the late Rev. R. A. Armstrong on "Drink, Greed and Slavery," had been reprinted; and another sermon, "Let us alone," printed for the first time. The committee was also about to issue six pamphlets published by the Unitarian Temperance Society of Boston, U.S.A. The report stated that 146 of our ministers are known to be abstainers. The appointment of Mr. W. R. Marshall as organising secretary has been amply justified.

Mr. F. A. EDWARDS presented the accounts, which showed a balance of £26 15s. 6d. in hand, though subscriptions both of affiliated societies and of members had fallen off. There were liabilities for printing which would very soon make away with their balance. A collection made at the meeting amounted to £4 16s.

The CHAIRMAN moved the adoption of the report and accounts, and regretted that their President, the Earl of Carlisle, was not there to see the increased attendance at that meeting. He was glad to see so many young people present. Referring to their work he quoted a saying of W. R. Greg's, "A large part of the time and the energy of the wise was spent in undoing the efforts of the good," but added that of all efforts for social amelioration the one in which they were engaged was the freest from such suspicion; and certainly they were not wrong in bringing up all young people as abstainers. They might indeed injure sales, but they would be all the better if the trade were swept out of the country. They were making steady progress, and he hoped that soon it would be felt to be as unreasonable not to have a Band of Hope connected with a church as not to have a Sunday-school. The aim was to train up the young people in the habits of personal virtue, abstainers not only from one form of vice but with all the forms of vice associated with it. The remembrance of that meeting would be an encouragement to them all, it would be a stimulus and a stay to them in their own efforts. No discouragement would keep them from putting all their efforts into that work for the benefit of mankind.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE seconded the resolution, and made a powerful plea for abstinence on the ground that none of them could claim to be safe who was a moderate drinker. What was the harm of drinking a little, they asked. And he pictured the man now in a Scotch prison cell, with the thought of his own ruined life, and 22 deaths, as the result of his having for once just overstepped the line of safety—because the weather was cold and inconsiderate people had treated him. He was not drunk, but he had just enough to cloud his judgment, and so the catastrophe happened. No one in any rank of life was safe. They knew cases of men of the finest gifts and unblemished reputation, ministers held in high respect, who yet, because they were moderate drinkers, one day unawares passed the line of safety and went down to ruin. For the sake of all they most valued the only sure way was to be a total abstainer.

Mr. W. B. BOWRING, who was very cordially greeted as the new President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, supported the resolution, and said he was glad to encourage all efforts to put down that most terrible evil. He was himself a total abstainer, though he had not always been so, and he was all the better for it. As a magistrate it had been terrible to him to see the inroads that pernicious habit of drink made on the morality and the humanity of their fellow-citizens. They were told that drink was a legitimate trade. Lawful, no doubt, it was; but he did not think that any trade which created so much misery could be called legitimate. He assured them that the Association he had the honour to represent would do all it could to further the noble object they had at heart.

The resolution was unanimously passed, and the officers and committee were then elected, on the motion of the Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, seconded by Mr. GEORGE JENKS. At the suggestion of Mr. H. G. CHANCELLOR Mr. Bowring's name was added to the list of vice-presidents.

The Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, in moving the resolution, said that every year's experience, every new connection with his fellow-creatures, or change of residence, deepened his sense of the importance of that question. None of them could dare to say that they were teetotallers merely for the sake of example to others, for none of them were safe. The customs of hospitality, which had been lamented since Shakespeare's time, were so penetrating that it was most important to dwell upon that danger. While drink did damage all round there were comparatively few who had a craving for drink and were determined to get it; an enormous number wanted to keep off it, but could not resist when it was offered, and made almost uncivil to decline. It required a little courage to break the custom of the supposed claims of hospitality. He urged them to go far enough in that matter to make themselves uncomfortable; they could all do their part to show that there could be good fellowship without drink.

The Rev. R. W. BOYNTON, who had been for about five years secretary of the American Unitarian Temperance Society, said that the general pressure of American life was having a profound effect on the exercise of temperance. You could not ride a bicycle and be drunk, nor an automobile, and no man known to be a moderate drinker would be allowed to run a locomotive. The drinking men were being steadily weeded out. He described the work of the National Anti-Saloon League, which was started in Ohio, and had great influence over the legislature in the various states, working through the people, who influenced their representatives. There had been a great advance in education also, through the alliance led by the late Frances Willard. Indeed, many teachers felt that the effort had been overdone in the schools, and he had found himself unable to go all the way with Mrs. Mary Hunt in her zealous work. He recalled a stirring message of the late R. A. Armstrong, and said that it was fitting that their week of religious fellowship should close with that outpouring of spiritual and moral earnestness in a great cause.

The Rev. H. HAUGERUD also gave an eloquent address, and called attention to the improvements on the Gothenburg system which they had made in Norway.

Miss H. M. JOHNSON moved, and Mr. F. ADKINS, of the Band of Hope Union, seconded a resolution, which after some little discussion was modified in its last clauses, and finally adopted as follows:—

“That this meeting desires to express its great disappointment at the non-introduction of the Licensing Bill promised in the King's Speech, and respectfully urges that it should be proceeded with without further delay, and, as promised by the Prime Minister, should be a ‘comprehensive measure,’ and that it should include a provision for preventing the sale of intoxicants to young people under eighteen, and for excluding children under the age of fourteen from the common bars of licensed premises.”

NATIONAL CONFERENCE UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

THE first annual meeting of the Union was held in Essex Hall, on Thursday evening, May 23, and was well attended, the numbers indeed necessitating an adjournment from the small room originally allotted to the large hall. The Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, President of the Union, was in the chair. The report of the committee described the work already accomplished, and referred to various projects in hand, among them the preparation of syllabuses for the study of social subjects, the issuing of a lecture list, and the arrangements for a “Summer School” in Oxford in July. The president in moving the adoption of the report, emphasised the fact that the Union was still in process of organisation, and was therefore open to receive, and ready to assimilate any suggestions that would lead to its practical usefulness, and expressed the earnest hope that the Oxford meeting would prove a real help and guidance to those seeking for means of wisely and efficiently serving their generation. The resolution was seconded by the Rev. A. Hall, and supported by Mr. Richard Robinson, Mr. Capleton, Rev. J. C. Street, Rev. F. H. Jones, and Mr. Hecht, of Hampstead, who gave, as an instance of practical outcome from a reading circle for social study at Rosslyn Hill, the formation of a special branch of the Hampstead Health Society to deal with the question of infant mortality. A resolution appointing the officers and committee of the Union was moved by Rev. H. W. Perris and seconded by Rev. John Ellis. The Rev. H. Rawlings moved that it be an instruction to the committee to reprint the address on “Three Requisites for Social Amelioration,” given by Mr. Wicksteed at Oxford during the Triennial Conference last year, which was carried, and the meeting closed with a hearty vote of thanks to him both as President and as Chairman.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

A MEETING of the committee was held in London on Thursday, May 23. The chair was occupied by the President (Rev. Jos. Wood), and twenty-six other members were present. Apologies had been received from eleven members who were unable to attend.

Among other business transacted, the following items will be of interest.

A motion expressing deep regret at the death of the Rev. F. W. Stanley (a member of the committee, and formerly one of the hon. secretaries of the Conference), and sincere sympathy with Mrs. Stanley and her daughter, was adopted, all the members standing.

The Rev. J. H. Weatherall, of Bolton, was unanimously co-opted to fill the vacancy on the committee.

The treasurer presented his accounts, and further contributions from congregations and a District Association were reported. A draft circular was approved to be circulated with the annual statement of accounts.

The visits to churches made by the President, and further arrangements already planned were reported, and Mr. Wood related some of the impressions he had gained. Warm appreciation was expressed by representatives of the districts which had been visited, and the report presented was felt to be so valuable by the Committee that it requested it should be printed. Mr. Wood acceded, and said he thought the visits would be more helpful if he could be accompanied by some well-known and influential layman. At the request of the committee, Mr. John Harrison undertook to join the President in his visits as far as he could.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted:—

“That this meeting of the Committee of the National Conference rejoices in the growing attention which the Peace movement is attracting throughout the civilised world, and earnestly hopes that by the coming meeting of the representatives of the great Powers at the Hague further steps may be taken in arranging for the settlement of disputes by arbitration and in limiting the range and minimising the interests of war. It also trusts that the vital question of the arrest and limitation of armaments may receive due consideration, and that, at least, some preliminary steps may be taken in that direction.”

The Rev. H. D. Roberts introduced a scheme intended to secure more effectual help for poorer ministers and congregations. After some conversation the further consideration of the matter was postponed until the President and Mr. Harrison had extended their visits.

It was agreed that the next meeting of the committee be held at Oxford on Tuesday, October 15, at 11.30 a.m.

THE Beautiful is essentially the Spiritual making itself known sensuously, presenting itself in sensuous concrete existence, but in such a manner that that existence is wholly and entirely permeated by the spiritual, so that the sensuous is not independent, but has its meaning solely and exclusively in the spiritual and through the spiritual, and exhibits not itself, but the spiritual.—Hegel.

IN THE CROW'S NEST.

It is a splendid thing to be a little boy, especially if you have a brother. Before the influenza came and made Four-year-old cough so much, it was simply glorious to romp in the deep snow; to bury each other in it, and make caves in it, and roll and swim in it like a new kind of fish, and then to come home all woolly with frozen whiteness, so that mother laughed and cried to see you, and peeled you in a cold place for fear of your getting wet before your over-clothes were off, and gave you soup. But when you can only take him out with you now and then, under solemn promises that cut off nearly all the fun, it is really rather dull; for not one of the other little boys can speak a word of any comfortable language. Whether you try English or German, they only say "che discht?"

But sometimes there comes a day of days. To wake up at five o'clock and see father by your bed—father! at five in the morning!—to be dressed in a sort of dream and find yourself breakfasting, to be wrapped in all your warmest things and hurried out to the post-office, lifted into a big sledge, off and away,—that is a good beginning. And then, to find father for once so perfectly reasonable!

Four-year-old wants to know if this is going to be a pic-nic; but you are in your seventh year, and have seen the uniforms on the box.

"I think this must be the Chiavenna post," you say.

"You are right, my son."

"Will there be time to ride as far as Silvaplana, before I have to go back to Herr Lehrer?"

"You need not go to Herr Lehrer to-day."

"Oh! Four-year-old, I need not go to Herr Lehrer! We shall have time to see Flock." Four-year-old beams congratulation.

We glance back on the glittering white valley, with Samaden, Ponte and Madulein looking so near, and Munt Baselgia at the end, reigning over all; and now we are winding up through larch-wood into St. Moritz.

"Father, may we go further than Silvaplana? All the way to Maloja?"

Father and mother smile at each other, and father says yes!

We halt, and are off again, and reach that point where suddenly the first stretch of the Inn, with the lakes of Campfer, Silvaplana and Sils, comes into view. In summer it is the loveliest landscape, the friendliest, the most graciously royal that can be dreamed of. Even now, when the lakes are mere white plains, it is hardly less beautiful.

"Father"—very wistfully—"may we go further than Maloja—right down the precipice?"

Father says yes!

At Silvaplana we renew acquaintance with a big dog. He is very haughty, but we forgive him; first, because he is a Dogge, which makes him almost English, and secondly because he is called Flock, like the colley in our house. And now we have crossed the plain to Sils Maria, and are under way again for Maloja.

"Father, may we go as far as Vicosoprano?"

And again father says yes.

Over the rim we plunge, out of the Engadin. Down we wind in twelve marvellous zigzags upon the face of the mountain-wall, from pine-land towards chestnut land. Half-way down we meet a heavy-laden train of freight-sleighs coming up, and it takes some minutes to arrange a passage. We creep along outside, and all the drivers cling to our sledge, to prevent it from taking a short cut to the underworld. And now we are down, and are waving good-bye to the castle on the Maloja crest.

"Oh, father, if we are quite good all the way to Vicosoprano,"—the young voice shakes—"may we go on and on, into Italy?"

And mother says, "Yes, dear, we are going into Italy, and Four-year-old is going to grow well and strong again."

Italy! Two little boys look into each other's soul in silence.

But at Casaccia such a strange thing happens, that two little boys find very voluble tongues. The sledge suddenly rattles over naked stones. "Alles umsteigen!" cries the guard, and two minutes later we are rumbling forward on wheels! After that, what is impossible? Here is a river of real, unfrozen water, laughing along like the Lynn at Water's Meet. Here is a patch of brown grass amid the snow. A shout from Six-year-old announces a marvellous waterfall—not made of ice, but really and truly falling—in a gloomy ravine; it is the Cascata dell'Albigna. Four-year-old describes a chestnut tree, the vedette of a mighty battalion. And now the fields are nearly all brown, with just a few islands of white; and now the snow has retired up the mountain-side. We alight at Vicosoprano.

When we start again, after lunch, we do not put on our heaviest wraps. It is mother who spies the first flower, a lovely white crocus, and we almost upset the coach in crowding to see it; then there are more, the fields are sprinkled with them, and some are violet. Walnut trees appear among the chestnuts. The rocks draw together; we clatter through a narrow passage, sweep round under a ruined castle, and are at Promontogno. And here the trees are actually budding, and cowslips peep through grass that is almost green.

Excitement grows tense; we hardly notice the new trees that meet us—mulberries, father says, and figs—nor even the vineyards, in which women are already busy, for the next village is Castasegna. We rattle into its street, stop a few moments at the post-office, make forward again over the bridge across the Lovere, pull up at the Dogana, alight, and are treading the soil of Italy.

How the sun shines, the Italian sun! How thickly the vineyards cluster about us, as we slip down to Chiavenna! We can no longer keep count of the trees and flowers. Almost at once, before we lose sight of the Dogana, a butterfly wavers across the road.

As we enter the old fortress-town, Six-year-old turns from his window and holds something out to mother.

"Violets! How did you get them?"

"A nice little boy gave them to me. See, there he is, running along beside us."

Father laughs, and fumbles for a ten-centime piece.

Then we change into an electric train, and whirl down the long, narrow plain between the mountains, through ever so many tunnels, past a lake of blue water, over the Adda (where we can see far into the vine-clad Val Tellina), under the frowning ruins of Fuentes, the labour and grave of so many Spaniards, and are at Colico. Lake Como flashes into sight and out again, as we dive through rocky galleries; Dorio is past, and Dervio; here at last is Bellano. We sleep in a room which overlooks the laughing lake, amid palms and almond-blossom.

Two days later the greatest miracle of all happened. The air turned into water, fell glittering and whispering on the trees, roofs and pavement, and made a million dimples on the face of the lake. Rain! We had not seen rain for seven months.

That was all weeks and weeks ago. But even now two little boys can tell you the names of all the steamers on Lake Como, and which of them have a rake to their funnel, where the road-tunnels are between Dervio and Varenna, and which have boy-traps, opening on the water; can describe the Orrido at Bellano, the churches that were so dark and dreadful on Good Friday, and so gay on Easter Sunday, many a village on the strand, the cove where Four-year-old had his picnic, Chiavenna and its Paradise (where father saw the snake, but they only saw lizards, which father said was a parable), and can tell you ever so much more about Italy—though as they crossed the Splügen on the way back, and found three metres of snow on the summit, and on the Swiss side the very telegraph-wires were covered, it all seemed like a sunny dream.

E. W. LUMMIS.

No man, I affirm, will serve his fellow-beings so effectually, so fervently, as he who is not their slave; as he who, casting off every other yoke, subjects himself to the law of duty in his own mind. For this law enjoins a disinterested and generous spirit as man's glory and likeness to his Maker. Individuality, or moral self-subsistence, is the surest foundation of an all-comprehending love. No man so multiplies his bonds with the community as he who watches most jealously over his own perfection. There is a beautiful harmony between the good of the state and the moral freedom and dignity of the individual. Were it not so, were these interests in any case discordant, were an individual ever called to serve his country by acts debasing his own mind, he ought not to waver a moment as to the good which he should prefer. Property, life, he should joyfully surrender to the state. But his soul he must never stain or enslave: From poverty, pain, the rack, the gibbet, he should not recoil; but for no good of others ought he to part with self-control or violate the inward law.—Channing.

THE constructive task which lies before the next century is, if I may say so without presumption, to spiritualise science, as morality and art have already been spiritualised. The vision of God should appear to us as a triple star of truth, beauty, and goodness.—W. R. Inge, 1899.

OUR COMMON WORK.

WE complete this week our report of the Whitsun'ide anniversary meetings, with the exception of two speeches at the public meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which we reserve for special attention next week. As a result, if we ask what are the chief impressions which remain from the crowded week of conference and fellowship, we find two convictions as to our common work most strongly holding us.

The first is of the need, as essential and urgent as ever, of loyalty to the ideal of church fellowship, for the strengthening of the bonds of union, the deepening of the spirit of reverence and of communion with the Unseen, to secure for us all the central peace and the truest inspiration for a faithful life. And the second is that from the church, the home of our faith, we should go out into the world, with a new consecration of purpose, not with professions of faith, but by every means in our power to make the quickening and healing influence of religion more deeply felt. We are to declare, by the simple testimony of a reverent and earnest life, humble yet fearless in witness for the truth and right, and in the spirit of sincere brotherhood, the power of religion, the purpose of God in our human life. We are simply to be true men and women, whatever our place of service may be, and so preach that best of all Gospels, which is life itself; and this we shall do most fully and persuasively, when we know that God is with us, and that it is the FATHER'S will we are to do. We are to preach the Gospel in every place, and in our daily avocations; and beyond this, in many ways, the opportunity does come for testimony to the joy and strength of our religion. In any helpful service of brotherly kindness, in the many activities of our churches and city missions, in public efforts of social reform, or of fellowship in common life, earnest and self-forgetting effort will be preaching the Gospel; and now as a new form of service, in which many may take part, we have the renewed and enlarged opportunity of the Van Mission, of which some account follows this article.

The object of this Mission is distinctly to preach the Gospel. The aim is not theological controversy, but religion. Our men are once more to go out to the people, as they did last summer, to speak frankly of the real things of life, to make the power of an earnest faith truly felt, and if any who come to hear wish to argue, to show them plainly in what light we regard religion as life with God, in the power of CHRIST'S ideal of brotherhood. We have seen a booklet of "Memoranda for Missioners," prepared for their use by the Rev. T. P. SPEDDING, and it is instinct with this spirit. It lays stress on the catholicity of spirit which must characterise the Mission, and on the supreme importance of the devotional element in the meetings. The address, it says, should always emphasise the fact that Unitarian Christianity is a religion of life, full of joy and hope for man.

There are four vans going out this summer, and the Mission should have the strenuous support of our people as a whole. It should help effectually to demonstrate in new fields what our religion really is, and what it can make of men.

THE VAN MISSION.

THE Van Mission opened on Tuesday evening of this week at Bradford, Manchester, and by the time these notes appear operations will have begun at Stamford, and on Monday next the Scotch and Midland vans will be at work. Owing to the Whitsuntide holidays it was arranged that the Mission should open a fortnight later than last year, and the delay has proved a fortunate one in view of the multiplicity of details which required attention. It was found impossible to complete the three new vans within the specified time, and it transpires that varnish dries very slowly in Whit-week! It is a little difficult also to find convenient dates for a team of between sixty and seventy missioners, and to arrange supplies for their respective pulpits on the Sunday of their absence. That, however, has now been satisfactorily accomplished, and, with the exception of two or three weeks, all the vans have their full complement of men. With those who are assisting for odd nights or acting as chairmen, it is likely that a hundred ministers will participate in the work. A number of laymen also have been enrolled, including one gentleman from Ireland, who will travel at his own expense for two or three weeks. Students from both Colleges assist, two or three of them for a month each, and Mr. KISS, from Hungary, and Mr. Kennedy, from New Zealand, will also have practical experience of the work. Several disappointments happened after the apparent completion of arrangements in regard to lay-missioners, but ready helpers have been forthcoming, and the final selections are likely to prove eminently satisfactory.

Mr. Bertram Talbot's efforts last summer contributed so greatly to the success of the Mission that it is a good thing to be able to say that men have been found who are likely to prove efficient colleagues.

Fortunately the Mission has had scarcely anything but well wishers from the first. It has escaped a good deal of criticism, probably because it started out with very few theories. It was conceived as a tiny agency to lend a hand in the practical and everyday salvation of our time. It wasn't designed so much in the interest of a particular "ism," as with the notion that a Church is never the worse for doing a little bit more, and here was a way in which some of its members could help. There may be many more perfect schemes than this, but it does at least afford scope for the earnestness of a hundred men, and the sympathy of a whole community. It will be worth striving for, therefore, that it shall enjoy the suffrages of the whole of that community. So far the only drawback has arisen from the fact that the necessity for the widest possible support has not quite been understood. Several promises are to hand from friends who look forward to helping when the van is "in their district." That seems a fair attitude—loyalty to one's own home and church and district. It prepares for any larger service that may offer, and that one may have grace and strength enough to render. There, indeed, is the implication of our little movement. But it interprets the terms in no narrow spirit. A theological "ism" merely is a poor ideal to strive for! And from the point of view of the Mission geographical limitations are as much to be avoided. Quite unintentionally this district-ism, if it is to prevail, will do harm, because practically no district could efficiently provide for itself in work of this kind. Here the whole country is our parish, and our missioners in every instance leave the decision as to where they shall work to be determined by the van itineraries. It is pointed out also that as the vans will constantly be travelling over new ground a preliminary acquaintance with open-air services will be useful to the missioners, who will be called upon for special service at a later time.

It is interesting to find that about ten of the Unions and Societies are co-operating in the Mission during the coming season. Many valuable suggestions have come from them, and it has been found possible to arrange for visits to nearly all the places which have been especially mentioned. The next important point is that in most of the towns and villages where no church exists to which we can look for assistance, it is pretty certain that Unitarians would be found if we only knew where to look for them. The names of a few of these isolated fellow-believers have been sent in, and it is expected that the missioners will be glad to call upon them. An earnest request is now made for the utmost assistance in this direction. Names should be sent in to the missionary agent, who will forward them to the various centres and, if possible, report afterwards as to whether a visit was paid. A list of places upon each route is

Boston (Fourth) International Congress of Religious Liberals

TO BE HELD IN BOSTON, MASS., U.S.A., SEPTEMBER 22 TO 27, 1907

Purpose: "To open communication with those in all lands who are striving to UNITE PURE RELIGION AND PERFECT LIBERTY, and to increase fellowship and co-operation among them."

Issued as a Supplement of the Christian Register, Universalist Leader, and the Inquirer and Christian Life of London
Also at 25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

The International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers was organized at Boston, U. S. A., on May 25, 1900.

The International Council seeks to bring into closer union for exchange of ideas, mutual service, and the promotion of their common aims, the historic liberal churches, the liberal elements in all churches, the scattered liberal congregations and isolated workers for religious freedom and progress in many lands.

It aims to be a source of encouragement and strength to them in their struggles against dogmatic intolerance and ecclesiastical tyranny.

It cultivates large and fraternal relations with the great liberal movements in religion now going on under various names and auspices throughout the world.

To promote these ends it holds a biennial Congress in some acknowledged seat of religious enlightenment and freedom, the general arrangements for which are intrusted to the liberal bodies and communities which have extended the invitation. Such Congresses have been held in London, Amsterdam, and Geneva, attended by from 500 to 1,000 members, representing 15 nationalities and 24 religious fellowships.

The Executive Committee consists at present of the following persons:—

Prof. G. BOROS, D.D., Kolosvár, Hungary.
Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, London, England.

Prof. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, D.D., Oxford, England.

Rev. SAMUEL A. ELIOT, D.D., Boston, U.S.A.
Prof. B. D. EERDMANS, D.D., Leiden, Holland.

Rev. P. H. HUGENHOLTZ, Jr., Amsterdam, Holland.

Prof. E. MONTET, D.D., Geneva, Switzerland.
Prof. H. OORT, D.D., Leiden, Holland.

Prof. OTTO PFLEIDERER, D.D., Berlin, Germany.

Prof. JEAN RÉVILLE, D.D., Paris, France.
Rev. G. SCHOENHOLZER, Zürich, Switzerland.
Rev. CHARLES W. WENDTE, Boston, U.S.A.

For the years 1905-07 Prof. E. Montet is president and Rev. Charles W. Wendte the general secretary of the Council. The secretary's address is 25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass., U.S.A.

"The more international friendship rises to the sense of human brotherhood, the more it feels how much better is peace than strife and love than hatred, the wider will it extend the range of its benevolent influences."—Ambassador James Bryce.

The Fourth International Congress of Religious Liberals will be held in Boston, the city in which this movement for the federation of religious liberals originated, on Sept. 22 to 27, 1907. It is intended to make this gathering a notable occasion in the annals of religious thought and fellowship.

A cordial invitation is extended to all who are in sympathy with the general purposes of the Congress. No assent to any formal dogma or adhesion to any particular Church is required for membership. All who desire to increase religious enlightenment, freedom, and tolerance, and to make the world better, are cordially invited to participate.

There would seem to be especial fitness in the assembling of the Congress in Boston, the city in which the International Council itself was born, seven years ago, a community prominently identified with religious freedom and social reform, the home of Dr. William Ellery Channing, Ralph Waldo Emerson, and Theodore Parker, Hosea Ballou, John Greenleaf Whittier, and Phillips Brooks.

The spiritual descendants of these and other eminent representatives of liberal Christian faith are numerous and influential in the religious and public life of Boston. Harvard University, Tufts, and other colleges spread the light of science and the humanities among its citizens. Several liberal fellowships—the Unitarians, Universalists, Liberal Friends, the Christian Connection, the Free Religious Association, the Congress of Religion, New York State Conference of Religion, as well as independent, broad-minded men in all the sects—unite in extending this invitation and in welcoming our guests.

An interesting programme is in preparation, including many speakers from foreign lands,—scholars, thinkers, and orators of ability and reputation,—who will deliver addresses on themes of pre-eminent interest to liberal minds. The years which have elapsed since our last, or Geneva, Congress have not only witnessed deplorable exhibitions of reactionary intolerance, but remarkable manifestations also of religious independence and progress, brave and successful resistance to hierarchical pretension and the emancipation of communities and peoples from erroneous dogmas and priestly misrule. These will furnish fruitful themes for the speakers we are to listen to.

ENTERTAINMENT AND HOSPITALITY.

To all delegates from foreign countries who give previous notice, the hospitality of the Boston Committee during the days of the Congress (September 21-27) is freely extended.

All excursions and social gatherings of the Congress (including the banquet) will also be free of cost to delegates from abroad who shall enroll themselves as members, paying the Congress fee of one dollar.

The Hotel Bellevue, 23 Beacon Street, next door to the Unitarian Building, the headquarters of the Congress, is recommended. Meals à la carte.

Close by are Young's and the Parker House, also hotels of the first rank. Meals à la carte. The Hotel Commonwealth (less expensive). Other hotels and lodgings will be recommended, and information given by addressing the Committee at 25 Beacon Street, Boston, Massachusetts, U.S.A.

PROF. DR. H. OORT
President of the Second (Amsterdam) International Congress

It is believed that the influences radiating from this Congress will advance at home and abroad the interests of "pure religion held in the spirit of perfect liberty," encourage and inspire our fellow-workers for religious truth and progress in all lands, and promote that federation of religious liberals throughout the world which is the aim of the Council.

On the last page of this circular will be found an outline of the work and recreation of the Congress, so far as we are able at present to announce it. Later additions to the list of delegates and speakers will be duly made public.

Our committee cherishes the hope that many of those to whom this Bulletin is addressed may be in sympathy with its aims and endeavors, and may be able to participate in the coming Congress in Boston.

Should they come in their private capacity, they will be most welcome. If they come as the delegates of a church or other religious fellowship, they will be still more so. In the latter case we ask them not to fail in bringing some official credential of their appointment.

If they cannot attend in person, they may yet greatly encourage and aid our efforts to federate the religious liberals of this and other countries by enrolling themselves as members of the Boston Congress, and sending us a written expression of their personal sympathy with its purposes, and, if possible, the good will also of the church or association they represent.

Application for membership may be made at any time to the Secretary, Rev. Charles W. Wendte, 25 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass., U.S.A., enclosing the Congress fee of one dollar. Membership entitles one to participation in the Congress and admission to all its meetings, including the reception to delegates. For the banquet and excursions special tickets must be obtained. Towards delegates from foreign countries a large hospitality will be exercised.

It is manifestly too early to know definitely the number and names of the delegates from foreign countries we shall have the privilege of entertaining at the Congress. A journey to America is a more formidable matter than a trip to Amsterdam or Geneva, and requires greater deliberation. But from information already received we may count on a delegation of at least 100 persons from Great Britain. A special fund has been created in that country with which to aid clergymen in the payment of steamship fares. The travel arrangements are in the hands of Thomas Cook & Son, who have issued a booklet giving detailed information respecting the reduced fares secured on various Atlantic steamship lines, dates of sailing, etc.

Among the eminent British speakers whom we may hope to hear at the Boston meetings are Rev. John Hunter, pastor Trinity Congregational Church, Glasgow; Rev. W. C. Bowie, secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; Rev. C. J. Street of Sheffield; Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Rev. V. D. Davis, editor of the Inquirer, London; Rev. A. Webster of Aberdeen.

From Holland will come a strong delegation of modern theologians, including Profs. B. D. Eerdmans and H. J. Groenewegen of the University of Leiden, Prof. Meyboom of the University of Groningen, Rev. F. C. Fleischer, Rev. P. H. Hugenholz, and other representatives of the Dutch Reformed, Baptist, Remonstrant, and other churches.

From Germany we are able to announce the coming of Prof. Otto Pfeiderer of the University of Berlin, Prof. Martin Rade of Marburg University, Rev. Max Fischer of Berlin, and others. Prof. R. Eucken of Jena will send an important paper.

From Switzerland will come Prof. E. Montet, dean of the Theological Faculty of the University of Geneva and president of our International Council, together with Rev. E. Rochat, pastor in Geneva, Rev. G. Schoenholzer of Zürich, and Rev. L. Ragaz, minister at the Cathedral of Basel. We hope also for the presence of Rev. L. Maystre, president of the Synod.

From Florence, Italy, will come the pastor of the French-Italian Evangelical Church, Rev. Tony André.

France sends us Prof. Bonet-Maury of the University of Paris, Prof. Jean Réville of the College of France and editor of the Review of Religious History, Abbé A. Houtin, and we hope also Prof. Paul Sabatier and Rev. Charles Wagner of Paris, author and preacher, whose addresses were an important feature of our third congress in Geneva.

From Hungary we expect to welcome Prof. Dr. G. Boros, head of the Unitarian College at Kolozsvár, Transylvania, and Rev. N. Jozan of Budapest.

From Austria we are to receive a message through Prof. T. G. Masaryk of the University of Prague.

Sweden sends us Prof. F. O. Lindberg of Gotheborg; Denmark, Mr. Theo. Berg of Copenhagen, editor of Lys over Landet. From other European countries and from Australia, India, Japan, we hope to welcome representatives of liberal religious faith.

NOTES.

The final programme with the definite announcements of the appointments of meetings at the different places will be issued about August 1.

A Bulletin will be issued during the summer, containing portraits and biographies of prominent delegates to the Congress and such further announcements as may be needed.

The speakers, invited guests, and delegates from Europe and Asia will be entertained in Boston. American delegates will follow the usual custom of the meeting of the National Conference which precedes the meeting of the Council. The usual announcements in regard to transportation, hotels, etc., will be issued very soon.

Fees for membership in the Congress at $1 are payable to the secretary, Rev. C. W. Wendte, 25 Beacon Street, Boston. Subscriptions for the hospitality fund and for the expenses of the Congress can be sent to the treasurer of the executive committee, George Wigglesworth, Esq., 53 State Street, Boston.

The Department Meetings announced in the provisional programme will give opportunity for members of the Congress interested in special topics to meet for conference and debate. These meetings will be held in churches and halls close to headquarters on Tuesday and Wednesday afternoons. The departments will include the following: Church Extension Work, Pastors and Churches, Religious Press and Periodicals, Religious Art and Music, History and Memorials, Education of the Young, Women's Work, Public and Social Service, and the Training of Liberal Ministers. The Department of History will hold its session at Plymouth, the Department of Religious Art and Music at Fairhaven, in connection with the excursions to those places.

Excursions planned by the committee will permit of visits to Cambridge, Concord, Plymouth, and Fairhaven and of drives or walks to the places of historic interest or of beautiful outlook in and about Boston. No excursions to more distant parts of the country will be arranged, but it is understood that a number of delegates propose to visit New York, Philadelphia, and Washington during the week after the Congress. The delegates of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Messrs. Bowie, Street, and Tarrant, are to hold meetings in the Unitarian churches of Canada during the weeks of September just preceding the Conference.

appended, and although changes are possible, the programme will very likely be followed through.

One of the best features of last season's work was the readiness of churches and schools all along the route to lend a hand. Not one failed us. The choirs were in attendance with anthems and solos, the ministers took the chair, sometimes active workers spoke, or spontaneously gathered in the free-will offerings, and did all in their power to make the meetings a success. There are signs of a similar willingness during the next few weeks, and high hopes are entertained that the missionaries will have the pleasure of welcoming crowds of Unitarians to the vans and the meetings.

The Mission at Bradford (Manchester) began a day late on Tuesday. The van arrived about tea-time, and took up a position in front of the Mill-street School, where such a splendid piece of work is being done by Rev. W. E. Attack and his friends. The district is one of the poorest in Manchester, and the air in the whole neighbourhood is vitiated by the great chemical works, beyond the vacant land on which the van stood close by the uninviting yard of a marine store dealer. The night, unfortunately, was bitterly cold, and so, while many people came up to the meeting, few of them remained for any length of time, and it was seldom that the adult attendance exceeded 50, though it was scarcely ever much below that number. Mr. Attack presided, and the missionary, Rev. A. Cobden Smith, of Lower Mosley-street, delivered a really admirable address. Mr. Spedding also took part, and Mr. Whittaker presided at the harmonium. The arrangements were in charge of Mr. Arthur Barnes, the lay missionary, one of the teachers at the Stockport School, and Mr. Bertram Talbot was present for the one night prior to his departure for Stamford to take over the duties of the London van. It was a modest beginning, but the meeting had results. The Bradford friends suggested that the van should perambulate the streets before the next night's meeting. A call was accordingly made upon a dealer in the neighbourhood who had horses to hire and who had been seen at the meeting. He promised to provide a horse, and to supply one to take the van to Ashton on Thursday. "How about terms?" came from one of the missionaries. "Oh, I won't charge anything." "Why, are you a Unitarian?" "No, but I believe in the work they are doing over there," pointing to the school, "and I drop in occasionally."

The following places are likely to be visited during the season:—

No. 1 Van.—Bradford (Manchester), Ashton, Mossley, Greenfield, Delph, Huddersfield, Mirfield, Thornhill, Ossett, Normanton, Castleford, Pontefract, Doncaster, Bawtry, Retford, Worksop, Shirebrook, Bolsover, Dronfield, Beauchief, Sheffield (Heeley, Tinsley), Masbro', Mexbro', Darfield, Barnsley, Silkstone, Penistone, Hadfield, Mottram, &c.

THE June Quiver appears in festive garb, to celebrate the issue of its five hundredth monthly number. As a weekly sheet it had been appearing some time longer. Former editors tell of their happy connection with the magazine and with the house of Cassell. There is also the last story written by Ian Maclaren, and a touching little sketch by Allen Raine, with a portrait of her, and a picture of her Cardiganshire home.

THE Second Church at Brooklyn already contains a memorial of Samuel Longfellow, who ministered there for some years. Now a beautiful bronze tablet has been erected near the pulpit, to the memory of its late minister, with the following inscription by his life-long friend, William Channing Gannett:—

JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

OCTOBER 19, 1840—DECEMBER 11, 1904.
MINISTER OF THIS CHURCH FOR FORTY YEARS. 1864-1904.

A tireless seeker for truth.
A revealer of the best in literature.
A joyful interpreter of the Immanence of God in Nature and Soul.
A prophet of the faith of Evolution.
A fearless preacher of Freedom, Fellowship, Character, and Service as the essentials in Religion.

A poet of the life that is and that is to be.

A tender friend in the gladness and sorrow of our homes.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

PUBLIC MEETING.

THE public meeting of the Association was held in Essex Hall, on Tuesday evening in Whit week, which was left free this year by the omission of the Essex Hall Lecture.

MR. GROSVENOR TALBOT, President, took the chair at 7.30, and in his opening address referred to the changes of religious thought, which had been great during the past hundred years, and would give them in the future a truer faith, a greater belief in God, a purer idea of Christ, and of the essentials he had brought to them, and a truer reverence. As to the "New Theology," he did not think it differed much from their Unitarianism, except perhaps that it was slightly more mystical and more difficult to understand. If its advocates thought it best and in the interests of Christianity, he hoped they would stay in the churches where they were and do their work there. But if they came over to them freely and willingly, they would welcome them as they welcomed any who came searching after the truth. It was said there was a need for a revival of religion. Revival services were spasmodic and passed away. They had seen it in the case of the Salvation Army, which began with great excitements, but now were coming on to practical Christianity, doing all they could to help their fellow-creatures, with very little show of the emotions outside, and the Army had become a vital force in the country. There was indeed need for the renewal of religion in their midst, and of clearer moral discernment. Much had been done, and the members of their churches, their philanthropists, had taken a large part in combating certain forms of immorality. For years they had had societies for the suppression of cruelty both to animals and to children, and there had been a noble work done in the matter of drink. They wanted the whole tone of morality to be raised, and a strenuous effort against the evils of gambling, which was undermining the manhood and womanhood of the country. They, as Unitarians, had in the past cleared the way for the broadening of knowledge, now they should lead the van, to bring home to the country the necessity of a purer morality, a higher idea of good. If only they could establish that purer ideal they would have done more than the Unitarian body had ever done in the past, and would help to make England a Christian country, not merely in name, but in reality, so that the people might follow Christ, might believe in him, and show their faith by their lives. That, he trusted, would be the future course of Unitarianism.

GREETINGS FROM THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE Rev. R. W. BOYNTON (St. Paul, Minn.) said it was his great privilege to bring to them greetings from the American Unitarian Association, and he could assure them they were greetings from the heart. He also brought by special commission the personal greetings of the President of the Association, Dr. Samuel Eliot. They were the greetings of friends and fellow-workers. In spite of the stories he had heard of Americans in London, he was persuaded Americans were like Englishmen, and Englishmen were like Americans. There had constantly been in his mind since his landing the felicitous and beautiful words of Hawthorne: "Our old home." His ancestors left England in 1638, and on Sunday last he attended service in a church near Manchester, and he was told by the gentleman who showed him round afterwards that the founders of that church left the parish church in consequence of the Act of Uniformity in the year 1662. He was proud he could also say he was a citizen of no mean city, and could point to the fact that the church in Dorchester, Mass., in which he grew up was formed in 1629, and had maintained a continuous existence since 1630. He came bearing a commission to ask them to visit their new home. They in America gloried in the ministers that had been sent them from England, and in the temporary presence among them of Mr. Wood and Mr. Freeston. There was a large amount of preparation going on in Boston for the great meeting which was to be held in September, and they were ready to extend a most royal welcome to their friends from England. He did not bring greetings merely in the tone of superficial optimism, but he hailed them as the Lord's army in England from the Lord's army in the United States; they were engaged in the same fight. And not only from the great body of Unitarians, but from the far greater body of Unitarians in liberal sentiment, he hailed them as fellow-workers, and called down in reverence and trust God's blessing on their work.

GREETINGS FROM THE DUTCH PROTESTANTENBOND.

PROFESSOR EERDMANS said he was commissioned by the Dutch Union of Liberal Protestants to present to them the cordial greetings from their fellow-workers in Holland. Ever since the successful International Meetings in London in 1901 they had felt that there was power in international friendship. They in Holland had not forgotten that the success of the International Congress at Amsterdam in 1903 was largely due to the prominent part English Unitarians took in those meetings. It was a pleasure to meet their delegates at several of the annual meetings of the Protestantentbond. They in Holland read the weekly publications of the English Unitarians, and had often been encouraged by the words of their eminent leaders. He brought not only the cordial, but also the joyful greetings of many friends, for there was reason for liberal thinkers in both countries to rejoice. Religious liberals very often supposed themselves to be only a small minority, but the present position showed that on both sides of the North Sea the number of liberal-thinking people largely exceeded the number of people who dared to admit their Unitarianism. Some months ago he heard a sermon preached in Westminster Abbey which they would not have been surprised to hear in a Unitarian congregation. If all congenial spirits would only set themselves free from their present ties for only one day it would show that liberal religion was the religion of a majority and not of a minority. They did not belong to a denomination in order to work for the glory of their own party, but they belonged to it for the sake of promoting certain religious opinions, and, above all, in order to deepen their religious life. And they could only rejoice if they saw the principles which were dear to them held by others who arrived at them by various ways, and who liked to use different names. It encouraged Unitarians and made them more conscious that they possessed, at any rate, a part of the eternal truth.

THE UNITARIAN MOVEMENT IN NEW ZEALAND.

MISS MARY E. RICHMOND (Wellington) said she was there as a delegate from the Unitarians of New Zealand, and, although sixteen thousand miles of sea separated New Zealand from the mother country, yet she personally claimed a special bond of sympathy with London and Londoners, for both her parents were born within sound of Bow Bells. She was not there as a newly made convert to the great cause of truth and freedom. Her grandfather, Mr. Christopher Richmond, was a London barrister, and became early in his career a convinced Unitarian. He was professionally connected with the Union of Unsubscribing Churches, and her father used to tell them that one of his earliest recollections was of seeing her grandfather ready dressed to wait upon the Duke of Wellington with the draft copy of the repeal of the Test and Corporation Act in his hand. But although she grew up in an atmosphere of religious liberty she did not realise the need or use of Unitarianism as a separate profession of faith until she visited England some ten years ago, and had the privilege of attending the small and ancient Unitarian chapel at Crewkerne, Somerset. It was quite a small congregation, chiefly composed of working-people, and there she understood for the first time the power and value of the Gospel they proclaimed. Absolute sincerity, the fearless but reverent pursuit of truth, conferred a patent of nobility upon the humblest. Intellect was sustained and elevated, the will set free from the bondage of custom and mean fear, and the emancipated affections flowed out upon practical life. Those things she witnessed in action, and seeing, understood the wonderful work modern Unitarianism had in hand. Turning to the Unitarian movement in New Zealand, she said that the first Unitarian church was founded in Auckland some years ago owing to the extraordinary energy, industry, and practical organising power of Mr. Jellie, the minister sent out by that Association. They built themselves a stone church; they had a fine organ, and, financially, she believed were in an excellent position. The Auckland Council had appointed her to represent them at that meeting, and on their behalf she begged their English friends to accept a very hearty greeting from the other side of the world. They in Wellington felt that their friends in Auckland had set them an inspiring example; they were the pioneers, and she noted especially the leading part Mr. Jellie was taking in the literary endeavours of the city. The citizens had formed a large and active Shakespeare Club, of which Mr. Jellie was president, and she had no doubt that was but one of many activities in which Mr. and Mrs. Jellie took part.

At Wellington, before Mr. Hargrove's visit, they had a small meeting of 30 or 40 people, and formed a branch of that Association. She had herself been doubtful, with others, as to such a step, as a mere emphasising of the lines of division in the world of religion; and one gentleman had urged that their needs as liberals were already supplied by preachers in the city. Then one of the women present rose and said very quietly, "There is only one question for us—Are we Unitarians or not? If we are, then an Association should be formed." And it was formed. They had been deeply grateful for Mr. Hargrove's visit, and since the arrival of Dr. and Mrs. Tudor Jones a new era had set in. A thorough modern philosophical training, and a genius for exposition, added to and illumined by Celtic fire and enthusiasm, formed an unusual and striking combination in Dr. Tudor Jones, and in consequence the movement so far had met with an unexpected success. But they felt they were still in extreme infancy, and hardly knew what they were yet, till the sifting and solidifying work of time had tried and tested them. There was no place for boasting; they looked back with grateful hearts on what had been done for them in the past, and forward to the future, to what they must do themselves, with humility indeed, as became them, yet with courage and unextinguishable hope, because they believed that all the great spiritual forces of the world were on their side.

As to the general condition of religious life in New Zealand she noted three points: (1) There was no established national Church; (2) they had for many years had a national, secular, free and compulsory system of education; (3) they had an industrial democracy, with manhood and womanhood suffrage, and the will of the people took effect more immediately and directly on the legislature than in this country. Their labour laws were supposed to be the most advanced in the world, and were much admired by all visitors. It was possible with them to grow up in complete ignorance of the Bible. They had already brought up one generation without any Bible teaching, but happily the personelle of their teachers, who gave examples of a noble, unselfish, strenuous life, went far to mitigate the result of the lack of religious teaching. Yet the want of reverence was everywhere felt, want of reverence for the past of history, for the old age of individuals, and for the still small voice of conscience. That meant blindness to those great moral and spiritual beacons which were the very light of all their seeing. Unitarians had always been educators, and in their Sunday schools she could not help feeling they had the work which was going to change the world. She had seen the Crewkerne Sunday school in session; it was being taught with a zeal, courage, and fidelity most inspiring to witness, and she took it as a type of what was being done elsewhere, and was filled with hope. Every vital reform must begin at the beginning; if they purified the spring at the sources the stream of national life would run crystal clear. It did not matter if many of their chapels were poor and small, so long as their Sunday-schools were full. That power Unitarians seemed to possess over the young led her to believe there was a great future open to the movement in the Colonies, but they would have to work hard for it. At Wellington their need at present was for a church, and they hoped soon by energy and persistence to obtain it. Their hope was in the children. They had already a Sunday school of between 50 and 60 intelligent children, capable of being filled with enthusiasm for the cause, ready to receive through the teaching of experience the fruitful truth that only through corporate action was the fullest personal life possible. They could not explain to children the mysterious fact that only in a social order was it possible to develop the highest character; that personal worth and content grew with personal service and devotion to social ideals. But by placing them in the right kind of society, by inculcating from their earliest days self control and self reverence, duty to the community, and to the individual, they would unfold in a balanced order of development, full of harmony and beauty, and when the day came for the full self knowledge of the mature man or woman such an education did indeed "lead life to sovereign power."

I believe, said Miss Richmond, in conclusion, a great future opens before Unitarianism in the Colonies; a free religion fits a free people. That is why I think this Association has done well to remember us, and send missionaries amongst us. That is why I should like to see Unitarian churches founded in the four principal cities of New Zealand, and founded soon. That is why I should like to see the chief effort concentrated on the children, because from amongst them will come our future rulers; and unless we can fill those destined to govern us with a living faith in God and in goodness, we shall have corruption everywhere. Every man in sober earnest will have his price. I do not mean that there will not remain a remnant in Israel who have never bowed the knee to Baal, what I mean is that these fastidious persons will be driven out of public life. This has happened to a large extent in America,* it will happen with us, and soon—very soon. The problem in America is so vast and complex, it is impossible to foresee immediate results; the British nation can only look on and wonder at the Titanic scale of the struggle, and have faith in the ultimate triumph of right against might. But with us, we are small and young, and we belong to you; there are not quite a million of people in the whole country. If we could fill these open ears with the words of truth—if we could show these keen eyes the vision of the city of God, a city not made with hands, but founded on the spiritual rock of honesty and labour and love—if we could do this—then surely, when our time comes, we may depart in peace, secure in the conviction that when politics and religion are one, the Kingdom will be come upon earth.

I thank you in the name of the Unitarians of New Zealand for all you have done for us. We are not ungrateful.

Other constellations burn above us,

Wonderful new stars arise and shine;
Yet our hearts beat true to those who love us,

Though we watch the heavens across the line.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE'S address on "The Relation of Unitarians to the Churches," we must keep to print in full next week, and also the Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND'S address on "Religious Atmosphere."

The Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS had for his subject, "The Appeal of the Man in the Street." The man in the street, he said, was indifferent to the chapels and churches and what was going on in them. He foresaw the time was coming when the great multitudes in our large towns would almost entirely pass by church and chapel, and leave them out of their calculations. That was what they had to face, and that was his trouble, because the man in the street that he was thinking of was not really irreligious; he was not merely indifferent; he certainly was not bigoted; he did not beat his wife; he was not a drunkard, and he was not in that sense of the word a scamp. The man in the street of to-day was a very good fellow, he was a very thoughtful, quick-witted man. During the last few years a great many things had tended to give us an entirely new man in the street. He had a vote, had had it for some time. The son of the man in the street had a father who had a vote, and that made him think, gave him a feeling of freedom. He was a trades unionist of the good sort. The trades unionist of to-day was one of the sharpest men in the community, and in many ways the man in the street was the man who was best worth reckoning with in relation to what was going on in the country. He believed the man in the street was the man who was going to take possession of the nation; he was going to be the governing power, and he (the speaker) was not sorry for it. He believed in the man in the street, but he was very sorry he was in the street all the time, and never in the chapel. It was not only Unitarians that were suffering in this matter, but the churches of all denominations all over the country, and that was what they had to face. The man in the street was a silent challenge. What they had to do was to go out to the people and meet them on their own ground, and on that account he rejoiced that the vans were going out. And he told of a project he had of taking one of the largest theatres in London for Sunday evenings, in the neglected neighbourhood of St. Pancras. The churches were few and ill-attended, and there were next to no chapels. The people there wanted the Unitarians, and the Humanitarians, and he believed they could help them.

The Rev. CHARLES PEACH (Manchester) gave the last address, on "Religion and the Thought and Life of the Worker." It was all very well, he said, to go to the man in the street and say, "I will prove to you that God is love by my love for you." Mr. Hopps' man in the street asked him to do something more; he asked him not to be a perpetual camp-follower, repairing the defects of society, patching up the waste in our social life. He said, "Prove God to me by His world and by the possibility of a social order where a noble life can be lived." The labour movement, the movement of thought and feeling among the working classes of to-day, was a movement of aspiration and a protest. It was an aspiration after a higher life, and a protest against the present low ideals of life, an indignant protest against the things that we were content to honour, and the ways in which we were content to honour man. It was a movement which was making for peace, for international peace. What that movement was making for was the essential central thought of our religion, first the brotherhood of man, and secondly that the man's life was not in his possessions, that there was something higher and better and nobler than man's possessions, and that was to be found in the sense of comradeship amongst men and also in their capacity to enter into and enjoy the simple and beautiful and natural things of the world. The great demand of the labour movement to-day was that we should realise that the community as a whole had one organic life, and that it did not matter what was the service to which one might be called; it was the way in which he served and not the position in which he found himself, that should be the standard of our esteem and honour. It was not a low ideal that was pulsating through the labour movement; it was the revolt from low ideals; it was the revolt from things that they were not satisfied with. They felt the horrible shame of the situation that set man and man in competition the one with the other, and made a man feel that too often his gain and his good were at the cost of another's tears and sorrow. The real labour movement was not a mere desire to increase wages or shorten hours, and any man who said or thought that knew absolutely nothing of it. The labour movement was a great protest on behalf of two truths which were vital to Unitarians, the truth of their brotherhood, and that the dearest thing in life was brotherhood and comradeship. This was God's world, and therefore if the order was wrong it was our fault, and it was our work to try and set it right.

THE ASSOCIATION CONFERENCE.

THE NEW THEOLOGY.

THE REV. J. H. WEATHERALL'S PAPER.

THE Conference of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was held on Thursday morning in Whit-week. A service of devotion was conducted by the Rev. Alfred Hall, of Norwich, and at half-past ten the chair was taken by the President, Mr. GROSVENOR TALBOT.

The Rev. J. H. WEATHERALL, of Bolton, read the first paper on "The New Theology," and selected three points to be dealt with—(i.) Mr. Campbell's method; (ii.) the good side of his results; (iii.) their bad side.

(i.) The method was that of free inquiry, and construction thereupon, as opposed to the mere exposition of an external authority. And a passage from Chapter XI. of Mr. Campbell's book was quoted, including these sentences: "The true seat of authority is within, not without, the human soul. We are so constituted as to be able to recognise, little by little, the truth of God as it comes to us. . . . Why should we be afraid of trusting the human soul to recognise and respond to its own truth? All truth is one, and all earnest truth-seekers are converging upon one goal." Thus, said Mr. Weatherall, they had that common basis of agreement with the New Theology, that history, reason, and experience were accepted as chief and sufficient guides in the journey towards truth, and they need not part company with Mr. Campbell at the very beginning, as they were obliged to part with the Roman or Anglican Catholics, or the Evangelicals, who could not long talk to them without claiming their allegiance to an external standard, in which, they were assured, and in which alone, the only truth which mattered for the world had been for ever revealed.

(ii.) It was highly significant that the results of Mr. Campbell's free inquiry were distinctly a Theism, and a Christian Theism. It fortified one's own results to find much the same elements at the end of an independent thinker's inquiries. Mr. Campbell's theology postulated a reality both for God and man, and interpreted the drama of existence in terms which involved the activity of both. It took thought not only for the life that now is, but the life to come, and found on moral and spiritual grounds the conditions by which life rose from lower to higher, from less to more, and the human reached out to and attained the divine. Righteousness, holiness, sin, moral responsibility, salvation, judgment, the indwelling of the divine within the human; the function of sacrifice; the solidarity of the race; those so familiar terms all re-appeared as fundamentals in that newest attempt to interpret the mystery of existence in relation to human life. The contents of those ideas were, indeed, developed on unconventional lines, but the categories of theology remained constant. The map of theology received no new territories, but the colouring was different. And it was a Christian Theism they had in Mr. Campbell's results. In the New Theology Jesus Christ received a unique place as revealer of the nature of God. Mr. Campbell recognised the principle of the continuity of historical tradition, and the values introduced into the world's consciousness by the rise and development of Christianity. His example might serve to remind them of the truth to which Dr. Martineau once recalled them: "A religion that declines to be united with the past will hardly avail to combine men in the present; in ceasing to be historical, it loses its best hope of becoming social."

(iii.) The idea singled out by Mr. Campbell as the master-motive of the New Theology was the Immanence of God. In the light of that principle he was scornful of the popular theology; only in so far as it accorded with that idea did he accept anything from the Christian tradition; because of their apparent accord with that doctrine he was hospitable to the conceptions of physical science. The idea of immanence was, of course, nothing new, but it was only lately that theology had been open to any far-reaching acceptance of it. In 1876 Dr. Martineau, referring to the conceptual changes necessitated by the developments of scientific theory, spoke of the need of emending current theology, and affirmed that among Unitarians, for the most part, the emendation had long been made. Among them he said, "God is conceived, not as 'First Cause' prefixed to the scheme of things, but as Indwelling Cause pervading it, not excluded by 'Secondary Causes,' but coinciding with while transcending them; as the One ever-living Objective Agency, the modes of which must be classified and interpreted by science in the outer field, by conscience in the inner." The change he noted as due to the lessened prominence of mechanical ideas, and the advance of physiology to a dominant position, substituting "the thought of life working from within for that of transitive impulse starting from without."

But it is one thing to grant the value of and a necessity for the idea of immanence in a theistic interpretation of the universe (from this point we give Mr. Weatherall's paper verbatim); it is another thing to make it the single formula to unlock the mysteries of time, space, and Personality. That in God we live and move and have our being is a statement of daily Christian confession, but the immanence it involves does not exclude the personality of created minds. Now, the obvious criticism of Mr. Campbell's application of his immanence formula is that in any sense worth mentioning Personality disappears, from which a multitude of evils follows.

Here we proceed from abstraction to abstraction; but one must try to give a reason for this criticism. Mr. Campbell, it so happens, is a disciple in a philosophical school which takes the fact of consciousness as the basis of reality. This is what Mr. Campbell means when he tells you (and you wondered what he meant), "I can think of existence only in terms of consciousness; nothing exists except in and for the mind." "The universe is God's thought about Himself"; and so on. You may recall the consequences to which the vigorous and rigorous application of this principle leads, and how the recent psychology of the subconscious mind is worked into the service (it really points the opposite way; the subconscious mind is not the deeper, but only the flabbier mind), and how at length the larger self of John Smith is defined as "a perfect and eternal being integral to the being of God."

Thus, by the use of the conception of the supreme reality of consciousness, Mr. Campbell is able to reach his doctrine of the identity of God and Man. From this error flows all the individual peculiarities of Mr. Campbell's theistic construction—the peculiarities, for instance, that would prevent his book from being looked on as an exposition of Unitarianism. Existence being reduced to a form of thinking, the selfhood of man and of God disappears; free will is reduced to an illusion; moral responsibility is wiped out; sin is only the absence of more abundant life—a blunder, not a crime; and individual immortality, in any intelligible sense, is impossible.

The difficulty which the ordinary reader, unused to philosophical terms, feels in the attempt to translate these individual peculiarities into working thoughts is a real difficulty, and neither the school from which Mr. Campbell derived it nor Mr. Campbell himself can state the doctrine in a form which is free from obscurity and ambiguity. The school itself has but a small following; its failure to commend itself to other thinkers qualified to test it is perhaps a hint of the destiny that waits its translators into the theological gnosticism of the New Theology.

Personality is wider than consciousness, and the reduction of Personality to any one manifestation of it necessarily leads to error. Mr. Campbell tries to get rid of the ordinary trichotomy—Reason, Feeling, and Willing; but he is obliged to differentiate the unity he has taken such pains to secure, in his acceptance of the division body, soul, and spirit. It is not the only case where he gets in by the back door from what he has previously thrown out of the window. (Another case is where, after overleaping logic to allow some free will, he withdraws it in the words, "Whatever our moral freedom may be, it must consist with the all-directing universal will.") But consciousness by itself is not willing, and it is not feeling; and it is because the contents of religion so largely pass beyond knowing into these other regions that they require terms for their interpretation which the category of consciousness cannot supply. No juggling with the conception of consciousness will justify the translation of the conceptions of higher and lower, of more or less, of deeper and surface life, into moral terms; no self-limitations of the infinite could ever represent themselves as manifestations of ethical or emotional realities like righteousness and love.

Mr. Campbell's own native ethical passion is sufficient to secure for himself a religion; and in everything he speaks or writes it enables him to produce a strong religious impression. It is for this reason that the New Theology has made a deep mark upon his public. It is manifest that he supposes his intellectual constructions supply him with the ethics he enforces so vigorously; and he is not conscious how his evisceration of Personality, his reduction of moral responsibility to a shadow, his Emersonian doctrine of sin, must cut the nerves of moral endeavour in those where affections are not pre-engaged on the side of the angels. We, like him, realise the urgency of the intellectual demand for unification; and for theology we envy the success of the scientists in resolving the myriad phenomena of the universe into manifestations of an inherent unity. But the reduction of all existence to a drama of consciousness is not a procedure which commends itself to us; nor, in spite of Mr. Campbell's disclaimer, can we differentiate his results from Pantheism. And on such a basis the very essentials of religious life must disappear in fact, if not in form. The consciousness of sin, the possibility of choosing the better way and leaving the worse, the thirst for a living God who is not simply an extension of our own finiteness, but an objective Personal Reality by whom, indeed, we live and move and have our being, but yet from whom, through moral transgression, we may be at times remote as well as near—these demand a justification which, from the first to the last page of "The New Theology," we seek to find, but ever seek in vain.

Mr. Weatherall's paper was followed by another, on "The Situation," by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, which appeared in last week's INQUIRER.

THE DISCUSSION.

The Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS, who opened the discussion, said that the two most thoughtful papers to which they had listened would be extremely useful. Yet he was sorry that the New Theology was so much associated with Mr. Campbell's name. It was only the enterprise of certain newspapers that had made the popular commotion. A little more attention should go to the fact that before the New Theology was in the City Temple it was in Westminster Abbey, and had been preached and printed by Archdeacon Wilberforce for years, and before that in Little Portland-street Chapel by Dr. Martineau. The other day it was called the New Thought, now the New Theology. One word expressed it, and that was Evolution. There was a splendid truth in that idea, now so much emphasised, that the Universe was a manifestation of God, that all the life in the Universe was produced by what one might dare to call the heart-throbs of the Everlasting Father. But when they said that, beautiful and true as it was, they were at once landed in tremendous troubles. For many manifestations of the universe were ugly, so ugly that some had difficulty in saving their religion when they tried to be true to facts. This he illustrated by describing a wonderful little maggot, with its "devil head" ingeniously glued on to a lovely rosebud, ready to devour it when the time came. It was a symbol, he said, of what was going on in London and America, wherever there were sweaters and millionaires. The old theology had professed to know too much about God; the new theology spoke of religion as the soul's response to the universe. To that he agreed, and laid emphasis on the truth that all sin was selfishness. They had to learn to work in harmony with the flow of life in the universe. That was religion, and the contrary was selfishness.

The Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED said he had a strong impression that the moving spirit, the driving force in Mr. Campbell's work was not theological, speculative, or philosophical; it arose from social and ethical passion of an extreme sincerity. He was intensely conscious of Dives and Lazarus; and the question of supreme interest was, What next? They had all at one time or another wakened to that contrast. It inspired them with a sense of something of supreme significance not to be acquiesced in. Mr. Campbell had got hold of the star. The question was, could he hitch his wagon to it? There was nothing new in his experience, but would anything new come of it? The immediate reaction was to say, "what the churches stand for is sympathy and brotherhood. The theology taught by the churches is absolutely irrelevant." Then came the real point, What next? As to the progress of thought, they could not escape historical continuity. It did not require looking after. What they were most in earnest about was continuity of labours. There were two great thoughts at the root of the matter, the sense of the unity of the universe, and the sense of personality. Those were the two ruling motives, and there were no others. Every great man who had stirred the world was religious with those two things in vivid consciousness. Aquinas and Augustine were as pantheistic as any, but theistic as well. Their friend Herbert Rix, who for years had been trying on metaphysical lines to get at some harmony between the two, said to him a few hours before his death, "Man must always be dualistic. Monism is for God." Mr. Campbell was pantheistic and monistic in his theory, but he was theistic and dualistic when he felt the stirring of the social passion and wanted to fight with all his might against the evil. The great experiences of life were being constantly renewed. Man was stirred to his very depths by two passions, the sense of unity, which justified and glorified the whole of life, and the love of justice, which made him fight to the death against things which his philosophy of religion declared to be a revelation of God.

The Rev. C. A. GREAVES agreed with Mr. Hopps's plea for more reticence. Even for the maggot on the rose there might be something to be said. Hereafter from a higher standpoint we should understand more of the mysteries of life.

The Rev. A. A. CHARLESWORTH thought the two papers had taken that movement much less seriously than it deserved from the intellectual point of view. Mr. Campbell's philosophy was not his own particular production, and had as its exponents some of the finest and profoundest minds of modern times. After Aristotle there was no mind with a profounder grasp of reality than the mind of Hegel, and in England to-day he held that the profoundest tendency of thought had its origin and inspiration in Hegel. That was true also of America, where no thinker was more illuminating than Royce. He was himself in sympathy with the point of view of Mr. Campbell. Those who took a position contrary to that of Hegel, Caird, and Haldane did not give them an alternative, and gave them no help to solve that most difficult of all problems, of the one and the many.

Mr. A. G. PEASTON, said that as rational beings they must rest in dualism. The human mind could not grasp the absolute.

The Rev. C. HARGROVE added a word as to the nature of freedom of speech in religion, which was something more than freedom of thought.

The Rev. H. RAWLINGS for the consolation of those who were not expert philosophers quoted Mr. Bradley's definition, who said that philosophy was the finding of bad reasons for what you believe an instinct; but the finding of those bad reasons was also an instinct. What they had to do was to make a choice between the instincts, and lay the chief stress upon those deeper instincts for which they tried to find reasons. They would not, as Mr. Wicksteed had so powerfully shown, get a perfect systematisation of instincts. The difficulty was to keep a balance between them. In their congregations there were those who always dwelt on the pantheistic instinct, which led to quietism; but, on the other hand, there were those whose only interest was in the more definite, and, as they said, the practical questions of life. The great problem was to harmonise the regard for those two deep instincts; but they ought not to let the difficulty trouble them over much.

The PRESIDENT in bringing the conference to a close humorously declined the task of summing up the discussion, and expressed their warm thanks to the two readers of the papers.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union was held at Essex Hall on Thursday afternoon in Whit week.

Mrs. W. BLAKE ODGERS presided, and in her opening address spoke of Postal Mission workers as ministers to a scattered flock, who were constantly cheered by letters from those to whom they ministered and made to feel that it was a very real help they were giving to hungry souls. The quiet work done by the mission at many centres was helping wonderfully to spread far and wide the simple faith they held so dear.

Miss FLORENCE HILL, the hon. secretary, read passages from the report, which had been printed and circulated. It recorded a large amount of work done, both by the Central Postal Mission and fifteen other missions, including Bombay and Melbourne, affiliated to the central society, and told of the progress of the Suffolk Village Mission at Bedford. There was also a report of the work in Denmark and Holland.

Miss ETHEL LAKE presented the accounts, which showed £30 4s. 2d. transferred from the general fund to the Suffolk Village Mission account. That brought the total of the general expenditure up to £121 3s. 7d. and there was a balance of £12 16s. 5d. in hand. Annual subscriptions amounted to £117 7s. 6d.; subscriptions to the Village Mission Fund amounted to £56 3s. 6d.; donations to £21 1s. 9d.; grants from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for Bedford and Framlingham, £40; expenditure £157 1s.

The adoption of the report and accounts was moved by Mrs. JOHN LEWIS, of Pontypridd, and seconded by Miss CLARA LUCAS, who congratulated the society on its achievements, and especially because it was a women's ministry, embracing a church of some 2,000 souls, and, as the correspondence showed, a universal and cosmopolitan church. It had also this advantage over other ministries, that all the members were interested.

Miss TAGART, the president, said that year after year they had the same things to say, but with an ever-widening sphere and a growing interest. When they found that they were giving help and comfort to human beings, they felt it to be invaluable work of which they could not grow tired. She referred with special satisfaction to the Postal Mission work Mr. Shinde and Mr. Sukhtankar were doing in India, and to Mr. Shinde's mission to the depressed classes of his countrymen. She also referred to the Van Mission as likely to be of great help. At Bedford they saw what the Village Mission could accomplish in the lives of the people, and she hoped it would soon be not the only mission of its kind they had to support.

Mr. R. NEWELL, the village missionary, appealed for further help towards the building of the new room at Bedford, for which £22 had come in. It would cost much more than that. The social and educational work in the village was greatly appreciated by the people.

Miss O. M. RAWLINGS told of the work of the Liverpool Postal Mission, and the steady increase of applications for literature, which showed how much the work was needed. The correspondence often revealed pitiable circumstances, especially of the poverty of ministers unable to buy books, and deeply grateful for the literature they were able to send. They very soon discovered when correspondents had ulterior motives. The great majority were genuine seekers for light and sympathy. The best part of the work was often through the personal touch with their correspondents. The warmest appreciation was expressed of the literature, and with those who had drifted away from orthodox moorings, what was clutched at as a plank of deliverance proved to be a veritable lifeboat, which bore them safely into the desired haven of rest.

The Rev. C. ROPER called attention to the transfer of £30 from the general fund to the Bedford Mission. He thought the money given for Postal Mission work should all be used for that purpose. As to the Village Mission, what was the Eastern Union doing?

Miss HILL explained that "other practical and pioneer Unitarian missionary work" was distinctly included among the objects of the society, and while money specially given for the Village Mission could not be transferred to general purposes, the general fund was certainly legitimately used for that special work. It was not lack of money that hindered the extension of their Postal Mission, but lack of workers.

The Rev. J. BIRKS, on behalf of the Eastern Union, expressed high appreciation of the Postal Mission work, and especially of the mission work at Bedford.

Miss EMILY SHARPE suggested that a classified list of the books most in demand among the people would be helpful to have.

The resolution was unanimously passed.

On the motion of the Rev. J. B. HIGHAM, seconded by Mrs. H. RUTT, the officers and committee were appointed.

Miss H. M. JOHNSON, in the absence of Mrs. Hodgson Pratt, who telegraphed that she was prevented from being present as she had hoped, moved:—

"The members and friends of the Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union assembled at this meeting, welcome the forthcoming second Peace Congress of the Nations at the Hague as a further step in the direction of international goodwill and understanding. They heartily congratulate the Premier and the British Government on their desire to secure a discussion upon the vital topic of the limitation of armaments by international agreement.

"In accordance with the humane principles of religion, they call upon their members, and supporters, to strengthen the hands of those who are striving to substitute the reign of law and moral force, for reliance on physical force, in cases of international misunderstanding and dispute."

She said that in this matter even small steps forward were worth while. The war fever was the most catching of all. They had to find out the causes of it, as doctors did with other fevers, and so prevent it. One great cause was distrust among the nations, for which the newspapers were largely responsible. They could at least avoid the papers which traded in exaggerated sensations, which led directly to the war fever. Much was being done to overcome the old prejudice of nationalism. At an international congress on temperance last year, in Boston, she had seen in Tremont Temple the beautiful motto, "No more strangers and foreigners," and had noted its effect upon the delegates gathered there from many lands. Women could help especially in the home, if not in school, to infuse a more humane and religious spirit into the children. They who believed in the universal Fatherhood of God should be leaders in that great work for peace among men.

Mrs. TUCKER seconded, and Mr. J. SHIPPEN supported the resolution, which was unanimously passed, and after the concluding vote of thanks, moved by the Rev. T. P. SPEDDING, tea was served.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Acton.—The anniversary services last Sunday, May 26, conducted by the Rev. A. HURN, were well attended. On Wednesday evening a social meeting was held to celebrate this first anniversary. After a sociable prelude, with tea and coffee, the chair was taken by Mr. John Harrison, President of the London District Unitarian Society, who, after an opening hymn, gave a sympathetic address. The Revs. W. C. POPE (Lewisham), Felix Taylor (Richmond), and A. HURN also spoke, the speeches being interspersed with songs by several friends. A vote of thanks, moved by Mr. B. Athawes, and seconded by Mr. J. A. Barnes, and the benediction, pronounced by Mr. HURN, brought the very interesting and encouraging meeting to a close.

Bolton: Bank-street (Appointment).—Mr. Felix Holt, B.A., of Manchester College, Oxford, has been appointed assistant-minister, and will enter on his duties at the beginning of July.

Chatham.—The Hamond Hill Literary and Dramatic Society has just concluded a very successful session of study of the English poets. At the weekly meetings papers have been read on selected authors, followed by recitals from their works; a portion of every evening was devoted to elocutionary practice, the class enjoying the privilege of assistance from a trained elocutionist, Mrs. Montague; while another feature has been exercise in the creative imagination by the production of original brief contributions under the editorship of Mr. Drury. Mr. A. E. Crawshaw has ably served as general secretary. The Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, who is now giving an interesting course of evening sermons on the plays of Shakespeare, has just been made the recipient of a beautiful black silk gown from a member, the event coinciding with another gracious gift of a microscope and a microscopic camera from the Emerson Correspondence Class, with members in every part of Great Britain, of which for some years Mr. Davis has been the presiding genius.

Derby.—At the recent annual general meeting of the Friar-gate congregation, Mr. J. Larratt, the warden, presided, and a satisfactory report was presented. Recent improvements had involved a considerable debt, which it was hoped soon to wipe out. The occasion was taken to make a presentation of a tea and coffee service to Mr. and Mrs. W. D. Fritchley, in recognition of Mr. Fritchley's long and faithful services to the congregation. The Rev. E. S. Lang Buckland, who made the presentation, said that he had been to them an excellent and most competent treasurer. Mr. F. Bullock and Mr. James Harwood also spoke, and Mr. Fritchley made a suitable response.

Godalming.—The annual school festival and flower services at Meadow Chapel were held on Sunday week. The preacher, afternoon and evening, was the Rev. Priestley Prime, of Brighton, and the string band assisted in the music. A hamper of flowers, gathered by the children, was afterwards sent to the East London Hospital for Children. On the following Wednesday the string band concert of sacred music was held in the chapel, and there was a large and appreciative audience.

Manchester: Longsight (Farewell and Presentation).—On Sunday last, May 26, the Rev. H. J. Rossington preached his farewell sermon, marking the close of a pastorate extending over a period of nearly six years. At a social gathering held the following evening in the Gaskell Hall, opportunity was taken of presenting him with framed copies of Raphael's "Sistine Madonna," and Millais' "The Huguenot." Each of the pictures bears a tablet testifying the regard and esteem in which Mr. Rossington is held by his Longsight friends. Mr. John Heys made the presentation, and Mr. Rossington suitably responded.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The services at the Church of the Divine Unity last Sunday were conducted by the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, of Leicester, who spoke in the morning on "The Power of the Spirit," and in the evening on "The Religion of Martineau." Miss von Petzold has returned from her visit to Berlin, where one of her lectures appears to have been followed by a somewhat hysterical outburst on the part of a male fanatic, and other orthodox protests.

Newcastle-under-Lyme.—The anniversary services of the Old Meeting House Sunday-school were held on Sunday last, the Rev. G. Pegler being the preacher. Special hymns were sung by the children. In the evening the congregation was a large one, and the collections showed considerable advance on last year.

Newport, Mon.—Last Sunday the services were conducted by Mrs. Page Hopps, whose visit attracted good congregations, the evening attendance being well above the average. Mrs. Hopps' discourses were so acceptable as to lead many who heard her to express their desire that our pulpits should be more frequently occupied by lady preachers. Next Sunday Dr. Bimal Ghosh, M.A., will pay a return visit to the Newport Church.

Yorkshire Unitarian Union (Resignation).—The Rev. Henry Cross, the assistant district minister of the Yorkshire Union, has intimated his decision to terminate his engagement at the end of September. Mr. Cross will be free to consider a new appointment.

AN APPEAL.

GLANRHONDDA WELSH UNITARIAN CHAPEL,
PENTRE, RHONDDA VALLEY.

THE above Chapel was built in 1895, as a result of the Missionary efforts of the Rev. Wm. Griffiths, Ph.D., B.D. The cost of the building was £860, of which the sum of £260 was collected at the opening, leaving a debt of £600; a mortgage for this amount was obtained. In 1902, with the help of the Twentieth Century Fund, this was reduced to £450.

The Congregation is almost entirely composed of miners.

The Church in its early career was ministered to by the Revs. Ivor Davies and D. G. Rees, now of Bridgend, and up to December, 1905, by the Rev. D. Rhoslyn Davies.

I visited the members on December 1st last, and after due enquiry I was convinced that until this heavy debt was removed it was utterly impossible for the friends at Pentre to make satisfactory progress.

The Congregation has held together bravely under very trying circumstances, and with a full knowledge of the position I unhesitatingly appeal to the Unitarian Public for help to place this promising outpost on a firmer basis.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Two specially disappointing announcements were made this week as to forthcoming legislation. There will be no relief, apparently, to passive resisters until an inclusive Education Bill can be introduced, which is impossible this year. Mr. McKenna hopes to introduce a Bill before long to free teachers' colleges from religious tests, but for the rest we must possess our souls in such patience as we have. The question of licensing, also, is found to be too large to be dealt with this year, and so far as new legislation is concerned the "Cry of the Children" must go up without avail at present. If we could be sure that in each case the law to be made will be a thorough-going measure of reform, we might all be gainers by this delay. Let us hope it will be so.

THE action of the Preston Town Council in forcing upon the schools a syllabus of religious teaching which is undisguisedly of a "Church" character looks like precipitating a severe struggle, and it will be seen whether Mr. McKenna can, or really cannot, find a remedy. The local Non-conformists are banding themselves together to resist, not passively. It is felt that submission to the scheme laid down by the council would entirely subvert the intention of their schools, and there is talk of closing these for a lengthened period—a policy which, if carried out, would at any rate be deplorable from the point of view of the local education authority and probably from that of the parents. The intolerable character of the Acts at present in force could ask for no plainer demonstration. Teachers are practically informed that they must accept the sectarian syllabus or go elsewhere, and the party that happens to be in a majority is supposed to be doing right if it takes public money for its denominational advantage. Of course, we pointed this out as a danger when the Acts were being framed; to-day the wrong is a glaring reality. Perhaps Preston will force the supiner friends of religious liberty to realise what is at stake.

Good can scarcely fail to result from the visit of British journalists to Germany. The guests have been welcomed with the warm and friendly hospitality which characterises our neighbours in their private life, and the highest official sanction is credited to this mission by its reception by the Emperor. From city to city, from Berlin in Prussia of the north, to Bavarian Munich, so famed for its city brewery, in the south, have the journalists of Britain moved, saying good to and hearing good from the journalists of Germany. And now the editors and leading writers of many papers will count friends among the writers of the sister land, so that they will be stronger to show the current of hate which pours out from the baser newspaper offices of London or Berlin, or the other cities. The German people, as we know, have no quarrel with us, and the English people are not enemies of Germany. Every action is to be welcomed and widely chronicled which enhances the power of the men of goodwill in either land.

ONE of the most significant events at the Friends' yearly meeting was the proposing of a new minute by Seebohm Rowntree, author of "York: a Study of Town Poverty." For those of our readers who are not well acquainted with Quakers' procedure, we may preface this suggested minute with an explanation. The minutes are twelve in number, and deal not only with specifically religious, but with such secular matters as the making of wills, and one of these is read out by the clerk of each local meeting once a month, at the close of the worship. Now for the new suggestion:—"Is the condition of the poor around you a matter of solicitude on your part? Do you realise that it is contrary to the will of your Heavenly Father that so many of your fellow-creatures should be living in conditions which debar them from spiritual, mental and physical growth, and are you doing your duty in social work?" There was opposition to the proposal, and, according to the custom of the Friends, no vote was taken upon it, and the query was deferred. But it served to give point and solemnity to the social discussions which were such a feature of the yearly meeting.

THE various reports of those who attended the Mow Cop centenary meetings of the Primitive Methodists agree very well in regard to the immense numbers gathered together, the spirit of cheer and enthusiasm among the people, and the historic vindication which the founders of Primitive Methodism have received, by the mere possibility of such a celebration. If, at the same time, we are reminded by the very features of the celebration itself of the danger of which the Wesleyan Conference apprehended from the camp meeting; if some things reminded one of a religious picnic, the other things—the shows, and the shooting galleries that took advantage of the crowds and the excitement—rather suggested the Vanity Fair which the true spirit of Methodism has always opposed; the decision of the Conference is not thereby justified. The danger lest his work should be confounded with that of Beelzebub never held back the hand of Christ; the disadvantage of being slandered as a man of doubtful company and worldly habits never checked his sociality. He trusted God and defied the demons. Who can do better?

A LETTER in the Methodist Times concerning the Methodist ministry in Canada, contains several suggestions and statements that are of interest only or mainly to the Methodist public. One item may be worth a moment's consideration to others. We quote the exact words of the letter with the curious parenthesis as we find it printed: "The Methodist ministry here closes its doors on the man who smokes a little (I have never yet felt free to condemn a man for not smoking); but when a brother possesses the other necessary qualifications, and is refused on this ground alone, then the idea becomes monstrous. They have no use for him—no use for such men as the late princely orator Charles Haddon Spurgeon, or loving, eloquent Peter Mackenzie!" The silly season not having yet set in we have no intention of starting a controversy on the question of smoking. But the criticism which the English writer has made on the Canadian custom does suggest the unsatisfactory nature of all merely negative tests when we are dealing with Christian work and Christian workers. Our churches in particular ought never to forget that they are engaged in the work of a great reformation; that the re-statement of Christianity which they are trying to make involves the profoundest distinctions; that the application of Christianity, as they present it, to politics and to every day life will involve the most sweeping reforms that can well be conceived; and that the main questions to be settled in choosing friends and fellow workers are these: can they help us to formulate and to explain the Christianity we wish to teach; can they do anything to bring about the reformation we seek to establish? Seeking first the kingdom of God, we shall be less liable to make any very bad blunders in regard to the smaller details of life and conduct.

THE London Missionary Society is passing through one of the periodical financial crises which have long been accepted by the directors as a part of their settled policy. The secret of the difficulty is a very simple one, namely, that the interest felt by the churches at home in foreign missions does not expand equally with the liabilities which are incurred. In the past this practice of allowing debt to accumulate and then of obtaining enhanced subscriptions by fervent appeals has enjoyed a momentary success, and there is little doubt but that the deficit of the present year (some £12,000) will be wiped off. But the affairs of the society are becoming seriously embarrassed, as may be judged from Sir Albert Spicer's declaration that whatever happens the society must not be suffered to become bankrupt. However, for the meantime, the directors have refused to reduce expenditure, which would mean reducing the number of missionaries, and an amendment by Rev. A. J. Viner, in favour of prudent finance, was defeated. Still the disconcerting fact remains that the interest on debt already consumes funds that might provide three new missionaries.

THE Christian World, which bears its age so buoyantly, does not yield to any of our religious periodicals in vigour and interest, perhaps because it is an interdenominational rather than a denominational organ. Just now a series of articles is appearing in its columns to which we direct attention of our readers. The writer is T. E. Ruth, of Liverpool, and his subject, "The Congregational Revolt against Independency." The difficulties of weak churches, the misery of tenuous ministerial stipends, and kindred topics are discussed, and a plea is put in for a "Christian communism," as a return to primitive Christian ideals. But not only is it urged that there should be common action between churches of the same name, but further amalgamation of denominational interests:—

"It is, perhaps, too soon to urge it yet, but surely the time is coming when both sections of Congregationalism will amalgamate. I may be too sanguine, but it seems to me that there is a modus operandi honourable to both denominations. The Baptists would regard faith in Jesus Christ as the door of admission into the church and give to baptism its true spiritual significance of individual loyalty, and Congregationalists would not use water in connection with their service of infant dedication, in which they so beautifully recognise the sanctity of human life. Against a united Congregationalism no enemy could stand. Within it no problem could long remain unsolved. Before it there would be glorious service and certain victory."

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE June Contemporary opens with two articles on Germany and England which ought to be of real service in counteracting the evil influence of the mischief-makers between the two countries, and there is the second of Mr. Wybergh's articles on "Imperial Organisation and the Colour Question." This is his conclusion:—

"Without justice the Empire will inevitably collapse; without the freest national and racial developments it will not be worth preserving. No nation worthy of the name was ever yet built upon the exploitation of lower races: the system of a white aristocracy and a coloured working class of non-citizens has failed wherever it has been tried, and will always fail if anything beyond the mere production of wealth is required. The admission of coloured races to citizenship and social equality in a democracy is no less disastrous, and there is no future for a race of half-breeds. The alternative is, first, segregation to be achieved at any hazard and at all costs; but to be carried out under the most various conditions and by the most various means. Then come correlation, adjustment, and specialisation, and then the birth of the true World-State as a self-conscious organisation, no longer great by reason of its mass alone. No doubt this condition cannot be brought about without great effort and self-sacrifice, and no doubt the bare idea of such a scheme will be labelled impracticable and visionary by the faint-hearted, the lover of precedent, and the self-interested; yet the Empire is built upon effort and sacrifice, not on self-interest. But in this greater matter, as in the details of the South African problem, objections and fears are useless and even ridiculous; we must find a way or perish. They who temporise and try to evade the difficulty, no less than they who say it is insoluble, are unworthy of the race to which they belong, and of the Empire which the valour of self-sacrifice of better men than themselves have given them for an heritage."

Note, also, Mr. Chiozza Money's brief article on "The Investments of the Masses."

Dr. Hastings Rashdall contributes a most interesting article on "The Alleged Immanence of God," which will be useful to all loose thinkers, and talkers without much thinking, on this subject. Those who are prone to take the name of Hegel on their lips when speaking of religion should consider what Dr. Rashdall says on p. 858. Yet, notwithstanding Dr. Rashdall's criticism of certain forms of the doctrine of immanence, we are convinced that the fundamental fact of Divine Immanence must be for ever the basis of spiritual religion.

In the Nineteenth Century and After, the first three articles deal with India, the first by an enlightened Mohammedan, Ameer Ali, late judge of the High Court in Bengal, on the meaning of the present unrest in that country of many races. Baron Kikuchi, in his article on "Japanese Education," gives the following translation of the Imperial Rescript, which is read at the opening of every term and on other occasions of special significance in all schools throughout the country:—

"Know ye, Our subjects:

"Our Imperial Ancestors have founded Our Empire on a basis broad and everlasting, and have deeply and firmly implanted virtue; Our subjects ever united in loyalty and filial piety have from generation to generation illustrated the beauty thereof. This is the glory of the fundamental character of Our Empire, and herein also lies the source of our education. Ye, Our subjects, be filial to your parents, affectionate to your brothers and sisters, as husbands and wives be harmonious, as friends true; bear yourself in modesty and moderation; extend your benevolence to all; pursue learning and cultivate arts, and thereby develop intellectual faculties and perfect moral powers; furthermore, advance public good and promote common interests; always respect the constitution and observe the laws; should emergency arise, offer yourselves courageously to the State; and thus guard and maintain the prosperity of Our Imperial Throne coeval with heaven and earth. So shall ye not only be Our good and faithful subjects, but render illustrious the best traditions of your forefathers."

"The Way here set forth is indeed the teaching bequeathed by Our Imperial Ancestors, to be observed alike by Their Descendants and the subjects, infallible for all ages and true in all places. It is Our wish to lay it to heart in all reverence, in common with you, Our subjects, that we may all thus attain to the same virtue." (October 30, 1890.)

The Albany Review (formerly the Independent) has an article by Mr. F. W. Hirst, "At the Hague," in anticipation of the coming Peace Conference, and there are studies of two very different personalities, the late Ferdinand Brunetiere and Father Ignatius. Mr. T. H. S. Escott tells the story of "The Times."

The World's Work prints President Roosevelt's letter to Mr. Carnegie on the Peace Conference, and as frontispiece has a portrait of King Edward as "The Peacemaker." Two other full-page portraits are of Lord Cromer and Sir Eldon Gorst. One of the most interesting of the fully illustrated articles is on "Hawaii, the Cross-Roads of the Pacific." Two other articles we note: "The Failure of the Church as a Career," and "The Anti-Gambling Crusade in Australia."

The June Cornhill has the conclusion of "Fraulein Schmidt and Mr. Anstruther," by the author of "Elizabeth and her German Garden," which was published last month in book form. Does Rose-Marie in letter lxxvi. really justify her action in taking up the correspondence again after the catastrophe of December twelve-month? This number has some pleasant verses by the President of Magdalen at Oxford, sent with a copy of his brief history of his college to Mr. A. C. Benson, at Magdalen College, Cambridge. There is also another of Mrs. Richmond Ritchie's Blackstick Papers on "Mabys," the "Metropolitan Association for Befriending Young Servants," and Mrs. Nassau Senior.

THE Rev. Robert Collyer, writing May 25, says he is to sail for this country Aug. 7, and return to America Oct. 3rd.

LITERARY NOTES AND NEWS.

AN interesting announcement has appeared recently to the effect that the text of the Vulgate is to be revised under Papal authority. The preliminary work has been committed to the Benedictines, who are to undertake the textual investigation upon which the revised translation must be based. This study of readings will be of special interest to scholars, and it is quite possible that nothing further will be attempted at present. It is the traditional policy of the Roman curia to be very cautious where popular faith is concerned, and Cardinal Rampolla has spoken already of waiting for the propitious hour before the complete revision can be issued. In this connection we may mention that the eminent textual critic, Dr. Eberhard Nestle, issued a revised version of the Vulgate last year. It is printed in a very convenient and attractive form with his critical Greek text on alternate pages. The compact little volume contains, also, Jerome's letter to Damasus and the spurious Epistles to the Laodiceans. It is beautifully printed on thin paper, and will fit into a very small space in the bag of the travelling scholar.

The publishers announce the completion of the new translation of the New Testament into modern German, with notes under the direction of Professor Johannes Weiss—"Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments neu übersetzt und für die Gegenwart erklärt." The last part includes Hebrews, by G. Hollmann; St. John's Gospel, by W. Heitmüller, of Göttingen; and the Epistles of St. John, by O. Baumgarten, of Kiel; there is also a full index to the whole work. It is very satisfactory to learn that the whole of the large first edition was subscribed for before publication. A second edition has begun to appear, and the publishers have decided to keep the original subscription price open till the end of June.

Messrs. Williams & Norgate announce for immediate publication a companion volume to "The New Theology," by the Rev. R. J. Campbell. It will be entitled "New Theology Sermons," and will include an introduction giving the history of the New Theology Movement up to the present date. Probably nothing can explain Mr. Campbell's theological position better than these carefully selected sermons, which have actually given rise to the whole controversy.

Two other books, dealing with the same subject, which have just appeared, may be mentioned. The first is called "The Old Faith and the New Theology," and is described as "a series of sermons and essays on some of the truths held by Evangelical Christians and the difficulties of accepting much of what is called the New Theology." Among the contributors are such well-known Congregational ministers as Dr. Goodrich, Dr. Forsyth, Dr. Barrett, Dr. Adeney, and Dr. Horton. It has a little too much the air of an authoritative manifesto, though any such intention is disclaimed. The course of religious truth at the present crisis will not be served best by the organisation of rival camps, and claims to speak for the majority. The second book is "The New Evangel, Studies in the New Theology," by Dr. Warschauer. It is written with vigour, and it will be read with the caution which is the tribute which wise men offer to the work of a very recent convert, who has shown a remarkable gift for theological changes.

Equo ne credite, Teucri! Quidquid id est, timeo Danaos et dona ferentes.

Messrs. Macmillan have just issued "Israel in Europe," by Mr. G. F. Abbott. The author's object is to present a readable sketch of the part played by the Jews in European history from the earliest times to the present day. The Jewish question he points out, is a question than which none possesses a deeper interest for the student of the past, or a stronger fascination for the speculation on the future; a question compared with which the Eastern, the Irish, and all other vexed questions are but things of yesterday; a question which has taxed the ingenuity of European statesmen ever since the dispersion of this Eastern people over the lands of the West."

"A younger race," Mr. Abbott continues, would have yielded to the influence of environment, a weaker race would have succumbed to oppression, a less inflexible or unsympathetic race might have conquered its conquerors. But the Jews, when they first came into contact with Europe, were already too old for assimilation, too strong for extermination, too hard in their peculiar cult for propagandism. Even after having ceased to exist as a state Israel survived as a nation; forming the one immobile figure in a perpetually moving panorama. The narrow local idea of the ancient Greek state was merged into the broad cosmopolitanism of the Macedonian Empire, and that, in its turn, was absorbed by the broader cosmopolitanism of Imperial Rome. But the Jew remained faithful to his own olden ideal. Monotheism superseded Polytheism, and the cosmopolitanism of the Roman Empire was succeeded by that of the Roman Church. The Jew still continued rooted in the past. Mediæval cosmopolitanism gave way to the nationalism of modern Europe. Yet the Jew declined to participate in the change. Too narrow in one age, not narrow enough in another, always at one with himself and at variance with his neighbours, now, as ever, he offers the melancholy picture of one who is a stranger in the land of his fathers and an alien in that of his adoption."

The Bookman for June is full as usual of varied interest. The leading article and most of the illustrations are consecrated to the memory of Joseph Addison. Here we may call special attention to two articles on Ian Maclaren, by Dr. William Wallace and Dr. James Moffatt respectively. Dr. Moffatt deals more particularly with his stories. He points out that even the larger books are collections of stories, not novels in the proper sense of the term. His skill lay in the delineation of individual character, rather than in the weaving of a plot. "He was not a novelist," is Dr. Moffatt's verdict, "he had not the powers of dramatic construction necessary for such work. . . . It is in other directions that one must look for the virtues and the prototypes of his stories."

"They are obviously," he continues, "the stories of a born raconteur, who has always a story to tell, and falls off the further he gets away from it. The author has the rare knack of seeing the vital, sparkling points in a situation, and the salient characteristics of a personality. These he manages somehow to disentangle from the mass of subordinate, conventional, and less telling details which an inferior writer would think it necessary to reproduce; and it is by means of this insight borne of a zest for life in its odd variety and originality, that he writes stories, which, judged from the literary standpoint, are superior to the more conscientious labours of men who take a wider, deeper survey of the field."

The current number of the Book Monthly falls into a curious error in announcing a new edition of Newman's Dream of Gerontius. It speaks of it as a beautiful hymn, and adds that it was the favourite hymn of Gladstone, and was sung to him just before he died. The writer is evidently unaware that the hymn "Praise to the Holiest in the Heights," to which the description applies, is simply one of several religious lyrics which are woven into the dramatic texture of the poem. Such are the pitfalls which beset the unwary steps of those who write literary notes without the qualification of literary omniscience! Only there are some things which every writer should know, and that the Dream of Gerontius is not a hymn is one of them.

PRESSING SOCIAL PROBLEMS.*

"You see, ma'am, there is another world a-coming, where we shall be dealt by more justly, for we never gets our fair due here!" So replied an old worn-out working man to the authoress of "Britain's Hope," whose book is full of practical suggestions for bettering the lot of the toilers upon whom Britain's prosperity rests.

First and foremost she places the prohibition of all child labour (half-timers), and reclaiming the married women from factory work, including factory home-work.

One hundred and twenty thousand babies died last year in England and Wales, largely owing to the mothers being also the bread winners. The book is an earnest plea for the children, and a touching story is told of a bargeman's little daughter of eleven, who was doing a man's work in unlocking and relocking canal gates; and on being sympathised with replied, "Lor, sir, I have been a-doing this ever since I were nine!"

In the matter of "labour colonies" we are reminded that the name is a mistranslation. "Arbeiter-colonien" means "colonies of workers," which has a very different sound to the ears of the classes these colonies are intended to benefit.

"To have a badly chosen name is like dwelling under a shadow," say the Chinese. Miss Sutter is strongly in favour of colonies of workers, and considers that every town should have its own. There should be training given there to boys in farming and trades, and to girls in cooking, hygiene, and the management of infants. There should also be training colonies for the unfit, and graded colonies to form a ladder out of the slough of workless unfitness into the fitness of capable manhood. The chapters on colonies, telling us how these are managed in Germany, are full of interest.

Miss Sutter believes that the British Poor Law has had its day, for it is utterly inadequate to cope with the difficulties that press for solution. She would like some enterprising city to be set free from the existing Poor Law, for, say, three years, and allowed to work out its own solution, while the nation looked on.

Much is said about the lamentable overlapping of charitable agencies, and the possible formation of a Charity Board as a Government Department affiliated to the Local Government Board, to which every charitable society must submit its accounts. The idea is not the submitting to dictatorship, but the joining of all good agencies throughout the country, and the strength that union would give.

The Old Age Pension Scheme, as at present conceived, is condemned, and a system of national insurance, like that in force in Germany, is described and recommended in its stead.

The raising of large sums for the relief of the unemployed is also condemned, and the practical suggestion made that the existing canals of the country should be remade and others opened for trade traffic, thus finding work for the workless, and at the same time providing cheaper transit than the railways do for trade and market produce. Germany spends huge sums on this object yearly, with markedly beneficial results to trade.

The nationalisation of railways is strongly urged, and the remarkable fact given that the German railways, which were bought up by the State in 1879 and brought under central management now make a profit of 7 per cent., a gain to the exchequer (in Prussia alone) of some ten million pounds yearly.

Education, the right of towns to hold property, and of the poor to own their own bits of land, are all touched upon in an interesting manner, and the way these things are managed here and in Germany is again and again contrasted and compared, and one cannot help seeing that "the Fatherland" is in many respects a true father to its children, "ever considering the people, well knowing that a thriving peasantry is the best foundation on which national greatness can build securely."

Miss Sutter is British born, German bred, but England is the country of her adoption, and she pleads with England to learn from Germany before it is too late, and not to let herself be eclipsed by a Continental rival.

VIOLET SOLLY.

AN URGENT PROBLEM.*

MANY people must have been looking for the appearance of some such book as this by the Professor of the Philosophy of Religion in the University of Chicago. Unable to sit acquiescent among the ruins of old creeds, where criticism has made a desolation and calls it a peace; equally unable to pretend that they are content with any pale simulacrum of abstract religion which foregoes all claim to permanent validity and confesses that it, too, may pass to be forgotten to-morrow; they are now asking, as Prof. Foster says, not What is permanent and what is passing in the Christian religion? but whether there be any permanent or not. "Will the study of the various religions yield the scientific conclusion that Christianity is the absolutely perfect religion, or, perhaps, that up to the present time it is but the relatively highest among the religions? Is Jesus final, or may some new Master arise in the evolutionary development of the race who shall supersede Him, as He superseded Moses, for example? Can Christianity be bound to an historical, therefore relative, personality of the distant past, and yet continue to be the ideal religion of our forever-advancing humanity?" In comparison with questions like these, the dusty old contests between a miraculous and a non-miraculous Christianity fall quite into the background, and the profounder searchings of many hearts are revealed. Prof. Foster discovers to us an immense controversy that has for some years past been waging in Germany over this vital frontier of the faith, the prominent names in it being Troeltsch and Kaftan; and now he has brought up the whole subject in a most comprehensive way which may be expected to dictate the lines on which the investigation will be pursued in English for some time to come. The ramifications of the inquiry are extremely numerous and extensive, for the philosophy of knowledge, and the whole nature of religion, as well as the most recent results of New Testament criticism, have to be brought under review; but Prof. Foster nowhere stints his labour, and the impression made upon the reader is that of a great new attempt to recast the whole problem of Christianity in a more heroic mould. Of this encyclopædic programme not even the outline can now be sketched, but our whole attention must be given to the main outcome of the argument.

The first pre-supposition of our author's position is that Authority - Religion (Supernaturalism) has been effectively dissolved and disposed of by the collective endeavours of modern thinkers and scholars. But much more besides authority - religion has been "dissolved." "The old soul, the old God, the old world," are gone. "All the multitude of static entities, excluding each other, have widened out into process." According to the old religion (both the orthodox and the rationalistic) "reality—i.e., matter, soul, God—was subsumed under the category of substance, which was thought to be static. The static was authoritative in science and morality and religion. Being static, it was final, absolute. Thus the finality, the absoluteness of the Christian religion could be easily held in that old world of the static absolute." But now we have changed all that! Reality now means "process, evolution, becoming." Psychic activity is thus "cut loose from a soul-substance; God-activity from a God-substance." But here is the difficulty—"the very peculiarity of Christianity is that it exalts psychic internality to a self-dependent world, and makes this world the centre of all reality. If this internality is not the goal, but the secondary by-product, of cosmic processes, the ground is taken away from under Christianity." The problem, therefore, takes this form: "Is the finality of the Christian religion tenable in this new world of ours, where the fixed has yielded to flux, being to becoming, absoluteness to reality, force to ideals? Having seen that Christianity is no longer absolute as a religion of authority in a world of static entities, can it be shown that it is absolute as a religion of ideals in a world of evolution and immanence?" The answer is "Not if there be no ideals. And there are no ideals if there be no personalities."

The inquiry, therefore, passes into the region of philosophy, and we are conducted over the great modern battlefield where Naturalism and Personal Idealism have fought. "If the fact and right of personality cannot be maintained over against the conception of reality as thought, and that thought as deterministic process," then religion and morality must perish. Prof. Foster's critique of naturalism is most illuminating. Here his great principle is the "undeniability of the spiritual," its activity and spontaneity. Personality thus having been secured, its rightful place in the world-view, as against mere "relativism," it becomes possible to understand how the personality of Jesus can be regarded as the culmination of historical developments. "To Christianity it is the individual that is of decisive worth, in whose eternal destiny and consummation Christianity has faith. According to the speculative philosophy, the movement of historical life, emerging from the All, returns into the All; according to Christianity, an eternal kingdom of personal spirits is formed in history." Just as personality throws its light upon the whole cosmic process, so Jesus, as the highest reach of human attainment, explains humanity. In two points, indeed, Christian faith holds a different view from that of the Hegelian hypothesis. (1) Its facts do not warrant the idea of "an ortholinear progressive development." "There is so much that is perverse, retrogressive, abortive," contradicting the idea of a steadily ascending progress where the highest always must necessarily be the last. (2) Philosophy reckons only with the logical necessity of development, while Christianity regards history as the acts of free persons. But apart from these exceptions, the idea of Jesus as the supreme expression of personal goodness in history is quite in keeping with the modern idea of development. In particular, and especially, the suddenness and (from a naturalistic point of view) inexplicableness of the appearance of Jesus in history, with all that his consciousness comprised of eternal and supreme worth—all this constitutes a creative spiritual epoch for which a place must be found in any theory of development that is to satisfy our deepest requirements.

All this philosophy of personality, however, proves nothing to the point unless it can be shown that Christianity does actually give us that "eternal and supreme worth" which alone can claim "finality." From philosophy, then, to history. "Weinel's striking phrase, 'After Jesus, it is his religion or none,'" suggests to us that we must make a fresh attempt to discover what the religion of Jesus really is. Here, again, we are in the thick of great fights—Harnack, Loisy, Pfleiderer. Finally, the whole thing reduces itself to the "problem of method," i.e., method in historical inquiry. There is the idiographic method (Windelband-Rickert) which values facts just as facts, for their own individual worth, and for the degree in which they contribute to the whole of knowledge. There is also the nomothetic method (Dilthey-Wundt) which traces universal laws in history just as natural science does in the physical world; it is monistic while the idiographic method is pluralistic, and is favoured by minds which have "a passion for causal explanation." Out of all this discussion we draw certain leading lines of treatment by which to seize the "essence" of Christianity. But "popular as the word 'essence' now is, it is yet a bad word. It is a survival of the mediæval conception of substance and attribute—a fixed and self-identical core with properties." We must hold fast, then, to the modern principle that "Christianity, like all reality, is process, becoming, life." To define a thing we have to tell how it arose and what it does. Thus, it is not a mere question of what Jesus did and thought in the few recorded years of his life. "The beginning of any form of life is not an adequate criterion for the measurement of that life in its perfection." Again (with Harnack), "a complete answer to the question, What is Christianity? is impossible so long as we are restricted to Jesus Christ's teaching alone." But, on the other hand, we must not be of those who cannot see the wood because of the trees—we are not to be lost in a mere multiplicity of historical details barely threaded together by causal explanations: we have to seek for the unfolding and working-out and bodying-forth of a principle. Not anything that has been done in the name of Christianity is necessarily Christian. Once more, we are not to identify the truths of Christianity (Unitarians, perpend!) with "the truth of natural religion, or with a universal conception of religion." Mindful of all this methodical preparation, our author now passes to his chapter on the "Sources of the Life of Jesus," where he relies mainly on Wernle's book (recently given to English readers by Mr. Lummis). This enables him, last of all, to gather up in a chapter on Jesus what seems to him the whole pith and meaning of Christianity as the highest efflorescence of the world-development. The religion of Jesus is religion at its purest and profoundest. Perfect universality is here together with perfect individuality. For the religion of Jesus is personality-religion. "The form of his faith in God, the God-idea, may be changed, but the content will hardly be surpassed."

How far, then, does this brilliant, lucid, powerful book carry out its programme? There is, the preface hints, another volume to follow. So far, however, Prof. Foster has given us the materials for a true theory rather than the theory itself. The very extensive preparations in philosophy and in the discussion of method above described do not bring to us an adequate harvest of results at the end of the present work. And the results, so far even as they go, are not quite consistent with some of the premises. Thus, e.g., if we accept Mr. Weatherall's criticism of Wernle's book ("Its defect is . . . in its postulate, that the only significant sources for our knowledge of the life of Jesus are the historical fragments imbedded in the Synoptics"), we shall not be satisfied with those of Prof. Foster's results that come from his almost literal dependence upon Wernle. And, as we have seen, his own methodic principles should have prevented him from dismissing Paul and John "as unimportant mythologists." The fact is, the author has never really disentangled himself from the old-world notions of static "essence," against which he has written so effectively. It is one thing to say that the essence of Christianity "is the content of the religious fundamental reality which is never finished and never closed so long as it is living, and belongs to history, a content revealing itself in its historical manifestation. . . . a self-developing spiritual principle." It is quite another thing to apply this dictum with consistency to the explanation of Christianity. How great, e.g., is the failure to do this in the following:—"Faith is directed only to that which is of a timeless character, which can disclose itself as immediately present to anyone anywhere." Anyone? Anywhere? If timeless, what about the "historical manifestations?" Much to the same effect is a great deal of the author's inveighing against the presentation of Christianity as a religion of historical facts. In all this Prof. Foster is really still under the old naturalistic obsessions which, in theory, he has so brilliantly dispersed; in practice, he delivers "history" over, bound hand and foot, to natural science, and really loses all right to speak of spiritual history.

If one suggestion may be permitted, the most hopeful line of thought seems to be that which falls in with some remarks quoted from Kaftan (p. 47). Discussing the view, that we are compelled by the general historical method now everywhere in favour, to regard the Christian religion as only one of a series of religions that have emerged upon the scene and will in due time give place to others, he points out how precarious are these wide generalisations founded merely on considerations of "method." It was just such a procedure that led its advocates to declare with overwhelming confidence that materialism was the pure and necessary result of the natural science method. "Thus, too, there was a time when they believed that they could transform morality into a natural science on the basis of statistics." In short, "method of itself alone cannot determine what is true and what is not." We may admit, then, a certain scientific value in the "method" which places Christianity in its place as one item in a historical series. But when the inference is suggested that therefore Christianity itself will be superseded, we have to point out that this goes beyond the sphere of facts within which the said method has relevance and use. This sphere of facts is the sphere of religion as such, religion at its best, in its most realised form. (Just as, to take a similar case, any discussion about human evolution must deal with evolution as coincident with the conditions of man's life, and becomes unreal as soon as conclusions are attempted as to an imaginary superman.) Now, by religion as such it will be found, on consideration, that we really mean Christianity in some developed form of it—it matters not whether or not that form has as yet appeared. It is Christianity, indeed, that has given us the very idea of a developing series of religions, for they all point forward to it as to goal. The idea of a religion that should gather up the imperfect tentative efforts of all the rest is Christianity's own. And to ask whether Christianity will be superseded is to ask whether we shall ever have anything more religious than religion; which, again, is like asking, in discussions on the "superman," whether the race will develop into anything more human than men. Certainly, men may become something other than religious; just as conceivably men may develop into something higher than human. But that is not the question. W. WHITAKER.

THE APPEAL OF THE CHURCHES FOR PEACE.—A Memorial from the Churches in favour of peace, prepared by a committee appointed at a public meeting held at Exeter Hall on May 6, is being largely signed, not only in this country, but also in America and in the various countries on the Continent. It is proposed to present all the memorials simultaneously to the representatives of the various nations assembled at the Hague this month. These memorials are being signed not only by clergymen and ministers, but by laymen who are in any way representative of various churches, either as office-bearers or otherwise, by the representatives of the various missionary societies, and by peace workers generally. As the time is short, and there is a difficulty in obtaining the names and addresses of many who would be willing to sign, the Hon. Sec., Mr. Chas. Stevenson, 15, Leadenhall-street, London, E.C., and 9, Albert-square, Manchester, will be happy to forward a copy of the memorial for signature to anyone on application.

"So far as the reports go," writes the Rev. T. P. Spedding, "they are first class, and despite bad weather, good audiences have attended our Vans—highest number present, 300." He will supply a sketch report next week.

IN THE CROW'S NEST.

I AWOKE with a vague sense that something unusual was going to happen; not exactly a wedding, nor yet an interview with the dentist, but between the two. Then I remembered. I must preach my first sermon.

First, of course, only in a sense. I had preached several times already; but that was years ago, in another land and another language. Now I must preach in German. It was not really a German Sunday, they occur only once in three; but in consideration of my little skill in Romanish a slight variation in the order of languages was allowed.

It came about thus. Three parishes at the back of beyond had held three solemn Gemeindeversammlungen, and had elected me their Pfarrer. They speak a little language of their own, which has also a tiny literature, but as they never by any chance get a Pfarrer who understands it, they make it a rule to know one or two languages more, such as Italian and German. Then the new Pfarrer can always begin in one of these, and spend a few months in learning the Münstertalerladin before he tries to preach in it. I had never been within seven hours' journey of the nearest of them, but they had nevertheless shown so much trust in the report of a friend as to elect me their minister; for which I am very grateful to them. They had also written to him to ask me to let them know how much I should like to be paid, and would I please remember that they were poor. If I cared to visit them they would be very glad to see me, and they hoped I should like their valley.

The confidence of these mountain herdsmen touched me poignantly, all the more so as I had, up to the moment of my election, never preached even in German. It is a language which has several pitfalls for the unwary, and, though opportunities had offered themselves, cowardice had politely declined them. But now—now I really must, if only to assure myself that I can.

So I hunt up my sermon notes, and search them through. Many are unintelligible, most are no longer so suggestive as I once found them, almost all are, for some reason or another, unfit for use in these Bündner valleys. I have not that splendid outfit of written sermons, adapted to any and every emergency, which some of my brethren possess. King William's College, in the Isle of Man, undertook, in my time, the pastoral charge of Derby Haven, a village near Fort Island, about which a little book, "The Fishers of Derby Haven," has been written. One Sunday afternoon, during the organ recital which followed service in the college chapel, the Principal passed a note along to my stall, "Will you take the service for me at Derby Haven to-day? I will give you a book." The book contained nothing that I liked, so on my way to the mission chapel, along Castletown Bay and the Race-course, and over the roof of Lang Ness, I thought out a little address, which was my very first sermon. The text was, "Work out your own salvation." Years afterwards, in my ordination week at Bishop Auckland, I heard Archdeacon Watkins say, "Before the Restoration no clergyman was so lazy as to read his sermon,"—and I determined not to be lazy. I spent a week at Tyne-mouth excogitating a highly scientific discourse, with A, B and C, and little α 's and β 's, α 's and β 's, Roman and Arabic figures in beautiful subordination. The skeleton covered a sheet of foolscap—which I left, by a fortunate mischance, in my coat-pocket when I changed into my cassock. Thus the second of my first sermons were also perforce preached without manuscript, and I said to myself, "Since I can do this, I will." When the third of the series took place in the Church of the Saviour, I never thought of encumbering myself with notes on the rostrum. Shall I begin now? Away with the thought! I will preach extempore in German, or not at all.

I found something to say. It was about the life of the family, so rich in opportunities of love, pure-heartedness and strength, in Swiss highlands as in English slums. The Pfarrer lent me a liturgy, and I picked out, with the same difficulty which we so often find in English liturgies, a form of words which I could use without constraint. The morning dawned.

A difficulty arose before I left the house. It was April 28, and the snow on our balcony was a foot deep, and still it snowed. Bündner Pfarrers walk to church in their talar—if necessary, under an umbrella. I do not possess an umbrella, and it is not possible to wear an overcoat over a talar. A stern domestic edict forbids me to venture forth without some defence against the weather. In the end, I muffle myself in a pélerine, which is shorter than the talar, so that my upper parts are those of an Italian brigand, and only the last foot or two present a clerical appearance.

Observant of the local customs, I wait till five minutes after the advertised time for the service before setting off to church. On the way I overtake a venerable dean—the emeritus predecessor of my Pontresina friend—who waves me back. "You are too early! Walk slowly! Let our colleague overtake you!" So I wait, and am overtaken. The sexton sees us coming, and sounds the bell. The women are already within; the men wait about outside until I have entered.

I walk up to my seat under the pulpit. The men file in. The Lehrer at the harmonium announces a tune, either sire or son to Hursley, and, all seated except the choir, we sing two verses of a hymn.

I mount the pulpit. All stand. I read a prayer and the Paternoster. All remain standing. I search for a Bible, and find Bibles enough, but all in Romanish, so that I cannot read the few verses I had intended to give from one of the Psalms. "Liebe Gemeinde, meiner heutigen Abhandlung lege ich die Worte zu Grunde, die sich in Ps. lxxviii. 6 befinden, und also lauten." The text is announced; the congregation sit; I have begun.

I have finished my sermon, and have not broken down. True, I have had occasion to allude to the head of the family, and have made him masculine, when he ought to be neuter. But this solecism is my only mishap.

"It stands alone," Like Adam's recollection of his fall," and as yet I am blissfully unconscious of it. The congregation are standing, and I read a concluding prayer. My active part in the service ends with what I still feel as something rather strange—a kind of post-dated benediction. "After we have sung a song of praise, go in peace. The Lord bless you and preserve you."

I descend. We all sit, except the choir. The last two verses of our hymn are sung. The women file out. I follow them. The men follow me.

"Alles ist ganz gut gegangen," says my friend the Pfarrer. "Die Predigt hat mir sehr gefallen"—and adds a kind epithet.

In the afternoon I have a visitor, who brings note-book and pencil. "Do, please, repeat to me, slowly, so that I can take it down, what you said about love in the family."

PRESIDENT SAMUEL ATKINS
ELIOT, D.D.

PRESIDENT OF THE FOURTH (BOSTON)
INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS.

WE are indebted to the Rev. C. W. Wendte for the following account of the President of the coming Boston congress:—

The fourth International Congress in September, 1907, will be presided over by Rev. S. A. Eliot, D.D., president of the American Unitarian Association and chairman of the Boston Executive Committee of the Congress. There is a peculiar fitness in this selection, for it was at the initiative of Dr. Eliot that, seven years ago in Boston, the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers was called into existence. The occasion was the celebration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the founding of the American Unitarian Association, which was attended by a number of representative liberals from foreign countries. Among them were Revs. W. Copeland Bowie and Charles Hargrove of England, Rev. Prof. George Boros of Hungary, Professor George Oppert of Germany, Rev. James Hocart of Belgium, Rev. Kinzo Hirai of Japan, and Protap Chunder Mozoomdar of India. The foreign delegates and a number of American Unitarians in sympathy with the movement, at a meeting in Channing Hall, on May 24, 1900, presided over by Dr. Eliot, responding to his suggestion, organised an international federation of religious liberals, electing Professor J. Estlin Carpenter, of Oxford, England, as its first president, Rev. Charles W. Wendte of Boston as its secretary, and sixteen other gentlemen, representing nine nationalities, as an executive committee. This was the modest beginning of an international movement of liberals, which now includes over sixty religious associations throughout the world belonging to some fifteen nationalities and twenty-five religious fellowships.

Samuel Atkins Eliot was born in Cambridge, Mass., August 24, 1862. His grandfather, whose name he bears, is well remembered as a public-spirited citizen of Boston, and for three terms mayor of the city. His father is President Eliot of Harvard College. Mr. Eliot was educated in the Boston schools, and graduated at Harvard in 1884. After a short journey in Europe Mr. Eliot entered the Harvard Divinity School, and took the degree of Master of Arts in 1889. Meanwhile, he had spent a year in active missionary work, being the first minister of the newly gathered Unitarian church in Seattle, Wash. He was ordained minister of the Unitarian church in Denver, Col., on November 10, 1889, and had there a prosperous ministry of four years. He was quickly drafted into public service, and was associated with many of the benevolent and educational enterprises of Denver, holding, among other offices, that of the president of the Associated Charities. The National Conference of Charities met in his church in 1892.

In 1893 Mr. Eliot was called to the First Unitarian Church of Brooklyn, New York, and served there five years. Here, also, he took an active part in public affairs, and was in demand as a public speaker on civic occasions. He was president of the Free Kindergarten Association, vice-president of the Bureau of Charities, secretary of the New England Society, and a director in the Long Island Historical Society.

In the fall of 1897, Mr. Eliot was elected secretary of the American Unitarian Association, of which he had been a director for four years. In 1900 he was elected president of the Association, and has since been the executive chief of the National Association of the Unitarian Churches.

MR. JOHN CUMMINGS HAYNES, a generous Boston layman, who died early in May, in his 78th year, was a friend and parishioner of Theodore Parker. One of his grandsons, the Rev. John Haynes Holmes, is now colleague of Robert Collyer. In the Chicago Unity of May 16, the Rev. Jenkin Lloyd-Jones writes of him thus:—

“John Cummings Haynes leaves Julia Ward Howe and Colonel Higginson almost alone among the venerable and heroic founders and supporters of the Free Religious Association. Mr. Haynes, through the long and busy years of a successful business career, was true to the vision which came in his youth, ever loyal to his great pastor, Theodore Parker. One of the last of many acts of generous beneficences was the contributing of $11,000 towards the publication of a worthy memorial edition of Theodore Parker's works, which edition is now in process of preparation under the auspices of the American Unitarian Association, and the editorship of George W. Cooke, Colonel Higginson, and Samuel A. Eliot, president of the A.U.A. Mr. Haynes went into the employ of Oliver Ditson Company, music publishers, when but 15 years of age. Step by step he ascended the commercial ladder until for many years he was president of the large and flourishing corporation of Oliver Ditson & Co. He was one of the men of whom there are all too few, who in acquiring great wealth did not forget the upper chambers of his soul. Dollars did not crowd out ideas in his life, and consequently when he grew old his dollars were potencies and his life was serene and happy. He found joyful communion with philosophers, bards and prophets. In the contemplation of such a life one takes new hope for commerce and commercial men. If Oliver Ditson taught John Cummings Haynes the way of successful business, Theodore Parker taught him how to consecrate both the ability and the result of that ability to their higher uses and the usefulness was happiness to him.”

LEGENDS OF THE SAINTS.

III.—ST. HELENA.

THE story of St. Helena is a particularly interesting one, especially to English people. She was the wife of Constantine Chlorus, and is important in history chiefly because she was the mother of the great emperor Constantine.

She did not die for her faith as St. Margaret and St. Catherine did, but she was made a saint after her death because of all she had done. It is difficult to know anything very certainly about her early life or her parents, but her husband and son were both rulers of Britain, and it is thought by some historians that Helena was British herself. More than this, it is said that “Constantine married Helena, the daughter of Coel, or Coilus, a British king,” who was none other than the famous Old King Cole we know in nursery rhymes.

Little is really known of Helena until she was sixty-four years old, when she first became a Christian. It was about the year 325 that she made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem to try and trace out the places where Jesus had been. Helena's son Constantine, though he had become a Christian, and was a great ruler, had done many things which were terribly cruel, and this good mother thought that if she went on this pilgrimage, it might win God's forgiveness for his faults. In those days people thought that a journey to Jerusalem, and prayers uttered in the actual places where Jesus Christ had lived and died, were more likely to be answered than any others. Some people went when they had led a sinful life and had repented, others if they were ill or crippled in any way, but the Empress Helena went to pray for her son. We can only admire her courage and devotion, now that she was getting old, in setting out on such a long and difficult journey, for travelling was a much harder task in those days than it is now.

When St. Helena reached the Holy Land, she found a great deal to do. She had a church built on Mount Calvary, and another on Mount Ascension, and she had the Holy Sepulchre, where tradition said that Christ's body had been laid, cleared from all the rubbish and earth that had gathered there during the passing years. She founded convents, and one account says, that she travelled far and wide: “scattering blessings on the poor and hungry, and releasing captives from their chains.”

The travelling probably wearied her greatly, for she did not live long after her return from the pilgrimage.

Many curious stories are told of her travels in the Holy Land, but the one that is the best known, and which you will most often see in pictures, is about how she found—“the True Cross.”

We are told that on Mount Calvary she found the remains of three crosses, and then a great difficulty arose as to which was the cross of Christ, and which were the crosses which had belonged to the thieves. To try and find out, St. Helena went to the house of a noble lady who was lying very ill. The legend says, that after earnest prayers, the crosses were held one by one over the dying woman, and as the last one was lifted over her bed, she suddenly became quite well again, making everyone feel sure that this must be the cross of Jesus who had healed so many sick people when he was alive.

It is said that St. Helena had a dream which made her long to find the Cross, and in our National Gallery there is a picture called “The Vision of St. Helena,” by Paul Veronese. She is sitting on a kind of balcony, her head resting on her hand, and her eyes closed as if she was asleep. The artist has made her look like a young and beautiful woman and not old, as she must have been. Over her head you see what she is dreaming about, some little angels bearing a cross towards her.

In the British Museum, very carefully kept under a glass case, there is an illuminated book written in Italy in the fifteenth century, which at one time belonged to the church of Santa Croce at Florence. On one of the pages is a brilliant illumination of the story of St. Helena discovering the true Cross, rich in all the wonderful colours which the Florentine artists knew so well how to use. The scene is a kind of hall, and through the doors you can see waving trees. The sick lady is just sitting up in her straight wooden bed, which does not look a very comfortable resting place, in spite of the gorgeous scarlet and gold coverlet which is thrown over it. Two men are holding over her the cross which has just given her back her strength, and the crosses of the two thieves are lying on the ground. A number of people are on the right, and on the left you see St. Helena kneeling, and behind her the train of friends and servants who accompanied her to the East.

There were said to be three nails in the Cross, which St. Helena took for herself. Two of them she sent to her son, hoping that the sight of such precious relics would help him to lead a better and holier life. The third one, it is said, she threw into the Adriatic Gulf to still a terrible storm which was raging, and was threatening to cause many shipwrecks. This is only a legend, but, curiously enough, for a long time afterwards, the sailors in that part of the world used to consider that the water in the Adriatic was sanctified, and they never launched their boats without a prayer and a hymn of praise.

Some time later, in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, a great desire to guard all the places where Christ had lived and taught, arose in the hearts of many people, and lead to the crusades which we read about so often in history. But as this story will tell you, St. Helena was the very first to go to the Holy Land, and see for herself that the sepulchre was kept in order.

The church of St. Helen's, Bishopsgate, was dedicated to this saint. It dates from about 1210, or perhaps earlier, and there are many curious old monuments in it. You will often see her name on streets and buildings in the neighbourhood of the church.

In pictures St. Helena is generally painted crowned and with a cross, the crown to show she was empress as well as saint, and the cross to show how she made her name famous.

AN IMMEDIATE NEED.

WE wonder if the hundreds who attended the recent Whitsuntide meetings at Essex Hall, and the thousands who read the report of those meetings, realised the gravity of the financial position of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Few certainly could forget that during the last four years a certain number of subscribers, at the challenge of one generous and anonymous donor, have liberally increased the resources of the Association. The means thus placed at the disposal of the executive have enabled them to undertake operations on a scale wider than ever before, and this increased work is in great part of such a nature that if it be allowed to cease now, the effect of what has been done must itself be much impaired.

There is serious danger, unless funds promptly and liberally come forward that something like a catastrophe will occur. The report just issued shows (p. 28) that, in consequence of the cessation of some donations which were promised for a certain period only, and losses by death, the subscription list has actually diminished over £900 in the past twelve months. This is bad enough, but worse remains. The "Anonymous Donor," whose secret seems to be very well kept, is evidently not only an exceptionally benevolent man, but also a man of firm resolution; and he holds to his demand that the subscription list must at least be kept at the level recently reached before he will hand over his £1,000. As a matter of fact, the munificent sum just named has usually been paid in early in the year, but here we are with the year almost half gone, and the treasurer is so much the poorer still.

A few, comparatively, amongst our Unitarian families are ever ready to help. Their names are familiar in our mouths as household words, and they are so continuously helpful that a petitioner might well be ashamed to beg of them. Some of these have already stepped forward into the breach, and have assured about a third of the additions required to the subscription list. But there still remains upwards of £600 to be subscribed; if it is not raised, the diminution in the Association's means, it must be remembered, will be not £600, but £1,600. Can we say anything to quicken the enthusiastic zeal of our people to avert such a disaster?

There certainly never was a time when the fields were whiter to harvest for willing labourers. The débacle of the old creeds, of which the so-called "New Theology" movement is but a symptom, the conspicuous success of that liberalism which finds expression in the open council of the Hibbert Journal, the rising level of intelligence in the masses, rendering them less than ever disposed to be content with the old presentations of Christianity,—these are features of life in our time, the significance of which is truly beyond expression. Either the minds of men must be supplied with the elements of rational religion or they will be spiritually starved. Irrational religion they will less and less care for. The activity of agencies that break down all forms of religious faith is without precedent. While men sleep, while the Unitarian of a certain type is lazily dreaming that the whole world is coming round to his opinions, the fact is that young men and women by the thousand, whole families indeed, are simply learning to do without the last relics of religious culture. We speak of "disaster" to an Association's purse—what is that, or the concerns of all such societies together, compared with the disaster to society itself if the well-spring of noblest thought is allowed to dry up?

The real question for Unitarians is whether they shall find life in losing it. While all around them are companies of earnest men and women, of this communion or that, unselfishly giving of their substance and themselves to the service of God in the service of man, and often out of slender worldly resources raising really great sums for this service, we are in far too many cases content to end our giving when it begins ever so slightly to narrow the range of our luxuries. As the good old Christian writer says, "My brethren, these things ought not so to be." Let us provoke one another to better things. Here are we going out, at last, literally into the highways and byeways, to take our message to the great unchurched. It would be fresh stimulus to our self-denying Van evangelists if they could go out knowing that Unitarians at home were at least not letting the central missionary organisation, which has made itself responsible for all the expenses connected with the four Vans, droop for lack of support.

A practical word may be useful in conclusion. Undoubtedly the help of large subscriptions is needed; but let no one who is moved to give hesitate because he cannot give on a large scale. The appeal is urgent, and every hand held out in aid will be welcome.

As we write, our good friend ROBERT COLLYER informs us that the American brethren have answered to an appeal for 150,000 dollars (say £20,000) with all that sum and "fifteen dollars over." Our newly appointed treasurer, Mr. HOWARD CHATFIELD CLARKE, has a heavy task before him; may his labours be lightened by a spontaneous and speedy response from a wide circle of supporters

A FRENCH SCHOOL OF NEW THEOLOGY.*

FIDEISM or Symbolo-Fideism is the name under which a New Theology has sprung up in France. It originated in Paris with Prof. E. Ménégoz and the late Prof. Auguste Sabatier. Prof. Sabatier was responsible for the first half of the dual name, and Prof. Ménégoz for the second half. The somewhat cumbersome form of the expression gave rise to the usage of the second as the better half, and it is under that name, Fideism, that Pastor Hector Haldimann sustained as his thesis for the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, the central doctrine of the Parisian New Theology, which found its expression in the words of Prof. Ménégoz, "Salvation by Faith Independently of Beliefs." This central doctrine was enunciated by Prof. Ménégoz, the head of the Faculty of Protestant Theology in Paris, as far back as 1879. It was set forth in his "Reflexions sur l'Évangile du Salut," and all that he has published since has been merely the development, the exposition, and application of his doctrine. Pastor Hector Haldimann, as a whole-hearted disciple of Prof. Ménégoz, makes the defence of his thesis a labour of love. He expounds it, and defends it with remarkable simplicity, clearness, and fervour. Two great questions preoccupy every thinking man; the question of truth and the question of salvation. On the one hand the painful sense of ignorance and error awakens the need for truth. On the other hand the grievous sense of sin and suffering gives rise, in the Christian consciousness more particularly, to the need for salvation. The condition for salvation is the forgiveness of sin. Faith is the absolute and only condition for forgiveness and salvation. Faith is the consecration of the soul to God, or, as Prof. Ménégoz later more definitely expressed it, "Faith is repentance, and the gift of the heart to God." This is the teaching of Jesus. Is it in harmony with our own consciousness? Yes, for it makes us feel sin to be a rupture of the soul with God, and salvation the return of the soul to God. This return is a free act, a personal act, an act of the entire self. This act is faith. Where the return is sincere, God forgives. He exclaims: "My son, give me thy heart." The heart's response is faith, and the work of faith salvation. The testimony of Jesus and of our own consciousness is supported by that of the prophets and the apostles. And we can thus trace step by step the history of the dogma of the justification by faith in the series of successive testimonies in the Scriptures. These steps are thus summarised from the days of Moses to Jesus.

1. Salvation by obedience to the law.
2. Salvation by the fear of God.
3. Salvation by repentance.
4. Salvation by FAITH.
5. Salvation by Faith without the works of the law.
6. Salvation by Faith, and not by good works.
7. Salvation by Faith, independently of beliefs.

In this simplification of terms is seen the most adequate expression of the thought of Jesus. The proclamation of this faith constitutes the glad tidings to men. "Ah! how great is the joy of him," exclaims M. Ménégoz, "who is assured that an error of thought cannot condemn him, and that God requires of him but one thing, so as to receive him into His grace—his heart." Fideism needs to steer clear of two dangers. On the one hand it must keep clear from an "orthodoxy" which requires consent to the belief in a certain number of dogmas, and on the other hand it must keep clear of a "liberalism" or "rationalism" which lays no stress on the idea of a need for forgiveness; and which is therefore not truly a religion. Fideism is "for mankind as for the individual the divine message of peace, freedom, happiness, salvation. It is the centre and heart of religion. It contains the promises of this life and of the life to come. Let us preach this Gospel to every creature; he who gives his heart to God is saved, whatever his beliefs may be; but he who will not give his heart is lost, be he never so orthodox." Such is a glimpse of the teaching of Prof. Ménégoz as he propounded it some thirty years ago. The name by which this new tendency in theology has come to be known may not be all that an æsthetic fancy could desire; new names very seldom are ingratiating, and they may even be considered "villains noms," but they denote a clearer and healthier religious atmosphere. The atmosphere denoted would be equally sweet by any other name, but until the sweetest names, such as "Christian" and the "Church of God" come to their own again, these make-shift names are only too necessary. As long as we know what is intended to be meant we need not exercise any other virtue but that of gratitude to the authors of them. Aug. Sabatier called his theology religious symbolism (as touching its principles) and critical symbolism (as touching its method). On this, M. Ménégoz (M. Sabatier's friend and fellow-labourer and fellow-struggler for long years) grafted his "Fideism." Symbolo-Fideism founded on history and psychology was enabled to reconcile science and faith. It makes it possible "to reconcile a veneration for traditional symbols with an independence of mind, by leaving believers free to assimilate them and adapt them to their own experiences." Speaking at the funeral of M. Sabatier, M. Ménégoz summed up Sabatier's work in these words, and they express his own position likewise: "He broke, on the one hand, with the authoritative and scholastic method of traditional orthodoxy, and on the other hand with the tendency, more philosophic than religious, of rationalistic radicalism, and he opened up the way to a new, powerful and emancipating theology, founded on an absolutely historical and scientific independence and loyalty, and on that inner testimony which the Spirit of God reveals in the religious consciousness of man, and of which Christ has left us the purest and intensest manifestations."

In the little brochure entitled "Une Triple Distinction Théologique," which is reprinted from the "Revue de Théologie et de Philosophie," and which was read last November before a theological society of ministers in Paris, Prof. Ménégoz offers certain helpful observations on the connection of religious faith with science, history, and philosophy. A believer can only express his faith in the language of his time, hence it is needful to distinguish between faith itself, which constitutes the substance of the religious life, and the accidental and transitory form which faith assumed at any given point of history. The substance, as to its nature, remains always the same; the form is variable and is subject to the laws of evolution. Sacred writers and authors of confessions of faith have not only spoken of religious things; there are in their writings as well, scientific notions, historical statements, and philosophical conceptions, that is to say, elements of a non-religious order which it is not allowable to assimilate with elements specifically religious, and which no one has a right to erect into articles of faith. But this is exactly how religious confusions have arisen. People have confounded science and faith, history and faith, and philosophy and faith. It is against this triple confusion that Prof. Ménégoz would warn those whose concern it is to study religious and theological questions. In the concluding section, entitled "The New Theology and the Old Gospel," M. Ménégoz says, "We have this New Theology, and we profess it. Following the example of the Prophets and the Apostles, the Fathers of the Church, and the Reformers, we adapt, resolutely, our religious knowledge to the conception of the world of our contemporaries. We are reproached with being rationalists, but wrongly, for we found religion not on the premises of reason, but on the immediate action of the Spirit of God present in the spirit of man, and on the religious and moral consciousness which is an effect of this inner divine action. This is the firm rock on which we would establish our life, our beliefs, our theology. This inner testimony of the spirit of God leads us to Christ who draws us by a spiritual affinity as the magnet attracts the iron. Hence the authority of the word of Christ over our souls. Our religious consciousness feels what is religious, and our reason feels what enters into the order of things scientific, historical and philosophical. For my part," says Prof. Ménégoz, "I am more persuaded than ever that the doctrine of salvation by faith alone, that is to say, by repentance and the gift of the heart to God, is the true Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, i.e., religion par excellence, and that just as our correct beliefs have no meritorious virtue before God, so neither are our doctrinal errors a cause of reprobation in His eyes; in a word, that we are saved by faith independently of beliefs. This conviction liberates our conscience from the claims of the scientific, historical, and philosophical notions which orthodoxy offers as constitutive elements of Christian faith. And whilst making us free from these factors it strengthens our religious faith, and gives us a joy and peace which contrast singularly with the agonising trouble that doubt produces in a mind dominated by the principles of orthodoxy. . . . I desire to communicate my happiness to all those who, as I once was, are tormented by these doubts, and I would imbue their soul with the feeling of certainty that, according to the eternal Gospel, there are no other conditions of salvation, but the inner avoidance of sin and the approach of the self to God, and that, according to the spirit of this Gospel, we are absolutely free in respect of the scientific, historical and philosophical notions of the Bible and of traditional theology.

"When men at once religious and cultured are penetrated with these truths, the path that leads to the Gospel will be effectually cleared, and the Church of Christ having recovered its place at the head of men's enlightened movement will resume its conquering march in the world, and will struggle more victoriously than ever against her only and eternal enemy, sin. Then the conflict between religious faith and non-religious thought will be appeased, and the essential organs of our spiritual life will have regained their inner harmony, and will lend each other a mutual aid towards the moral health of individuals, and the prosperity of every social and national combination."

Postscript.

Eighteen years ago, at the end of my college course, I chanced to meet Dr. Martineau at the door of University Hall, London, and was drawn into one of those easy conversations that made intercourse with him so pleasant, in spite of a kind of awe that suggested flight and a Levitical or Priestly disposition to pass him by on the other side. He had heard that I had not yet finished my education, and that I was turning my thoughts to France. He wanted to know what I was going to do there—theologically, of course. I am afraid I began by saying something about first polishing up my French and then going in for a little French polish, and then I alluded to the Sorbonne, and to the motto of the University, "Omnia docet." All of which seemed to impress him. But, as Oliver Goldsmith says, "unequal combinations are always disadvantageous to the weaker side," and I think Dr. Martineau must have seen in me a budding Moses, Moses Primrose, of course. He seemed prophetically to see me returning to my English Alma Mater, and on being asked by her what I had brought back for my three pounds five shillings and two pence, exclaiming, like that cherub, "Dear mother, a gross of green spectacles with silver rims and shagreen cases," only to be greeted by my irate Alma Mater with "A murrain take such trumpery! The blockhead has been imposed upon and should have known his company better." To prevent such a catastrophe, and to forestall destiny, Dr. Martineau suggested the probable wisdom of joining the quite diminutive Faculty of Protestant Theology in Paris, and of making the acquaintance of Professor Ménégos, the principal of the college, of whom he spoke with warm admiration. And all in good time I did so, although unable to resist a disposition occasionally to prowl about the ancient and modern Sorbonne, and to aspire after the omniscience proffered at the gates of the University.

I made the acquaintance of Professor Ménégos under various circumstances, generally as a listener to his lectures. Once I heard him preach in German—for he was an Alsatian—in a gloomy German church in Paris. Once I was at a student's soirée, where he was present; and on one occasion I partook of a most frugal (almost ascetic) meal with the principal and his students. A few of us afterwards retired to M. Ménégos's study (or perhaps tutor's room) and asceticism relaxed into cigars and a gloria,—scilicet, a diminutive, but delightful cup of coffee, touched with the merest suspicion of cognac, like Matthew Arnold's religion, "morality touched with emotion." And all this and much else, through a casual contact with Dr. Martineau in Gordon-square. Felix qui potuit rerum cognoscere causas! E. L. H. T.

THE RELATION OF UNITARIANS TO THE CHURCHES.*

BY THE REV. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.

"The relation of Unitarians to the Churches," what does it matter to them, or even to us? Is not our relationship that of an insignificant and unorganised group of politician to the Imperial Parliament, or of a small body of ill-trained volunteers to a disciplined battalion? We have been accused of forming a "great denominational chorus of self-laudation," and I have been told that I was myself a prominent performer. But I do not think any of us have our eyes closed to the great disadvantages under which we labour, or are ignorant of the immense superiority of other denominations in certain respects in which we try and greatly fail.

We are wanting in numbers, in funds, in enthusiasm, in unity. We have about 350 chapels, and if membership be taken among us to imply regular attendance and real attachment to our cause, I would rather not make a guess at what it may amount to.

Our Association has an income of £8,000 a year. Our Sunday scholars are 35,000. To compare ourselves with, let us say Wesleyan Methodists, of whom I happen to have last year's statistics—they have 2,658 ministers, nearly 20,000 lay preachers, more than a million scholars, and half a million members, and spent in one year, £200,000 on mission work at home and abroad and £437,000 on chapel building in Great Britain. Think of what this means, the faith and self-denial and energy and oneness of aim, and remember, that more or less similar accounts could be given of a dozen great religious bodies in the United Kingdom, and you will probably be inclined to take a very humble place in the list of the Christian denominations of our country or of the world, and instead of asking what is our relation to them, inquire how we may profit of the example they set us.

Yet there is another side to the question of our relative position, and painfully conscious as I often am of our failures and shortcomings, I am constantly reminded of the wise words of that mysterious person Agur, the son of Jakeh, which are recorded in the thirtieth chapter of the Book of Proverbs:

"There be four things which are little upon earth,

But they are exceeding wise;

The ants are a people not strong,

Yet they provide their meat in the summer;

The conies are but a feeble folk,

Yet make their houses in the rocks;

The locusts have no king,

Yet go they forth all of them in bands;

The lizard thou mayst hold in thy hand,

Yet is he in king's palaces."

Now if we disclaim the doubtful translation "exceeding wise" and prefer to read "are reckoned among the wise," we may surely be permitted to rank ourselves with the ants and rabbits, the locusts and the lizards, and claim something of their lowly merits and success. Not ours the majesty of lion or keen sight of eagle or endurance of horse, but we are possessed of more than the ordinary measure of prudence and stability, and united action in perfect freedom, and more by far than what we are entitled to by our numbers are we represented in the palaces of industry and government and law.

So we take our humble seat at the foot of the table, although no voice bids us come up higher, yet is it not altogether presumption to cherish the belief that we have a faith and a mission high out of all proportion to either our success or our deserts.

So we lift head and look around us, unabashed to be dissenters from dissenters and excluded from the communion even of the excommunicate. There, at the high table sit my lord bishops, tracing their spiritual pedigree back to Augustine and the Apostles, and crowding on them the representatives of the august see of Rome. Beneath, not held undeserving of occasional recognition are the Trinitarian sects, conspicuous, some of them, by their numbers and zeal. And here, out in the cold, shunned of all, sit we, our right to seats at all at a Christian feast seriously questioned or openly denied.

And what is our relation to these, all our brethren, whether they will it or not, our superiors in so many respects as we willingly own? Why are they united to condemn us, though they differ among themselves more widely than we differ from many of them? It is not that we deny this or that doctrine which they are agreed on. Holding to our fundamental principles and proclaiming them, we should still be outsiders even if we used Trinitarian formulæ and prayed to Jesus as the Son of God.

The difference between a Romanist and a Protestant consists essentially not in the things the one believes and the other denies, but in the motive of belief. The belief of the one rests upon the authority of the Church; that of the other on the Prayer Book or the Fathers or the Bible, or all three together. "I believe all things whatsoever Holy Church believes, and teaches," that is the profession which makes a man a Catholic. He may be ignorant of almost all the things; he may think them quite other than they are, yet if sincere in his profession, he is a member of the Church, while the learned theologian who agrees with the Church's teaching simply because it commends itself to him as reasonable and true, remains still outside.

Now, there is just a similar difference between the self-styled "orthodox" Christian of whatever denomination he be and the Unitarian by whatever name he call himself. It is the very idea of Orthodoxy which we reject—the implication that there is a certain belief which accords with a definite and authoritative revelation, and consequently that to believe otherwise or to disbelieve is a sin against God, whose word we reject and whose way we refuse to walk in.

"Whosoever will be saved, before all things it is necessary that he believe, and, if he do not, without doubt"—well, it is and will be the worse for him. That is the preamble of all forms of Orthodoxy. That is what we—and no doubt with us the great bulk of mankind in the past and present—deny.

So we have come to this, that our quarrel with those whom we regard as in many respects our dear friends and allies, however they may fear and frown upon us, is not that they believe what we do not, but that they attach to belief an importance which we deny to it. For us it is not a duty, it is not even a merit, to believe or to disbelieve; it is a duty, and a duty inconsistent with any obligation of belief, to seek the truth and hold by and profess it.

"Brethren," we say, to the elder and the greater churches as to the newest and least, "you put us to shame often enough by the devotion and learning and good works and power of winning souls which in various degrees are conspicuous among you. In this you fail, as it seems to us, that you set faith above truth, that you start with assuming what you set about to prove, that your answer is ready and obligatory on you ere you durst ask the question, "What is truth?" You are not really free, you have bound yourselves or allowed yourselves to be bound. You dare not, or you do not ask, "Is this which I have been taught true?" prepared to find that it is not.

So, as men poorly dressed we sit below our betters, but cannot refrain from a certain satisfaction—which we are often reproached for feeling and giving utterance to—that we are free, while our nobly clad friends are heaped with gilded chains, and those more like ourselves make it a boast that they, too, are not wholly unencumbered. If they have not thirty-nine articles to avouch, they have at least "essentials" and "fundamentals" to maintain, which suffice for a certain grim adornment.

We have none; and if we have inherited a name which sounds dogmatic, and might seem to impose upon us a certain theory of the Godhead, we disown the obligation. "If there be something better than Unitarianism that too is Unitarianism," wrote one of our most earnest ministers not long ago. The words are paradoxical, and were ridiculed by one who should have understood them, but they are wise and sober and rest upon an historic foundation. For Unitarianism is a principle and not a doctrine, and it embraces whatever may be after us approved as true, or truer than what we now accept.

Yet, we do quite wrong to suppose that only we of the Unitarian churches are free, or even that we are altogether free, and that no silken cords of tradition and custom and prejudice hinder us in the pursuit of truth. In other churches there are men who claim freedom and who exercise it, often at no little cost to themselves. If ministers they are at times forced to give up their pulpits, or if supported by the devotion of their congregations they have to put up with the desertion of old friends and the reproach of men who once esteemed them, all the harder to bear because they themselves have not changed in their esteem for their former elders and comrades.

What is our relation to such as these? There are some among us who insist that such men are really Unitarians, that they ought openly to take the name and join the body, that they are not honest in calling themselves Congregationalists or Baptists, and that they hold on through fear of loss of popularity or income.

To others of us all such talk seems to be simply a paraphrase of the disciples, "We forbade him, because he follows not with us." It comes of the original sin of sectarianism or communal selfishness which besets every organisation and makes its adherents prefer its welfare and advantage to the very cause which it advocates. They are honestly seeking the truth and are openly speaking what they believe to be true, but they are fain to claim truth as a monopoly of their body, and forbid the acceptance of it to those who are not willing to join their ranks.

Such men would indeed be welcome among us and a source of renewed life and energy, but why should they take a name with which they have no associations, a name which many of the most eminent among us put up with rather than approve of? Why should they disown the connection which tolerates if it does not approve them? Would it advance the cause of freedom and progress in religion which we profess to have at heart if they were to exchange large congregations for small ones, and sacrifice the great influence they possess in their own denominations? Do they offend against the trust deeds of their chapels? But if the trust deed is admitted to the rank of a moral obligation and is to be literally and legally interpreted, we should find it hard to defend our own right to our older foundations. Do they conceal their real belief? On the contrary, the charge against them is they declare it only too frankly.

We should welcome them then as our allies and fellow-workers, fighting under another flag and wearing a different uniform, but for the same cause which we uphold; and if our good brother, Mr. Campbell, had come to lecture to us to-night, I doubt not but that we should have given him such a reception as would have assured him of the hearty and unsectarian sympathy of our association in his present labours and trials.

EXPERIMENTS IN SOCIALISM.

IV.*

THE CHRISTIAN REPUBLIC.

THE socialistic experiment which seems to have impressed the world more than any other was that of the Jesuits in South America. The strongest opponents of Socialism are fain to admit that the "Christian Republic" was a wonderful success. Even Voltaire, with all the rancour of his prejudice against everything that called itself Christian, frankly admitted that this community seemed to represent the very triumph of humanity. But then, say the individualistic commentators, it was a purely artificial system of things, entirely created and maintained by the Catholic priesthood. When the Jesuits were turned out of it the whole thing collapsed like a house of cards.

Now that is perfectly true. It was a very artificial system indeed, and from beginning to end it was directed and governed by priests under the virtual dictatorship of the Jesuit superior at Candelaria. And it is true, also, that when, after 150 years of priestly control, that control was suddenly withdrawn by the total expulsion of the Jesuits from Paraguay, so little vitality was there in their social system, and so little manly independence had their paternal government engendered in their people, that the whole thing literally vanished. The "Christian Republic" broke up; the people dispersed, and to a large extent lapsed back into the barbarism in which the Jesuits had found them, and the whole of their twenty or thirty settlements crumbled into ruins. Nevertheless, it was a most curious and interesting experiment, and though it need hardly be said that under the Jesuits there was a good deal about it that few of us to-day would have at any price, there were points in the system that may well be considered both for suggestion and caution in our social speculations at the present time.

It was really a wonderful achievement, and shows what may be done, even with savages, by getting back to first principles in religion and sociology. At the very time that Lord Bacon was writing his "New Atlantis," setting forth his ideal society, and while the Pilgrim Fathers were painfully hammering out some sort of method of living together in Massachusetts, a little group of Spanish missionary priests had actually developed in the wilds of South America a society which seemed to embody most of the philosopher's fantastic dreamings, and many excellent features of which the Pilgrim Fathers were probably quite incapable of conceiving even in their dreams. It was not a small society either, or of very brief duration. The Jesuits landed on the coast of Brazil in 1608, and by the middle of the century they had 100,000 people living under conditions which, to the superficial observer at least, seemed as near perfection as this troublesome world had ever attained to since Eden was disparked. The 100,000 people were not massed together in one large town; nor, on the other hand, were they very thinly scattered. They were grouped in settlements or "reductions," as they were called, of somewhere about 5,000 each on an average, thus avoiding the dangers of congested centres on the one hand, and the dulness and want of interest of isolated country life on the other. Of these settlements the most captivating accounts have been given. "It was a model of order and regularity," writes a distinguished American of one of them. "Perfect uniformity was observed in its long, comfortably built rows of houses, and the small circuit of the towns afforded every facility for preserving its domestic tranquillity, or ensuring a ready defence against outside danger. The great square was the centre-point, the public resort, and the general rendezvous of the people. Upon it were erected the church, the college, the arsenal, the stores, the workshops of carpenters, joiners, weavers and smiths, together with other important public buildings. . . . The reduction moved and had its being, as it were, with the precision of clockwork. The people prayed and toiled and slept so long and no longer; from one duty or employment they passed to another, like soldiers changing guard, equally participating in the changes of the day, each one undergoing his measure of fatigue for the one and common family." Of the whole "Christian Republic" another writer says an equal balance of mind and health of body was the ideal of the Jesuit Fathers, and this ideal they attained to a marvellous extent. "Regulated liberty, abundant supplies of all the necessities of life for each family; a tiny home indeed, but large enough for all purposes; peace, union, concord, chastity, soberness, and calm enjoyment of life prevailed among the people of Paraguay. The cultivation of music and the dance at festivals, martial processions and tournaments, with prizes for the victors, provided innocent amusement. Religious pageants on special occasions were held to satisfy the craving for novelty and sensuous enjoyment among the people, and to keep before their eyes symbols of higher ideals."

Now these 100,000 people of the "Christian Republic," when the Jesuits found them, were merely savages, living in caves and woods, and subsisting by the chase. They were, it is true, apparently a good deal more gentle and docile than many of the savages of our own big towns; but, compared with the great mass of our own poor, it is difficult to believe that the material with which these Jesuits set themselves to deal at the beginning of the seventeenth century, and which by a marvellously tactful combination of gentleness and firmness they shaped into a society perfectly ideal in some respects—it is difficult to believe that the raw material of their society was easier to deal with than our own would be found to be, if only we could go the same way to work. A great deal has been made of the childlike simplicity and amiability of these South American Indians, and some good people have seen an almost diabolical cunning and astuteness in the doings of the Jesuits on behalf of their Church. One cannot, however, help feeling that if our own church people would display a little similar astuteness—diabolical or otherwise—and could approach our own poor savages in a similar way, they would very likely attain similar results. And if, instead of conducting their operations in the good old fatherly fashion of the Tories of all churches and all ages, they would respect the manhood and womanhood of the people, and be their guides and leaders instead of their autocrats, as the Jesuits were, their work would have the permanency in which, when the test came—though it came only at the end of 150 years—this Jesuit work proved so conspicuously wanting.

After all, what did these churchmen do that our own churchmen could not do if they all really wished to do it and could all unite together in the advocacy of a great work of practical religion, involving the health and happiness of nothing less than the great mass of the people? The Jesuits, when they went out across the Southern Atlantic in the trail of the Spanish conquering expeditions, found a people engaged in a daily fight for a precarious living, exposed to the harassing of enemies stronger than themselves, with no homes worth speaking of, no peace or comfort or security—nothing but a hard life of struggle and privation, of difficulty and anxiety: not altogether unlike our own poor savages, surely it must be admitted. But how did the Jesuits commend their Church and their religion to these poor people? In a very few years we hear of all the children in these settlements rising at daybreak and flocking into handsome churches to be instructed and catechised; of the whole adult population turning out to Mass at sunrise; then to their daily labours and the closing of the peaceful and prosperous day with the music of the vesper bell and the voice of united prayer. Our churches cannot “get hold” of the people. How did the Jesuits manage it? Was it by the supernatural power of the abstract truths they taught, or the fervid devotion of their own lives? Nothing of the kind. There was power in many of the truths they taught, and their own self-devotion seems sometimes to have risen quite to the heroic, and thus they won the confidence of the people; but we have the same truths—and purer and better, too—and among our religious teachers there is a self-devotion that wants only the same scope and opportunity to rise to the same high level.

The fact is that the Jesuits made the crucifix they held aloft amid these harassed South American savages the symbol not only of peace with heaven, but of a regenerated earth. They identified themselves with all the people's interests. Worried by native enemies and foreign invasion, these poor Indians wanted peace and security, and their new teachers gave them arms and drilled them and taught them to fortify themselves. They wanted homes, and the Jesuits gave them tools and helped them to cut down trees and build themselves comfortable cabins. They were dependent on the chase for their living, and the Jesuits explained that God had spread abroad the land as the one great source of all food for men and animals alike, and they taught them agriculture.

Here again we get back to the same inevitable point. The Jesuits represented the conquerors of the country, and the Kings of Spain were their Suzerains. They were absolute masters of the land, and could do with it as they pleased. If they had not been, and could not have got access to it, they might still have drilled the people into an army; and though they might have been secure against aggression, the more they were drilled the poorer they might have become. They might have taught the people to build houses and churches, and to make clothes and furniture, but for food they must have been absolutely dependent on their ability to find some market for their surplus production of these things, and we know too well what that means for a very large proportion of our own people. But they had free access to fine expanses of fertile land, and out of this, by very rudimentary agriculture, they fetched abundance of food by an amount of labour which still left them leisure not only for religious services, for ample rest and amusement, but for making everything they required for their own use, and such a surplus for export that their masters, the Jesuits, through whom all outside trading was, of course, conducted, were accused of living in luxury and even splendour—though it was supposed to be a communism, and a republic ruled by a representative assembly. The representative council was said to be only a pious fraud, and it is more than likely it was. But, however that may have been, the “republic” grew rich, and the people were happy and contented. They had common lands tilled for the common good—including the treasury of the King of Spain, and, of course, the amplest provision for Mother Church. But, besides these communal lands, every man had his own “small holding” and his own herd of cattle. On such a basis of productiveness, and with a people under the powerful dominance of a religion the truth of which seemed to be guaranteed by its practical effect on all the interests of life, how could these hundred thousand people fail to be prosperous, whatever the real form of their government may have been? And how could the churches of England fail to “get hold” of the masses if they got hold of the same principles, and in the same way, mutatis mutandis, brought their religion to bear on the lives of the common people?

GEORGE F. MILLIN.

DREAM not of a heaven into which you may enter, live here as you may. To such as waste the present state the future will not, cannot bring happiness. There is no concord between them and that world of purity. A human being who has lived without God, and without self-improvement, can no more enjoy Heaven than a mouldering body, lifted from the tomb and placed amidst beautiful prospects, can enjoy the light through its decayed eyes, or feel the balmy air which blows away its dust. Immortality is a glorious doctrine; but not given us for speculation or amusement. Its happiness is to be realised only through our own struggles with ourselves, only through our own reaching forward to new virtue and piety. To be joined with Christ in Heaven, we must be joined with him now in spirit, in the conquest of temptation, in charity and well-doing. Immortality should begin here. The seed is now to be sown which is to expand for ever. “Be not weary then, in well-doing; for in due time we shall reap, if we faint not.”—Channing.

LONDON SUNDAY-SCHOOL SOCIETY COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.

SIR,—May I appeal to the generosity of your readers to help us with our Country Holiday Fund, for which at least £30 are still required before the end of June, if we are to be able to give the contributions for which the London schools are looking to us. Many of last year's subscribers have most generously come to our aid again this year; but there are some whose subscriptions have not yet reached me, and I should be very grateful if they would send me their gifts as soon as possible. May I also appeal to other friends for help? The fund is collected to contribute a portion of a scholar's holiday for a fortnight. The object is surely one which should appeal to all who are themselves hoping shortly to enjoy the relaxations of the country or the seaside.

MANIFESTATION NOT REVELATION.

SIR,—In your report of my remarks at the Conference on the New Theology, I am represented as saying that man's love of justice makes him fight against what his religious philosophy declares to be a “revelation” of God. I may have used the word “manifestation,” but hardly “revelation.” I take it that any Pantheist, Theistic Determinist, or believer in the Immanence of God must philosophically regard all things that are as in some sense a manifestation of God; but, on the other hand, everyone who appeals to the Divine aid for support and inspiration in the conflict with evil, must feel that the will of God is revealed to him as righteousness and love, and that it bids him fight against all wrong. Many, and I take it Mr. Campbell is one of them, are conscious of both these trends of thought and emotion, whether they can formally reconcile them or no; and such must feel within them the command of God to fight against things which their creed nevertheless represents as in some sense a part of the Divine will, or manifestation of the Divine power. But I cannot understand any sense in which a man could feel moved to fight against what he regarded as a “revelation” of God.

I will not trouble you with other corrections, but shall be glad if you can find room for this.—Yours, &c.,

THE CHURCH OF THE PEOPLE. 7

SIR,—Your “Correspondent” evidently does not know what has happened. But can he really think that we have neglected the very elementary attempts he indicates? Let me tell him what happens. For years we shut up the Great Meeting in Leicester for all the winter months, and went to a huge hall only a few hundred yards away. The audience at once rose from 150 to

2,500. When, at the end of the season, we went back to the chapel, and held precisely the same kind of service, with precisely the same teaching, we went back to the old 150, with a few, a very few, additions. The same thing happened years before in Sheffield and Glasgow. The same thing happened in Croydon; and probably the same thing will happen in London if, as is probable, I go out once more to "the man in the street."

The matter goes immeasurably farther down than your "Correspondent" with his "basket" indicates; and the real question, is whether we are prepared to face facts and act accordingly. It may not be possible, but we ought to try.

Heartily yours,

June 1.

J. PAGE HOPPS.

"THE MAN IN THE STREET."

SIR,—Apropos of the suggestions of your "Correspondent" who heard the Rev. J. Page Hopps on "The Man in the Street," I received a letter a few days since from a working man (to whom I had lent a book), expressing some opinions which may be interesting. Referring to this book he says: "One thing that strikes me in a very pleasing way, and makes me feel on friendly terms with the writer, is the way he tackles social and political questions. I suppose I ought not to criticise educated men, but so many ministers seem to me to leave the social side of life completely in the background. Perhaps, if they spoke more about this, the working classes would find their way into the churches in greater numbers than they do. You see, so many workmen talk politics, municipal and national, during the week, and it seems to me if the preacher on Sunday were to intermingle social and political affairs with so-called religious affairs, the worker would naturally have in mind a considerable part of the preceding Sunday's sermon, and would bring it out in conversation with his mates.

"If the preacher, on his part, will not connect the every-day life of the worker with his religious life, he should not blame the worker for not bringing religion into his every-day life. I feel rather strongly on this matter, and though I cannot express myself well I can speak from and understand the workman's point of view.

"I think it would have made a lot of difference to me if I had known how to connect the religious teaching I received with my every-day life. But it seems to me, looking backward, that they were entirely separated."

Does not this seem to be evidence that if we are to gather these intelligent, if not educated men, into our churches, something of the kind indicated must be done?

THE fourth of Mr. G. F. Millin's articles on "Experiments in Socialism" appears in our present issue. We were asked the other day what books Mr. Millin had written. A shilling popular edition of his "Commerce and Christianity" was published two years ago by Messrs. Sonnenschein & Co., in whose Social Science series two other books of his are included, "The Social Horizon" and "The Village Problem."

PURITANISM IN THE ABBEY.*

THE brief rule of Puritanism in our cathedrals, abbeys, and parish churches is an intensely interesting subject which has never yet received adequate treatment. It would involve some painstaking research. Not only must the State Papers of the period be read and digested, but also the local records and registers of Wells, Worcester, Yarmouth, Romsey, St. Albans, Westminster, and other places. Mr. Boseley, in the work under notice, speaks of "much important information culled from the Guildhall, Dr. Williams', and other public libraries, as well as from the archives at Somerset House," but he does not show much evidence of this "extensive research." Such second-hand sources as Dr. Stoughton's work appear to be relied upon, and the author never seems to think it necessary to give the precise source of his quotations for possible verification. This is not the way to write history, nor is Mr. Boseley's temper that of the historian. An enthusiastic believer in the Divine right of Independency, he appears to think that party could do no wrong. "Though a minority in Parliament"—and, our author might have added, in the nation—"they became so strong in the army as to rise to supreme power in the State. . . . They were contending with traitors rather than with aliens, and their supreme concern was to learn the Divine Will, and at all costs to obey it" (p. 54, 55.)

That is certainly what this powerful minority claimed; but then, the majority, consisting of Anglicans, Presbyterians, Catholics, and others, also claimed the very same thing, and they were not traitors, because they objected to the rule of this minority.

The piety which raised those noble structures, the abbeys and cathedrals, to the glory of God, and the reverent delight of future generations must be contrasted with the zeal which walled off goodly nave and aisle and chancel into the chapels of separate sects.

Wells Cathedral was "divided into two parts by a brick wall." It was ordered "that the chancel" (of St. Nicholas Church, Great Yarmouth) "should be closed in with main walls where needful and fitted up for a Church House."

Fortunately, we must say, the Puritan ascendancy in these buildings was of brief duration. This does not lessen its interest, nor its claim to adequate treatment at the hands of some competent historian.

It must surely be a printer's error which gives the year 1631 as the date for Wat Tyler's rebellion; but why the author should consider it necessary to make random statements which have no connection, or only the very remotest, with his subject, is not easy to determine. It must be a very erroneous printer, for we are also told that "On December 29, 1657, Sir Nicholas Bacon, Kt., Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, delivered an oration in the Star Chamber against Papal intrigues." It is not a mere error in figures which states that the Rev. Samuel Lee was ejected by the Rump Parliament, after "Dr. Wilkinson" (the name should be Wilkins), by conforming, had been made Bishop of Chester. According to Calamy, he was "ejected and silenced by the Bartholomew Act."

After its expulsion from the Abbey, the Independent Congregation made a home for itself in the shadow of St. Bartholomew's Church, and the connection of this most ancient of London's churches with Nonconformity is interesting. Mr. Boseley's book is interesting. More accuracy and less diffuseness might have made it valuable.

ASSOCIATION OF IRISH NON-SUBSCRIBING PRESBYTERIANS.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL CONFERENCE, NEW-TOWNARDS.

ON Saturday, June 1, a conference of persons interested in the religious training of the young was held in the First (Old) Presbyterian Church, Newtownards. The weather was treacherous, but there was an attendance of about 350.

THE PRESIDENT (Rev. W. H. Drummond) said this Sunday-school conference was fast becoming one of the most important and largely attended meetings of Non-subscribing Presbyterians in Ireland. After two resolutions, moved by consent—one in favour of a scheme for the better training of scholars in Bible knowledge, and one in favour of accepting an invitation to the conference to hold the assembly in Larne in 1908, Rev. EDGAR LOCKETT read a paper, the subject being "The Purpose and Ideal of the Sunday-school Teacher." Among other conceptions of the object of the Sunday-school, he selected that which regarded it as a supplement to the Christian church. The great purpose of the Sunday-school was to bring the children and the young men and maidens to a knowledge and experience of the redemptive love of God. This being so, the purpose of the Sunday-school teacher must be to endeavour by the influence of his personality and teaching to communicate the power and wisdom and love of God to his scholars. With the saving power of God's love in his own heart he is to seek to save those entrusted to his care from the evils which beset their path. Christianity had always been a missionary religion, a religion of redemption. Its living head was and is a Saviour from sin, and the disciple of Christ was sent in his spirit to do the same work that he did, to be a witness to the power of God unto salvation. The speaker took the word "witness" to illustrate the purpose and qualification of the teacher. A true teacher was one who knows and imparts his knowledge to others. "Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord, and my servant whom I have chosen, that ye may know and trust me and understand that I am He, and beside me there is no Saviour." These words from Isaiah, he said, described the essential elements of witnessing on God's behalf, namely, personal knowledge and trust in Him as a Saviour. It was the mark of a true witness that He delivereth souls, and such a witness could come only from one who himself knew and trusted the soul's deliverer. The teacher could not effectually teach religion until he had a personal experience of religion. He said that this witnessing for God as the result of knowing Him and being known of Him rested upon faith in the reality of the Holy Spirit—the presence and power of God working in and with man. They wanted a deeper and richer spiritual life. If they were to have religion taught in their schools—and how great was their need of it!—they must, as teachers, know what religion meant by a personal knowledge and experience of it. He was convinced that this was their crying need. They might possibly require reorganisation of method or material, but their great need was not reorganisation but regeneration in the Holy Spirit.

In the discussion that followed the paper, Rev. CHAS. THRIFT, Rev. J. A. KELLY, M. J. KELLEHER, Miss MELLONE, and the chairman took part.

Rev. Dr. MELLONE proposed a vote of thanks to the chairman and Mr. Lockett and the hosts of the day.

Rev. ALFRED TURNER seconded the vote which, being carried by acclamation, the CHAIRMAN and Mr. LOCKETT replied, as did Rev. R. M. KING on behalf of his Newtownards congregation, and those of Greyabbey and Ballyhenchin. The company were afterwards entertained to tea, and the proceedings throughout were felt to have been as successful and satisfactory, as well as useful, as any conferences of previous years.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Bermondsey.—The flower service and anniversary of the Sunday-school was held at Fort-road Unitarian Church last Sunday. Mr. John Harrison should have addressed the children in the afternoon, but was prevented by an engagement in Paris. The address was accordingly given by the minister. In the evening the Rev. Jesse Kipperson addressed the children, teachers, and friends in turn from 1 Chron. iv. 23. The address was illustrated by original parables from Nature. The thanks of the Sunday-school teachers are due to Mr. F. Nettlefold, of Streatham-grove; Mr. F. Ruck, Maidstone; Mrs. Ellis, Guildford; Mr. Evershed, Clapham, and others, for floral contributions.

Blackburn (Appointment).—The Rev. E. W. Sealy, M.A. (Oxon), has been offered and has accepted the pulpit of the Blackburn Unitarian Church. The movement was started in November, 1905, and after a successful existence of eighteen months, the committee felt justified in recommending the congregation to appoint Rev. E. W. Sealy as the first resident minister. A recognition meeting will be held on Saturday, June 15, when it is hoped that various ministers of the district will be present.

Cardiff.—The services at Westgrove Church last Sunday were conducted by Mrs. John Page Hopps, who took for the subject of her discourse in the morning: "Concerning the Bearing of Burdens"; and in the evening, "Where the Spirit of the Lord is there is Liberty." There was a large congregation present, both morning and evening.

Lewes.—After the evening service on Sunday, 3rd inst., the choir at the Westgate Chapel gave H. E. Nichol's cantata, "The Prodigal Son," before an appreciative congregation, which included a number of friends of other denominations. The solos were rendered by Miss Hopper, Miss E. Broadbent, Mr. F. J. Wells, and Master Stanley Broadbent, Miss Funnell presided at the organ. A collection was taken in aid of the choir fund.

London: Hackney.—Wednesday last was the first day of the Bazaar and Country Fair held at the King's Hall, Holborn Restaurant, by the Hackney congregation. At the opening the sun shone, and Dr. W. B. Odgers, on taking the chair, had a good company before him. He alluded to the long and honourable history of the congregation, dating practically from the time when Dr. Spurstowe resigned the rectorship of the parish church of the then village of Hackney, and gathering, in the course of time, associations with the names of many distinguished men—Priestley, Price, Belsham, the Asplands, and others. Lady Durning Lawrence, in declaring the bazaar open, expressed in a few kindly and well-chosen words, her cordial sympathy with the object of the bazaar, and her good wishes for its success. A vote of thanks to Lady Durning Lawrence and Dr. Odgers was proposed by Rev. H. Rawlings, also to Madame Marian McKenzie, who sang the National Anthem and "Come, lasses and lads." These proceedings over, the company dispersed to the stalls, which looked very pretty and were well supplied with goods. Business was at first on a generous scale, then, however, came heavy rain, which probably much reduced the evening attendance. Mr. Oswald Nettlefold opened on Thursday, and at the close it was found the bazaar had been highly successful.

Midlands.—The 759th monthly meeting of Protestant Dissenting Ministers of Warwickshire and neighbouring counties was held at Evesham on Wednesday, May 29. Service was held in the chapel at 12.15 p.m., the preacher being the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury. At the business meeting held at the close of service, the secretary was requested to convey to Mrs. Lloyd a resolution of sympathy with her in the great loss she has sustained. Luncheon was provided in the schoolroom, Mr. Geoffrey New being in the chair. The usual toasts were proposed and responded to, amongst the speakers being the Rev. Dr. Odgers, of Oxford, and Mr. Barnard, of Ceylon. Later the members adjourned for tea to Wortley House, at the kind invitation of Mrs. Cliff.

Stannington (near Sheffield).—The Sunday-school anniversary services were celebrated at Underbank Chapel last Sunday, June 2. Principal Gordon, of the Home Missionary College, Manchester, conducted the service, and preached both afternoon and evening. The sermons, plain practical discourses on the Will and on the Greatness of Christ, were much appreciated, that in the evening evoking decided enthusiasm in the crowded congregation. As usual the choir, conducted by Mr. G. Vickers, was augmented by several friends from the outside, including some from our neighbours the Wesleyans; and the singing was accompanied by a small band of musical instruments. The day, though not in a strict sense fine, was less unfavourable than previous indications had led us to expect; and the collections, since augmented by generous contributions from friends in Sheffield, have given much encouragement to the working members of this remote, but not unimportant, congregation.

Swansea.—A flower service was held on Sunday, the first since the departure from the town of Dr. Tudor Jones. Numerous scholars brought with them various tinted blossoms, which, when piled tastefully together, presented a very pleasing spectacle. A satisfactory sign, showing that the church feels a pulse of interest in the work among the young people, was afforded in the attendance of many adults. The scholars recited, and three members of the choir contributed solos. A valuable address was given by Miss Brock, who deeply interested the children by her nature stories.

Miss E. L. PEARSON's appeal, in another column, for funds to send children into the country for a breath of pure air is one that needs no pressing. Very little imagination is needed to suggest what "the country" means for our city bairns; no pleasanter or wiser gift could easily be devised.

THESE (Truth, Beauty, Goodness) are the three objects of all human aspiration; and our hearts will never be at peace till all three alike rest in God.—W. R. Inge.

A MINISTER writes:—"An American, who gives the names of well-known Unitarian ministers in U.S.A., is endeavouring to obtain names of Unitarian ministers and laymen in London. At present he is in the Hampstead district. May I inform anyone he calls upon that I have fully investigated his case a fortnight ago. The American Society in Southampton-row has offered to render help if the case is a deserving one. The man has the address of the office, and also a letter sent to me asking him to call there. This he has failed to do so far, but says that the American Society won't help him (which is incorrect). He is a well-educated man, medium height, moustache, and well up in facts concerning American Unitarianism."

LOVE ISN'T EVERYTHING

Even temper and no worry contributes an equal share to domestic happiness. Ironing days upset the temper and cause worry if you do not use the "Dalli" Box Iron or the "Dallinette" (a smaller "Dalli"). To use them is the best, most simple, and most comfortable way of ironing. Self-heating with non-inflammable fuel without noxious fumes, therefore no risk from fire. Healthier and safer than any other iron.

The "Dallinette" is a smaller "Dalli." Really excellent for light work and travelling. For general household work use the "Dalli." Having a larger ironing surface and greater heating capacity, every description of ironing can be done with it.

Price of the "Dalli" 6/-, price of the "Dallinette" 5/9. "Dalli" Fuel 1/9 per box of 128 blocks. Of all Ironmongers and Stores. If any difficulty apply to THE DALLI SMOKELESS FUEL Co., 4 and 6, Moor Lane, London, E.C.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE are desired to urge all who propose attending the meetings of the International Council at Boston in September, and who have not already booked their berths, to make speed, as, owing to the large number of Americans who will be returning home, several of the steamers have no vacant places left. Copies of the Booklet giving particulars of sailings may be had on application to Essex Hall or at the offices of Messrs Thos. Cook & Son. Mr. Fred Maddison, M.P., who is connected with the Unitarian church at Wandsworth, has been invited to take part in the proceedings, and has expressed his willingness to do so. Fifty-eight Unitarian ministers from this country will be present, and about the same number of the laity have booked berths. The President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Mr. W. B. Bowring will attend the meetings.

OUR last week's leading article on the urgent need of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association brought a prompt and characteristic response from Dr. C. A. Greaves, whose welcome letter will be found in another column. It was a pleasure to pass on his £10, and also £5 from Mr. Frank Evers, of Stourbridge, to the treasurer of the Association, and we are glad to hear that other subscriptions have been sent to the treasurer direct. The committee of the Association have just been encouraged by a donation of £100 from Sir James Kitson, and they will be sending out an appeal immediately, asking for the necessary addition to the Association's income to retain the £1,000 subscription, on which the continuance of so much good work depends. New and increased subscriptions should be sent direct to the treasurer of the Association, Mr. Howard Chatfield Clarke, at Essex Hall.

MANY friends throughout the country will join in heartiest congratulations to Mr. David Martineau, who on Wednesday last celebrated his eightieth birthday. On that day the committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, of which he has been a member for fifty years, sent him a message of congratulation. At the meeting of the committee two other veterans of over eighty years, Mr. Stanton Preston and Mr. S. S. Tayler, were present, and it was at the suggestion of the latter that the message was sent.

THE delegates to the second Peace Conference are gathering at the Hague this week, and are to be formally welcomed by the Queen of the Netherlands, at the Huis-ten-Bosch, the scene of the meeting of the first Conference in 1898. At the present Conference nearly every country of the world that has a settled form of government and is in touch with civilised usage, will be represented, and the friends of peace and humanity will follow the proceedings with the profoundest interest, and hope that substantial progress may be made in the great cause. Baron von Biberstein, the chief German delegate, before leaving Berlin for the Hague, said :—"The assembly of representatives of thirty-six or more States, in such circumstances, is an event of high importance in the history of the world, and whatever its political result may be, it is sure to have a great moral effect."

"THE great event of this month," writes Mr. F. W. Hirst in the Albany Review, "is the assembling of the second Hague Congress. It is an event great in itself apart from its results. . . . The idea of international co-operation as a means of lessening the dangers and mitigating the brutalities of warfare, of improving the laws and customs that regulate international intercourse, and finally of reducing the awful and ever-growing burden of competitive armaments is not new. Dante dreamed of a model emperor under whose wise control all nations would dwell in peace. Marsilio of Padua thought of a universal democratic church, whose œcumenical councils might reflect a republican union of states. Erasmus marvelled how Christians, 'members of one body, fed by the same sacraments, attached to the same Head, called to the same immortality, hoping for the same communion with Christ, could allow anything in the world to provoke them to war.' . . . The dreadful wars of the Reformation converted at least one calculating statesman into an idealist. The grand design of Henry the Fourth sprang, in all probability, from the brain of Sully, in whose Memoirs it stands recorded, as an imperishable monument of political sagacity. A treaty 'done at the Hague,' between Henry of Navarre, Elizabeth, and the Dutch Republic, was clearly intended to pave the way for this great League of Peace. Twenty-two years later Hugo Grotius was imprisoned in the Dutch capital, and afterwards taking refuge in France, prepared and published his immortal work on the Law of War and Peace."

At the annual meeting of the American Unitarian Association, the following resolution, moved by the Rev. J. H. Holmes, of New York, was adopted :—

"Resolved, by the annual convention of the American Unitarian Association, composed of ministers and lay delegates representing the Unitarian churches of America, held in Boston, Mass., May 21, 1907, on the eve of the second Hague Conference of Peace, that this Association herewith records its unqualified and enthusiastic endorsement of the resolutions adopted by the recent National Arbitration and Peace Congress, held in New York, April 14 to 17, 1907: first, that the governments of the world should provide that The Hague Conference shall hereafter be a permanent institution, meeting periodically for the regular and systematic consideration of the international problems constantly arising in the intercourse of the nations; secondly, that The Hague Court should be open to all nations; thirdly, that a general treaty of arbitration for ratification by all the nations should be drafted by the coming conference, providing for the reference to The Hague Court of international disputes which may hereafter arise; fourthly, that the time has arrived for decided action toward the limitation of the burdens of armaments.

"Resolved, that the Association respectfully requests and urges the government of the United States to instruct its delegates to the coming Hague Conference to support, with the full weight of our national influence, one and all of these propositions.

"Resolved, that a copy of these resolutions be sent to President Roosevelt, to Secretary Root, and to each of the United States delegates to the coming Hague Conference."

"I AM commanded by his Majesty to express his confidence that the inhabitants of the Orange River Colony will continue to enjoy in an increasing measure under the new Constitution the prosperity and contentment which have distinguished their country in the past." The new Constitution consists in the grant of Parliamentary Government. The Legislative Assembly, consisting of 38 members, is to be elected by the suffrage of every white male British subject over 21 not on full pay in the King's forces, and not subject to disqualification from such causes as crime or pauperism. The debates are to be conducted in Dutch or English. Thus the work of the restoration of a free national life to the peoples of South Africa, commenced in the Transvaal, is carried one important stage towards its completion.

LAST Sunday 600,000 inhabitants of the south of France, men, women, and children, with bands and banners, assembled in Montpellier. Rarely, if ever, can a vaster popular demonstration have been held, and it was but the climax of many other gatherings of the wine-growing peasants of the land of sunshine. These people are used to incessant toil, but refuse to suffer in silence, while their means of livelihood are taken from them by ingenious methods of wine adulteration. There are many strange features about this agitation which give us much to think about. The peasants are refusing to pay the State taxes; the mayors are destroying their symbols of office; the municipalities are dissolving; the troops drafted in to awe the strikers are cheering as the processions pass by. What the end will be it is not easy to forecast, but the French Government is faced by a serious problem. It would be interesting to speculate on the influence which Roumanille, Mistral, and the rest of the Félibres may have exerted on this upheaval. The modern Provencal literary movement has certainly fostered feelings of solidarity in this southern land, and one knows not which is most wonderful, the spontaneity or the corporate vigour of this strange movement.

THE one hundred and eleventh annual Conference of the Methodist New Connexion, the last Conference which the Connexion will hold as a separate organisation, was opened on Monday at Huddersfield. The President, Principal Clemens, of Ranmoor College, in his opening address, referred to the struggles of early years, went on to allude to the more important of the Connexion's missionary activities, and then, in a tone in which a certain inevitable regret was blended with hope and good cheer, spoke of the coming change. "It is a great thing which we are essaying to do. With two other Methodist communities of a willingness like our own we are to give practical effect to that sentiment in favour of Church Union which has found copious expression for years past, is growing in intensity in various directions, and has elsewhere issued in most important results. We are taking one step at any rate in the great work of healing the divisions of Methodism in our own land, of gathering into one those that ought to be one. Our hope is that this movement will be attended with such conditions and influences as to make for and not retard this desirable consummation." Concerning the Methodist controversies of the past, he remarked, "There is a duty of forgetting belonging to churches and denominations, just as we have to forget in our domestic and national histories." He expressed his confidence that the new united church would be definitely evangelical and at the same time liberal; it would not be unfriendly to new knowledge, or ignore the great amount of intellectual activity that obtains in our day in the regions of religious thought. "We must not be satisfied with making shibboleths of phrases and formulas; we must set forth our faith in language that will command the attention of the modern man. As a matter of fact the modern man is much the same as the ancient man in his need of a Saviour."

It is said that at present the three uniting denominations use three Sunday-school hymn-books; and four hymn-books are in use in their chapels; the fourth being the (Wesleyan) Methodist Hymn-book, which is used in some Methodist New Connexion congregations. For the present these seven hymnals are still to be used, and will bear the general title of the United Methodist Church with a distinctive name as sub-title. Doubtless, such an arrangement will be but temporary. Those who have decided to work together and to live as one religious family will certainly wish to sing the same hymns from the same book. The question of the style and price of a representative magazine for the United Methodist Church is still under consideration.

THURSDAY'S Tribune, devoted more than a column to the account of an interview with Professor L. P. Jacks, M.A., editor of the Hibbert Journal, who spoke with the greatest satisfaction of the success of his recent visit to America in the interests of his review. The Hibbert, which has now a circulation of close upon 10,000 copies a quarter, has a paying circulation of 2,000 in America, and this was what Mr. Jacks said to his interviewer on that subject:—"The Hibbert Journal is going to represent an intellectual alliance of England and America in regard to the highest objects of human thought, and in that way will possess a significance beyond its immediate purpose. I have formed an American editorial board, composed of leading thinkers in all the principal sections of the country. The final control will, of course, be on this side: Our general policy remains absolutely unchanged. We keep an open door for all seriously-held opinions, and we conduct the journal not in the interests of people who want to write, but in the interests of those who want to read and who know what is worth reading. Roughly, the contents of the journal in the future will be two-thirds British and one-third American origin, and the value of each element will be increased by the co-presence of the other. The existence of a great audience on both sides of the Atlantic will react favourably on the contents of the journal itself. The habit of writing to a narrow and professional audience has had a bad influence on theological writers. It has caused obscurity, dulness, and a disregard of great issues. By bringing theological discussions before the bar of educated public opinion we humanise them, and writers find themselves insensibly forced to avoid what is irrelevant and deal with essentials. One of the most noteworthy facts of the present day is the influence of public opinion in theology. This influence in the past was reserved for politics. Theology was exempt from it. The seat of judgment used to be in the study of the expert. It is now transferred to the public conscience. This is the greatest change in the religious world, but professional theologians are slow to see it. By our American enterprise we hope to give a vast extension to the area over which this influence will make itself felt."

FOR what Mr. Jacks said on other questions of American life our readers must refer to the Tribune. We quote only one more passage:—"I was struck by the ethical forces that seem to prevail in the universities among the younger men especially. I recall a group of professors round a dinner table—physicists, mathematicians, economists, and theologians. They gave me the impression that the main concern with all of them was that of sending young men into the world with a sound ideal of public duty. One has heard the American universities informally criticised on this side, but the conclusion forced on me was that as ethical forces they are counting far more in the life of America than the old universities do here. It is there that the great problems of American civilisation are being thought out and the men trained who are to solve them."

MR. W. B. BOWRING, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was unable to take the chair at the first meeting of the committee since his election, on Wednesday, because on that day he was engaged in handing over to the Lord Mayor of Liverpool the deeds of the Roby Hall estate, which is his gift to the city. The estate is henceforth to bear the donor's name, and will thus happily commemorate two lives of devoted public service. It is just fifty years since the late Charles T. Bowring entered the Liverpool City Council, and his son, Mr. William Bowring, who served as Lord Mayor in 1893-4, has worthily followed in his footsteps. On the morning following the presentation, the editor of the Liverpool Daily Post wrote as follows of his gift:—

"The 'Bowring Estate' will keep Alderman Bowring's name alive in the annals of Liverpool, but it is only the present generation who will realise the modesty, and the kindness, and the graciousness with which the donor of the estate has bestowed his property upon the people of Liverpool. The Lord Mayor yesterday very happily eulogised the munificence of Mr. Bowring, and paid a cordial tribute to the generous spirit in which, during his lifetime, he has added to his great personal services to the city by bestowing upon his fellow citizens so noble a gift. With characteristic confidence in his fellows, the donor has avoided the imposition of any restrictions upon the estate—he has transferred to the city. It is for the city's good, and he is content to leave those in whom the citizens of the future place their confidence to determine the use to which the estate shall be put."

On the first day of anniversary week in Boston the Ministerial Union met in Channing Hall, under the presidency of the Rev. P. R. Frothingham, who spoke with much feeling of the loss sustained by the death of the Rev. John Cuckson. The Rev. George Batchelor, who had been associated with Mr. Cuckson for many years followed with reminiscences of him, and offered the following memorial which was adopted:—

"It is fitting at such a moment as this, when at our meeting here we miss, for the first time in two years, the presence of the man who has presided over us, to record an expression of gratitude for the service he has rendered us, and our sense of loss, now that he is taken away. We join with his many friends, at home and abroad, in recognition of the excellent gifts which as a preacher and a man he brought into our ministry. More truly than of most men, it may be said of him that he lived openly, showing without hesitation the contents of his mind and heart. He was inexpert in the art of concealment, and in his preaching was openly impatient with anything like apology for crooked ways or unrighteous deeds. To his mourning family and friends, and to the church he served with such signal success in Plymouth, we, the members, send sorrowful greetings and the assurance of our heartfelt sympathy and affection."

THE National Education Association is doing excellent work in reminding people that there is an education question apart from the vexed theme of religious instruction, and especially in showing how very meagre our provision is in the matter of secondary education. The debate that took place in the House of Commons last month had the good effect of eliciting several statements and promises from Mr. McKenna which are well worth the emphasis placed upon them in a circular issued by the Association. Secondary schools, which accept popular control and freedom from denominational tests, and where at least 25 per cent. of the places are open for the paid admission of public elementary scholars, are to have special grants in aid. But the real crux of the business is not in Parliament, but in the local areas of government. Where the chief consideration is to keep down the rates the schools will suffer. What is needed is a vivid sense of the national destinies that depend on the rising race; they must learn to live, or they will live to lose.

THE Treasurer of the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund has received a cheque, value £100, in payment of a legacy bequeathed to the Fund by the late Mr. Hodgson Pratt;

THE GROWTH OF CHRISTIANITY.*

DR. PERCY GARDNER has now followed up his "Historic View of the New Testament" by a sketch of the history of Christianity down to Protestant times. These lectures, originally intended to be delivered in a London church, are a symptom of the steady advance of liberal thought into all branches of religious study. Whereas readers of Church history, and of Christian development as a whole, have hitherto had to go to orthodox writers for the general presentation of the facts, and then make their own deductions and interpretations, Dr. Gardner leads the way in writing the story from a frankly liberal point of view, and we may hope to see his example followed in large and detailed studies inspired by the same broad church principles. The difficulty is that two requisites for this work are not, as yet, often found in combination. These are, as Dr. Gardner says: "The strong belief in spiritual, as distinct from what I call materialised Christianity, and an acceptance of the evolutionary views of the history of the Christian society." Liberal Christianity cannot be said to have established its case until it has rewritten Christian history in the light of its own perceptions; and up to the present it has been prevented from doing this partly by a notion that the Christian centuries were mostly filled with "corruptions of Christianity"; and partly by what we may call a Romanticist view of Jesus. An example of the latter will be found in Dr. Peabody's article in the Hibbert Journal for July, 1903. Any such explanation of Jesus, or any which regards him as standing (however majestically) outside the great normal line of development of the world's religion, as a mighty personality whose influence has come only as an occasional and accidental visitant to sweeten the main stream of "Christian" history, must render us powerless to discover that "identity of Christianity amid all its changes" which Dr. Gardner holds to be "much like the identity of a nation or a person at various stages of their lives." Merely to emphasise into antagonism the earlier and later stages of any development gives no help; e.g., our author points out that "there is no justification of the notion that St. Paul so translated Christianity as to make of it practically a new religion. There is no ground for supposing that he could, under any circumstances, have originated a religion. The spirit of Christianity worked in and through him; but he was the conduit, not the fountain." It is true, again, that "but few of the ideas and beliefs of historic Christianity are to be found in the teaching of the Founder and his apostles." But "they were taken over by Christianity, baptized, as I would put it, into the name of Christ." Thus, Dr. Gardner "represents Christianity, not as a system revealed entire, but as a principle of life and growth." Among other illustrations of the gradual assimilation, by this "principle of life and growth," of ideas and beliefs contributed by other religions, is the profound influence exercised on Christianity by the mystic religions of Asia, Babylon, and Egypt, which took new forms in the Hellenistic age. Here Dr. Gardner is specially at home with his subject, and the chapter on the "Baptism of Asia" will be found most informing. Grafted on to "the wild stem of primitive Anatolian religion" these mystic worshipers preserved the idea of individual communion with God, of salvation from sin, and of the future life, until these great faiths could be carried up on to a higher plane—"baptized into Christ." At a much later time, again, dealing with Catholic saint worship and the doctrine of Purgatory, "we must not regard either of these as essentially bad, nor as destitute of elements of permanent value." This cultus of the great dead "has been in England too long neglected," but it is "essential to any really religious view of life." Again, "the idea of a communion of saints, of the unity of life in families and nations through the ages, is really an essential part of any working religion. The rapid growth and wide success in America of the religious bodies which profess a belief in the ultimate salvation of all men, proves that what the Church endeavoured to embody was an essential part of religious belief." There is the same breadth of treatment in the last chapter, which deals in a discriminating way with Newman's famous work on "Development," and with more recent Catholic writers, such as Ehrhard. The book is a most welcome indication of the trend of things, but it may not have as much influence as the author (and we) would desire, for the long labour of thought of the writer is summed up in harmless-looking comments, which state his formal historic method without fully exposing its concrete exemplifications, and whose point will be appreciated only by those who approve and share that method. It is a method as different from "orthodoxy" as it is from "rationalism." Perhaps we may hope that Dr. Gardner will return to these labours.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. PAUL AND OTHERS.*

IN "The Gospel According to St. Paul," Dr. Du Bose has given us a striking work of no ordinary calibre, the product of an acutely logical mind, of deep thought and lofty speculation.

The author writes not as a biographer of Paul, but as a systematic theologian, treating a department of Biblical theology. The work claims to present an enlightened Scriptural orthodoxy, and its most characteristic feature is the strong and repeated insistence on the full humanity of Christ. Christ as man was distinguished from all men only in the one respect of being free from sin, in respect that he in act and fact overcame sin under conditions of strict and perfect humanity. Thus we read, "Jesus himself in his humanity needed the salvation which all humanity needs. Salvation for him, as for us, demanded that conflict with sin which was pre-eminently his experience and his achievement. Salvation for him, as for us, was impossible either as a mere fact of nature or as an attainment of his own human will. The power of God unto salvation through faith was necessary for him as for us, and that power manifested itself in him, as it must in us, in the perfection of his human obedience unto death, even the death of the Cross. Through his own blood he entered into the holiest, having found eternal redemption. That is to say, through the perfect loss or offering up of himself, he eternally found or attained his true self."

This passage is characteristic in another way also. For a piece of Pauline exposition its elements are derived from far. I count about seven allusions to Hebrews, two to John, one to Revelation, and only one directly to Paul (Phil.). The collocation and dotting of the i's (as is said) are Dr. Du Bose's.

The book announces itself as the Gospel according to Paul. It is much more than Gospel generalised, universalised, considered sub specie aeternitatis. In form it is a series of nineteen chapters expository, from this abstract speculative point of view, of the chief topics embraced in Rom. i.—viii. with an introduction, and a final chapter on the Christ of St. Paul. In reality it is a treatise in which all the writings of the New Testament belonging to the Pauline, Johannine, Alexandrine, Petrine literatures are drawn upon, and sometimes the Pauline least of all. It goes without saying that there is no attempt made at displaying the genesis of Paul's system of thought, linking it to its allied forms and showing its wide later ramifications. Dr. Du Bose's principle is that a thing can only be truly defined, described, or understood, by its end. Only in its final form can you find the meaning of the early and intermediate forms. Hence, he would probably say the Gospel must be interpreted by Paul, certainly Paul's early works must be interpreted by his latest, Col., Eph., and Paul himself must be interpreted by Hebrews and the Johannine literature. It is then only a natural further step that the New Testament must be interpreted by the Church. The Canon cannot logically fix a limit, for the Canon is the work of the Church, which cannot decree away its authority. So the author says, "We receive our Christianity through the Scriptures and the Church, and these are the tribunal and final resort for determining what Christianity is."

Apparently then we are to understand by "The Gospel" the whole body of Christian doctrine. Paul adumbrated it here and there along one leading line, and in other scattered features, he conceived it more integrally, but did not express it as a whole. Its full expression ensued by parts in the later New Testament writers, and in the interpretation of the Church.

This point of view it is impossible to accept. It assumes that everything that came out in the final product was by implication in the germ. This is true only of the speculative elaboration of mental concepts, whose contents are developed by analytic judgments, or of things which unfold, untouched by external influence, in accordance with an idea. It is never true of historical growths whether of institutions or schools of philosophy or dogma. They are constantly assimilating new elements from alien sources as they go along, and the resulting product is not an analytic exposition of the beginning, but a synthetic agglomeration with more or less of assimilation around the germ as a nucleus. We get back from the end result to the nucleus, not, as Dr. Du Bose assumes, by a process of condensation or reintegration, but by a process of stripping off. The earlier becomes the later not by development but by accretion. The only way to study Christian doctrine is historically. There is no room for a systematic Biblical theology in which the historical moments are lost. The theology of Paul can be expounded best in its making. But it is under no a priori obligation to be logical, or complete, or everywhere self-consistent, or true. At the same time, Dr. Du Bose's book cannot be read without much profit. For it gives the most attractive form which we have seen to the "Orthodox" system, though we think it goes beyond Paul's.

PH. MOORE.

THE JESUS FAMILY.*

FROM the first glance we perceive that this work is intended for edification, for the building up of Christian thought and life. Nor is the chosen theme of these meditations likely to call forth any great display of original thought and suggestion. Every one who has written a life of Jesus from any point of view, must have had occasion to discuss his relations with his mother and his brethren, and to hazard some suggestion concerning his father, or foster father, St. Joseph. Every preacher who has been long enough at his work to have gone through the Gospels in any detail, must have felt bound occasionally to deal with the problem of the Jesus family. It is the merit of Dr. Tymms that he is able to deal with well-worn themes without the aid of fantastic invention, and without becoming tedious. Dr. Tymms is frankly orthodox from the outset. The stories of a supernatural birth, which a popular preacher has declared "untrue," and which many preachers who are not so popular have been content to put aside as unprovable and overwhelmingly improbable, are here accepted as perfectly credible, and are set forth as the most self-evidently true explanation of the Johannine phrase, "the only-begotten of the Father." Further, it is to be said that during the course of the twelve chapters of this book the statements of the Fourth Gospel are constantly cited along with those of the synoptics, and are treated as of equal authority. These prepossessions sometimes perplex a problem which would otherwise be simple enough. To take one case: we could have understood that the brothers of Jesus might get anxious on his behalf, distrustful of his prudence, certain only of his danger, and be ready to declare that he was beside himself and must at all costs be induced or compelled to return home. But that Mary herself, who, if the story told at the opening of Luke's Gospel is true, knew the fact which must put every word and deed of her mysterious

Son in a different light; who knew that not his madness but their ignorance was at fault; that she should join with them, and by that action in a manner disown her own history, that is a miracle of folly which the best thing that Dr. Tymms can say does not explain. It is only fair to the author to say that he fully realises the unreasonableness of the incident, and makes the reader realise it too. He charges Mary and her sons with mixing one of the bitterest cups of gall and wormwood that ever Jesus had to drink; he shows that they thrust upon the Master "the unavoidable task of publicly reproving his mother and brethren." If thus the Holy Mother was doomed to misunderstand her son, if thus she was to thwart him in the exercise of his sacred duty, if thus by her rashness she was to give some countenance to the statement of the opponents who declared him possessed, then as far as she was concerned a miracle took place in vain, and the distinction of an angel's greeting was of infinitely less value to her than would have been the gift of a deeper spiritual insight.

We have not the smallest desire to be hypercritical. We are directing attention to a good book on a subject of perennial interest. In some of its pages it seems to us damaged by the author's uncritical method of dealing with his authorities. The very lessons he would teach are thereby needlessly shadowed. Yet within the limits imposed by a narrow system, there is still room for the exercise of a wholesome imagination in picturing the human life of the Christ, and for convincing ourselves once again, as men of the utmost diversity of views are constantly convinced, that in Christ we have an example everlastingly imitable, and yet for ever beyond all that our utmost imitation can enable us to attain.

J. R.

THE OLD ORDER CHANGES.

NOTHING is more extraordinary than the readiness with which men will turn back to the old ideas when the latter are re-introduced to them under scientific auspices; and now that the iconoclastic energy of nineteenth-century "materialism" has somewhat spent its novel force, eminent biologists are found to be actively reconciling their discoveries with beliefs which the present age is supposed to have utterly discarded. This does not mean, as some triumphantly assert, that the discredited theologians of the past were right, after all. It means, rather, that the same truths underlie the various creeds which man values only as long as they seem to adequately express those truths to him, and which he expands or casts aside as he acquires more wisdom and understanding.

In the first hour of intellectual freedom, when the mind, shaking off the fetters of crude dogma, is braced by the alpine atmosphere of rationalism, it seems as if thought could never again descend to the populous valley where hope, and faith, and love, and aspiration cheer the daily toil of the multitude. But the human soul cannot exist long in glacial regions, pretending that it has for ever cut itself off from human emotions because it knows that they can all be psychologically explained. The feelings, as Herbert Spencer has told us, are our masters, whatever we may think; and the reason why religion, rather than scientific philosophy, is "the greatest thing in life," is because it founds its structure on that which alone we know to be real.

So the rationalist descends to the lower slopes in time, though he does not generally take the path by which he climbed to the sterile heights; and consequently, as he approaches the valley once more, he sees it from a different point of view. Perhaps also he brings with him a certain austerity which will often act as a tonic to his fellow-men in after days, no less than to himself. But the point is that he does come back to the old bases of human aspiration, sometimes by the strangest ways, and that he takes up with docility many an abandoned belief once scorned because it had its origin in faith rather than logic.

This same "faith," which has so often been perverted and discredited, claims among its latest champions a well-known psychologist, who, in a book of five hundred pages or more, demonstrates the reality of man's belief in "things not seen," and its invaluable practical results, to which, he maintains, it can point for its justification as conclusively as the best authenticated scientific hypotheses. That old facts have been renamed is, indeed, no proof that they have been replaced; and whether you talk of unselfishness or altruism,—of the "voice of God" or the progress of ethics—of the promptings of conscience or the "subliminal consciousness"—of man who "must be born again," or of the human soul in the process of evolution—it all amounts to the same thing. Truth is greater than all our interpretations of Truth, and the different attitudes we adopt towards her are of less importance than the motives which compel them.

It is not, however, given to all to see the diversity of creeds and philosophies which bewilder man's limited intelligence in the clear light of tolerance. We are led by temperament, by the influences of heredity and environment, more than we know; and it is much harder for some people to curb their inborn prejudices than for a criminal to resist his tendency to do evil. Nevertheless, we are making for breadth of view in all directions; and bigotry, which can still show a stern front to "modern criticism," is being slowly undermined by the persuasive influence of the kindlier relations now existing between man and man. To fortify oneself against the pressure of the growing ideals of humanity is as foolish as if one were to shut out the light of heaven on a spring day. It is more than foolish, it is futile; for, however we may shroud the windows, some audacious sunbeam will find us through an unguarded chink, and the cowslips will bloom in the meadows near at hand with as much beauty and unconcern as if we had never tried to close our eyes to them at all. Paracelsus tells his friend, in one of those wonderful dialogues which make up Browning's great poem, about the death of a soulless creature who had lived all his days on the smiles of princes, obliterating every trace "of God's finger out of him" with mean trickeries and desires. The philosopher describes to Festus how, shortly before the end, the man sat up suddenly after lying for some hours in blank torpor,

"And with natural voice
Said that in spite of thick air and closed doors,
God told him it was June; and he knew well,
Without such telling, harebells grew in June;
And all that kings could ever give or take
Would not be precious as those blooms to him."

In such ways, and by sudden means which science has not, as yet, been able to adequately explain, is the worldly wisdom of a lifetime often brushed aside, and the tissue of callousness and insincerity under which the heart had hardened rent like the husk of an unfolding leaf.

And what can one do, if one believes in these things, but reiterate them again and again, as Nature reiterates the forms of loveliness from which we slowly spell out the divine meanings? For, after all, it is only by constantly dwelling on the essential facts of existence, and bringing to their interpretation whatever knowledge and insight we may attain, that reforms will ever be accomplished, and the miseries of the past swept into oblivion. But the reiteration must be frequent, and the purpose which prompts it unalterable. It is only too easy, apparently, to say that one agrees with such and such a theory, and then to act as if the theory had never been heard of; just as a soldier may attend church on Sunday, tacitly assenting to the doctrine of "loving one's enemies," and responding to the command "Thou shalt not kill," and yet go forth the next day with untroubled conscience to slaughter his brother-man on the field of battle. Nevertheless, it is rapidly becoming more and more impossible for thinking beings, confronted with inconsistencies that seem to have positively taken on the air of virtues, to fold their hands and say, "These things are too hard for us." Science, no less certainly than religion, has unfolded to us the working of a moral law which must gradually supersede the worn-out feudalisms and despotisms of barbaric ages; and in view of such a fact, it ought not, at least, to be more difficult for enlightened people at the present time to live peaceably in accordance with this law, than it was for men and women to die for it under the cruel eyes of Nero.

It is one of the charges laid to the "materialism" of the old order that it tends to blunt the kindlier feelings, and to fix human desires more tenaciously on the luxuries and pleasures of a mundane life. If this is true, one can only be thankful for the smallest proof that such a "materialism" is being slowly disintegrated, and that what may be called the "new psychology" is approaching with sympathy, rather than in a scoffing spirit, the phenomenon of the "twice-born" who believes in an immanent God.

AN URGENT PROBLEM.

SIR,—We are obliged to the reviewer of "The Finality of the Christian Religion" for his interesting notice of a thoughtful book. I trust Mr. Whitaker will pardon my saying that I am more interested in his views than in those of Professor G. Burman Foster. There are two good reasons for this: (1) that Mr. Whitaker is himself a thinker, and our gratitude is due to him for illuminating expositions of problems which Christian students of many schools are now earnestly considering; (2) that Mr. Whitaker has very largely the handling of these problems in the pages of the INQUIRER. Is it permissible, Sir, briefly to review the reviewer?

For some months past I have been wondering what Mr. Whitaker meant by his phrase "The Absolute Christ." (I am sorry to say the reference is only from memory). Yet, on April 13, 1907, p. 229, he expresses dissatisfaction in a criticism of "Atonement in Literature and Life," with such a phrase as "The Eternal Christ." "The conception of an Eternal Christ is a gratuitous difficulty," he says, and adds "It seems to be brought in in the interests of a 'Christology'; and 'Christological' notions are gnostical pitfalls for Christian faith."

The "Absolute" Christ, then, is not "eternal"? Thus one's perplexity was not lessened. "An Urgent Problem," however, throws light on Mr. Whitaker's reasoning, and I think now that I know what he means.

Jesus is "final." "Christianity may develop in form"; but, "to ask whether Christianity will be superseded, is to ask whether we shall ever have anything more religious than religion."

In the sense, then, that Jesus is final, I presume we are intended to assume that Christianity is "final."

Now, Sir, these are very large assertions. Let us follow out some of the reasoning. "Philosophy reckons only with the logical necessity of development, while Christianity regards history as the acts of free persons." But Mohammed (for instance) had not much philosophy; yet was he not a believer in history as the acts of free persons? "It is Christianity, indeed, that has given us the very idea of a developing series of religions, for they all point forward to it as to a goal." This is exactly what Mohammed thought of his religion. He was in the line of the prophets; he himself was the culminating prophet.

I point this out only in order to show that Mr. Whitaker's reasoning would not be so conclusive to a Mohammedan, for example, nor is it so conclusive to me, as it is to himself.

Further, development may indeed be "perverse, retrogressive, abortive" there may be no "ortholinear progressive development." I do not suppose there is; and there may be a man with seeing eye and feeling heart at the very crest of a wave of human greatness, and that crest may be followed by a great depression. But this curious point arrives, that, quoting Weinell's dictum, "After Jesus, it is his religion or none," we are referred to Harnack for the statement that "a complete answer to the question, What is Christianity? is impossible so long as we are restricted to Jesus Christ's teaching alone."

Was, then, the teaching of Jesus limited? or was it only badly and imperfectly reported?

Is it here, for example, that, with Mr. Whitaker, "we have to seek for the unfolding and working-out and bodying-forth of a principle"? He will not have it so. "The religion of Jesus is religion at its purest and profoundest." What room then for any process of unfolding? For "perfect universality is here, together with perfect individuality."

Yet, after all this transcendence of statement, we are to read with approval the quotation: "The form of his (Jesus') faith in God, the God-idea, may be changed, but the content will hardly be surpassed." One might have thought that the form of a universal principle would be constant; and that the content would be enriched by the experience of the generations.

I trust, Sir, I may not be thought a monster of unbelief. I may say that I have been at times reproved for dwelling over much on the "value" of Jesus the man, and of his gospel. But my ministerial life, short in years as it is, has been passed so largely in contact with men and women thinkers outside the pale of any organised religion whatever, that I am careful to build my assertions of religion on the most solid ground I can.

No assumption of antagonism between Naturalism and Personal Idealism, no barring off of scientific methods from certain fields of thought, with an ipse dixit that this field is "religion," and so sacrosanct from strict, impartial, and scientific investigation, will suffice for the honest inquirer of to-day.

As regards the order of Nature, I am a naturalist. If I am allowed free will, I am a Personal Idealist, in the sphere of human conscious beings. This, however, will not allow me to assert that the appearance of Jesus in human history is "inexplicable." I believe certainly that his appearance may be described as "a creative spiritual epoch"; but, then, Jewish history shows us that there were similar, if not so grand, "creative spiritual epochs" before Jesus. In other words, we need no miracle within a "philosophy of personality" to account for Jesus. The spiritual is not without its evolutionary principle.

Perhaps Mr. Whitaker will explain the application of the words: "once more, we are not to identify the truths of Christianity (Unitarians, perpend!) with the truth of natural religion, or with a universal conception of religion."

If this is not a little firework let off in jest at that somewhat hardly treated creature, the Unitarian, but is said in grim earnest, I say, with all the earnestness I can command, I am not such a Christian, and such Christianity as that, with its exclusions and its particular apologists, is simply left behind in the morasses of antiquated dogmatisms.

The religion that cannot include the truth of natural religion, and the truths of all, so-called "revealed" religions, can be no universal religion for a waiting world. It is dead to-day, and will be decently interred to-morrow.

And yet, in Mr. Whitaker's eyes, "by religion, as such, it will be found, on consideration, that we really mean Christianity in some developed form of it—it matters not whether or not that form has as yet appeared."

In other words, this Christian religion, as religion, is absolute. I submit that no ground whatever for this assumption has been given; and I hope Mr. Whitaker will bring forward his arguments for such a tremendous assertion.

His use of the term "Unitarian" prompts me, in the matter of the theory of the "Christian consciousness," to suggest that this "consciousness" having been, in bulk, "conscious" in terms of Trinitarian formulæ, must be logically held as affording validity, not only to the belief in Jesus as an "absolute Christ" and an "eternal Christ"; but also as the Second Person of the "eternal and glorious Trinity."

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—Your article of Saturday on "An Immediate Need" has touched me. I had not realized how pressing the present need of money is if the Association is to secure its yearly gift of £1,000. Now, I think that our very rich members do do their duty; let the rather rich do theirs.

In order to start the movement among my class, I enclose a cheque for £10, which I am sure you will hand to the treasurer, in hopes that many others will do the same until the sum required is gotten.

"We regard any alliance, understanding, or agreement with the present Russian Government as equivalent to taking sides against the Russian people in its struggle for constitutional rights and freedom. We consider that the proposed agreement will have the effect of strengthening the Russian credit, and enabling the Government to appeal successfully for another loan over which the representatives of the Russian people will have no control, and which will be employed only to strengthen the position of the autocracy against them. . . . Finally, we protest against maintaining any but the most distant diplomatic relations with a Government which is with good reason suspected of connivance at the recent massacres of Jews, the devastation of the Caucasus and Baltic Provinces, and the prison tortures in Riga." The manifesto from which these words are taken is supported by many influential signatures, including those of Stopford Brooke, George Cadbury, Walter Crane, L. A. Atherley Jones, M.P., J. R. Macdonald, M.P., Arthur Sidgwick, G. Bernard Shaw, and Robert Spence Watson. It expresses the convictions of a multitude of English men and women, sympathising with the Russian people in their desperate struggle for freedom.

OBITUARY.

MRS. WILLIAM COLFOX.

WE recorded last week the death of Mrs. William Colfox, of Westmead, Bridport, at the advanced age of eighty-four. She was the youngest of three daughters of Henry Wansey, of Warminster, who made Bridport their home, and exercised there a very deep and lasting influence for good. On the same day in 1855, she and her sister Louisa were married to the two brothers William and Thomas Colfox, and till 1899, when the elder sister died, they were associated in much good work done for the town, and in everything that concerned the interests of the Unitarian chapel and Sunday-school. But twenty years ago, Mrs. William Colfox began to lose her sight, and soon became totally blind. Other forms of ill-health steadily increased, and brought more and more disablement from active service, but her intellectual and sympathetic interest in all that was going on long survived her physical powers. During the last seven years she was a complete invalid, but bore with wonderful patience her weariness and suffering, and death, when it came, was the welcome angel of release. The funeral took place on the 6th inst., in the Bridport Cemetery, where she was laid beside her husband, who had died but ten months previously. A long procession representing the congregation and town walked in front of the coffin, while the mourners who followed included the members of the family and others, who thus showed that her long years of retirement had not caused her to be forgotten. The service was conducted by the Rev. H. S. Solly, who also preached a memorial sermon in the chapel the following Sunday morning.

PROFESSOR EDOUARD MONTET.

WE published last week, the Rev. C. W. Wendte's notice of Dr. S. A. Eliot, president of the coming Boston Congress, and are glad to be able to add the following notice of his predecessor in the chair:—

One of the most prominent figures at the Boston International Congress will be Professor Edouard Montet, D.D., dean of the Faculty of Protestant Theology of the University of Geneva, Switzerland, and for the past two years president of the International Council of Unitarian and Other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers.

Professor Montet was born at Lyons, France, June 12, 1856. Descended from an ancient Protestant family of distinction, established at Orange in the reign of Henry IV., he acquired the baccalaureates of both letters and science at the Lyceum of Lyons, and pursued his higher studies at the Universities of Geneva, Berlin, Heidelberg, and Paris. Side by side with his theological preparation he carried on historical and philological courses. Having received his theological degree at Geneva, he was for two years pastor at St. Symphorien in Ardèche. In 1880 he took an additional degree at Paris, and published a work of historical investigation, "La Légende d'Irénée et l'Introduction du Christianisme à Lyon." For the succeeding two years he collaborated with Professor Chastel in his notable work, "Histoire du Christianisme depuis ses Origines jusqu'à nos Jours," which appeared in Paris in 1881-83 in five volumes. Soon after he was made a doctor of theology by the Sorbonne in Paris. Since 1882 he had lectured at the University of Geneva, and devoted himself with especial ardour to Oriental studies, both philological and historical. In 1883 his "Essai sur les Origines des Partis Sadducéen et Pharisien et leur Histoire jusqu'à la Naissance de Jésus Christ" enrolled him among Oriental scholars. In 1885 he was named professor of theology in Geneva, in charge of the Hebrew and Aramaic instruction, and also of the Old Testament courses. To these was later added the Arabic language and literature. Finally, in 1898, he was chosen dean of the theological faculty, while retaining also his other chairs.

Professor Montet has displayed a remarkable versatility of mind as well as great powers of work. This led to the production of his "Histoire Littéraire des Vaudois du Piémont," in the preparation of which the author made use of original manuscripts he had compiled at Cambridge, Dublin, Geneva, Grenoble, Munich, Paris, Strassburg, and Zürich. Also his publication of the original text of "La Noble Légende," collated from manuscripts at Cambridge and Dublin.

In the field of Semitic study Professor Montet has published a Hebrew Grammar, and a "First Course in Arabic," a manual for schools, "The History of the People of Israel," &c.

Professor Montet has been a great traveler, and has a rare gift of retaining and conveying to others the impressions of his journeys. In 1895 he published a volume of observations and experiences made during a two years' visit to Brazil and Argentina—a picturesque narrative. In 1900 and 1901 he made extensive journeys in Morocco, in search of documentary and other testimony for his researches into the religion of Islam. A vividly written account of this journey, handsomely illustrated, has appeared in Paris. A more recent work of a theological nature is the "Dogmatique Chrétienne," prepared after manuscripts left by his revered teacher and friend, Professor August Bouvier, of Geneva.

It should be added that Professor Montet has been a voluminous contributor to scientific reviews in France, England, and Germany, especially on Oriental topics, such as the Asiatic Quarterly Review, the Revue de l'Histoire des Religions, and also to the Outlook, the Boston Transcript, and other American journals.

As the organizer and presiding officer of the Third Congress of our International Council, held at Geneva in the autumn of 1905, Professor Montet manifested great abilities and a devotion to the interests of liberal Christianity, which elicited the gratitude of the Association. As head of the theological school founded by John Calvin, his activity in this cause was the more significant.

It is interesting to note that at the fourth Boston Congress in September, Professor Montet will speak on "John Calvin and the Reformation Monument [now in process of erection] at Geneva." He will be accompanied by his friend, Rev. E.

Rochat, a cultivated and liberal-minded pastor of one of the Protestant churches of Geneva, who was the secretary of the Third, or Geneva, Congress. Both gentlemen will be warmly welcomed in Boston.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

LEGENDS OF THE SAINTS.

IV.—ST. CECILIA:

ST. CECILIA, the great patroness of music, was the child of noble Roman parents. In reading of her life, it is beautiful to see how she always felt that in praising God with her music, which she loved dearly from her childhood, she was doing the best she could with the best thing that He had given her. She spoke of her music as if it were a part of herself, and left behind her the beautiful idea that if we do the best we can with whatever gifts God may have given us, that will be accounted in God's sight as praise.

Like St. Margaret, St. Cecilia probably learnt all about Christianity from the nurse when she was a very little child, and though her parents were not Christians themselves, they never made any trouble about her faith. So she spent her girlhood very peacefully, studying music, and thinking of heavenly things. The legends say that her singing was so lovely that angels from Heaven would come down to earth to join their voices with hers. She could play on many instruments, too, and is said to have invented the organ, which she played most wonderfully, so that often she made it sound like a human voice sobbing for expression within the pipes.

When she was not quite sixteen years old, a young noble named Valerian asked her parents if he might marry her. He was brave and true, and everything that Cecilia could have wished her husband to be, except that he was not a Christian. Like all Roman girls in those times, she was allowed no choice, and she quietly accepted Valerian and was married to him.

There is an account in a very old manuscript of St. Cecilia's wedding dress. It was a long, straight garment of white wool, with a girdle round the waist, and over all a long veil of flame colour, the symbol of wifely devotion.

Valerian loved his young wife very dearly, and listened gladly to all she could tell him about the Christian faith. He very soon told her that he was willing to become a Christian, which made her very happy. The legend tells us that when he returned home from his baptism, he heard most wonderful music coming from St. Cecilia's room. He entered it, and saw an angel standing there carrying two crowns of roses, which she placed on the heads of Valerian and St. Cecilia, and then vanished away.

Valerian had a young brother, called Tiburtius, whom he also loved very dearly. This boy had not yet become a Christian, and it was Valerian's greatest wish that he should do so. He asked St. Cecilia to tell Tiburtius all about Jesus Christ, and this she did, so gently and sweetly and with such wisdom, that in a very little time he, too, was ready and willing to join the Christians.

In those days, some households were made miserable because they were so divided in their faith. The general idea was that the Christians were idle dreamers, and must be persecuted, and in many families the parents persecuted their children, and brothers and sisters quarrelled amongst themselves, and betrayed each other to the authorities. You see St. Cecilia had been fortunate in having a happy home with parents who let her believe as she thought right, and now that she and her husband and his beloved young brother were all of the same faith, they grew daily fonder of one another. They did a great deal of work amongst the poor, nursing those who were sick, and comforting and cheering those whom the enemies of the Christians persecuted. By and bye, all that they were doing came to the ears of Almachius, the governor who was ruling Rome while the Emperor was away. He sent for the two brothers, and ordered them to give up their faith. Young Tiburtius refused in a fiery way, and made the governor still more angry, but when the older, wiser Valerian refused just as steadily, Almachius was furious, and ordered both brothers to be thrown into prison, and if they still refused to sacrifice to the heathen gods they were to be put to death.

During the time they were in prison St. Cecilia visited them, and putting aside all her own terror and grief at the thought of being left alone, she comforted and consoled them in every way she could, and only wished that she could be killed too, that they might still be together.

After their death she had not very long to wait for her desire. Almachius sent messengers to reason with her, and persuade her to give up her faith. When, instead, she persuaded them to become Christians, his anger was roused openly against her, and he ordered her to be put to death.

As a subject for artists, St. Cecilia has been almost as much of a favourite as St. Catherine. We may note that it is in Italy she was most popular among painters. French and Spanish artists seldom painted her, nor did Germans, which is the more curious, because Germany has always been such a music-loving country.

The Italian painter Cimabue painted what is most likely the first known picture of her, which is now in a gallery at Florence. It is a picture of a woman wrapped in a kind of veil, with a palm in one hand, to show that she died for her faith, and a bible in the other, and there are eight little pictures round this one, showing different scenes in her life. One picture of her by Raphael is very famous. She is holding a little organ in her hands, and is not playing, but listening to the angels singing above her, so absorbed in the beauty of their music that she has forgotten her own. There are some instruments at her feet, a pipe and a flute and a tabor, and a wide flat book of music lying open.

She has been painted with all kinds of musical instruments as her emblem. Flowers are often painted with her, too, almond blossom and lilies, and red and white roses, and she is often attended by angels, the angels that the legend tells us came to hear her sweet singing. We may take them as the symbol of the beautiful thought that may come to everyone, when they forget themselves in listening to good music.

RELIGIOUS ATMOSPHERE.

WE are not to have the revised report or the complete text of the address on this subject given by the Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND at the public meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in Whit-week. We should have been glad to offer it for the consideration of our readers, and we hope that before long Mr. DRUMMOND will contribute a series of articles to THE INQUIRER dealing with this and other subjects, vitally affecting our common religious life.

"Religious atmosphere" was the main subject of his address, in which the issue was set before us with great earnestness, as between a merely intellectual interest in questions of religious thought and the controlling power of a true spirit of devotion, which must pervade a living church. Too often, it was said, those who have broken away from their old theological moorings, are intellectually attracted to our churches, but then after some experience of their actual life, are spiritually repelled, and seek a more satisfying home elsewhere. And if, as a matter of fact, there are a great many more Unitarians in other connections than within the fellowship of our own churches, is that altogether their fault? Must it not be to some extent, at least, due to the lack of helpful, sympathetic, and controlling force in our congregational life? Must we not give more heed to the nurture in our churches of the earnest spirit of devotion and worship, as the supreme purpose for which they exist, and is it possible in any other way to justify their existence as churches, in which the people shall be able to find the spiritual sustenance they so sorely need?

Such questions as these mark a point at which we have always to be on our guard. Writing last week of the urgent need of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association of fresh support, that its work may be maintained at least at the present standard of efficiency, we said that the minds of men must be supplied with the elements of rational religion, or they will be spiritually starved. But that is not the whole of the matter. The Association has indeed a great work to do, and it would be a grievous thing if the members of our churches suffered it to be crippled through the lack of sufficient means; but they have also to remember their own part in this work, the duty which is theirs immediately and very urgently, in every one of the churches, to maintain the vital force of spiritual communion, without which the enlightened views of rational religion will be as barren husks to the hungry soul.

This brief article is followed by some extracts from BARCLAY'S "Apology," which we offer to our readers, for their very earnest consideration, as an object lesson of what the power of spiritual worship may be. Such a testimony as that, so utterly sincere and genuine, must surely bring home to us the true meaning of worship in the church, and lead us to search our own hearts, and see whether we do indeed accept that ideal and are seeking in our churches for that communion of the Spirit, by which alone the great gift of life may be ours.

It is a gift of Divine grace, not to be had by self-seeking, or self-conscious effort, but through self-forgetfulness, reverent and humble, steadfastly set to do the work of the kingdom. The religious atmosphere that will make others glad to come in and stay with us and add their offering of worship and of helpful service to ours, will be found only among those who are gathered in the church because of their supreme need of God, and for the sake of perfect self-surrender to His holy will.

We come together to acknowledge that all we have is His gift, that in the deeper places of our hidden life He is forever present, His holiness moving within us to quicken reverence, His righteousness making us strong and eager to prove its power in the world, His love making us glad, and filling us with the pure desire to give and to help and bless. It is the joy of life with the ETERNAL that must be quickened in the gathering of faithful worshippers, and then its power, expressed in many forms of worship, in the manifest presence of the brotherly spirit, as in the daily lives of the brethren, will lay hold of others, who come in with their own hidden needs, and hunger of the heart still unsatisfied, and will gather them into the fellowship, to share in the common blessing.

Then the full measure of our knowledge of God is spoken from the heart, with a glad confidence, not with self-assertion or any dogmatic finality, but as testimony of the life which cannot be denied. It thus becomes true witness of the Spirit, in those who stand with faces turned towards the light, ready, when the time shall come, for a further measure of divine revelation. That is the great joy of this life with God, that it is not of ourselves, that it is not our truth, but His, just so much of His message as is so far committed to us. By the way of faithfulness, with the light of undying hope, confident that there is more to come, we ask simply for strength to do more and more of His perfect will, to speak the fuller, more illuminating, more convincing word, and to help by every means within our power towards the coming of His Kingdom among men. That is the way, which the MASTER has made plain to us, for the doing of the FATHER'S will. So we are to lose our self-centred, self-conscious life in CHRIST'S spirit of true brotherhood, and then we need not fear but that there will be in our church power unto eternal life.

TRUE SPIRITUAL WORSHIP.

FROM ROBERT BARCLAY'S "APOLOGY" (1676).

From the chapter "Concerning Worship," as understood by "the People called, in scorn, Quakers."

WE judge it the duty of all to be diligent in the assembling of themselves together (and what we have been, and are, in this matter, our enemies in Great Britain, who have used all means to hinder our assembling together to worship God, may bear witness), and when assembled, the great work of one and all ought to be to wait upon God: and retiring out of their own thoughts and imaginations, to feel the Lord's presence, and know a gathering into His name indeed, where He is in the midst, according to his promise. And as everyone is thus gathered and so met together inwardly in their spirits, as well as outwardly in their persons, there the secret power and virtue of life is known to refresh the soul, and the pure motions and breathings of God's Spirit are felt to arise; from which, as words of declaration, prayers, or praises arise, the acceptable worship is known, which edifies the church, and is well pleasing to God. And no man here limits the Spirit of God, nor bringeth forth his own conned and gathered stuff; but everyone puts that forth which the Lord puts into their hearts: and it is uttered forth not in man's will and wisdom, but in the evidence and demonstration of the Spirit, and of power. Yea, though there be not a word spoken, yet is the true spiritual worship performed, and the body of Christ edified; yet, it may, and hath often fallen out among us, that divers meetings have passed without one word; and yet our souls have been greatly edified and refreshed, and our hearts wonderfully overcome with the secret sense of God's power and Spirit, which without words hath been ministered from one vessel to another. This is indeed strange and incredible to the mere natural and carnally-minded man who will be apt to judge all time lost when there is not something spoken that is obvious to the outward senses; and therefore I shall insist a little upon this subject, as one that can speak from a certain experience, and not by mere hearsay, of this wonderful and glorious dispensation; which hath so much the more of the wisdom and glory of God in it, as it is contrary to the nature of man's spirit, will, and wisdom.

* * * * *

This is that divine and spiritual worship, which the world neither knoweth nor understandeth, which the vulture's eye hath not seen into. Yet many and great are the advantages which my soul, with many others, hath tasted of hereby, and which would be found of all such as would seriously apply themselves hereunto: for, when people are gathered thus together, not merely to hear men, nor depend upon them, but all are inwardly taught to stay their minds upon the Lord, and wait for his appearance in their hearts; thereby the forward working of the spirit of man is stayed and hindered from mixing itself with the worship of God; and the form of this worship is so naked and void of all outward and wordly splendour, that all occasion for man's wisdom to be exercised in that superstition and idolatry hath no lodging here; and so there being also an inward quietness and retiredness of mind, the witness of God ariseth in the heart, and the light of Christ shineth, whereby the soul cometh to see its own condition. And there being many joined together in the same work, there is an inward travail and wrestling; and also, as the measure of grace is abode in, an overcoming of the power and spirit of darkness; and thus we are often greatly strengthened and renewed in the spirits of our minds without a word, and we enjoy and possess the holy fellowship and communion of the body and blood of Christ, by which our inward man is nourished and fed, which makes us not to dote upon outward water, and bread and wine, in our spiritual things. Now as many thus gathered together grow up in the strength, power, and virtue of truth, and as truth comes thus to have victory and dominion in their souls, then they receive an utterance, and speak steadily to the edification of their brethren, and the pure life hath a free passage through them, and what is thus spoken edifieth the body indeed. Such is the evident certainty of that divine strength that is communicated by thus meeting together, and waiting in silence upon God, that sometimes when one hath come in, that hath been unwatchful and wandering in his mind, or suddenly out of the hurry of outward business, and so not inwardly gathered with the rest, so soon as he retires himself inwardly, this power being in a good measure raised in the whole meeting, will suddenly lay hold upon his spirit, and wonderfully help to raise up the good in him, and beget him into the sense of the same power, to the melting and warming of his heart.

Yea, sometimes, when there is not a word in the meeting, but all are silently waiting, if one come in that is rude and wicked, and in whom the power of darkness prevaileth much, perhaps with an intention to mock or do mischief, if the whole meeting be gathered into the life, and it be raised in a good measure, it will strike terror into such an one, and he will feel himself unable to resist; but by the secret strength and virtue thereof the power of darkness in him will be chained down; and if the day of his visitation be not expired, it will reach to the measure of grace in him, and raise it up to the redeeming of his soul. And this we often bear witness of, so that we have had frequent occasion in this respect, since God hath gathered us to be a people, to renew the old saying of many, Is Saul also among the prophets? For not a few have come to be convinced of the truth after this manner, of which I myself, in part, am a true witness, who not by strength of arguments, or by a particular disquisition of each doctrine, and convictionment of my understanding thereby, came to receive and bear witness to the truth, but by being secretly reached by this life; for when I came into the silent assemblies of God's people, I felt a secret power among them, which touched my heart, and as I gave way to it I found the evil weakening in me, and the good raised up, and so I became thus knit and united unto them, hungering more and more after the increase of this power and life, whereby I might feel myself perfectly redeemed. And, indeed, this is the surest way to become a Christian, to whom afterwards the knowledge and understanding of principles will not be wanting, but will grow up so much as is needful, as the natural fruit of this good root; and such a knowledge will not be barren nor unfruitful. After this manner we desire, therefore, all that come among us to be proselyted, knowing that though thousands should be convinced in their understanding of all the truths we maintain, yet if they were not sensible of this inward life, and their souls changed from unrighteousness to righteousness, they could add nothing to us. For this is that cement whereby we are joined as to the Lord, so to one another, and without this none can worship with us. Yea, if such should come among us, and from that understanding and convictionment they have of the truth, speak ever so true things and utter them forth with ever so much excellency of speech, if this life were wanting it would not edify us at all, but be as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal.

Our work then and worship is, when we meet together, for everyone to watch and wait upon God in themselves, and to be gathered from all visibles thereunto. And as everyone is thus stated, they come to find the good arise over the evil, and the pure over the impure, in which God reveals himself, and draweth near to every individual, and so he is in the midst in the general, whereby each not only partakes of the particular refreshment and strength which comes from the good in himself, but is a sharer in the whole body, as being a living member of the body, having a joint fellowship and communion with all.

When the magistrates, stirred up by the malice and envy of our opposers, have used all means possible (and yet in vain) to deter us from meeting together, and that openly and publicly in our own hired houses for that purpose, both death, banishments, imprisonments, finings, beatings, whippings, and other such devilish inventions, have proved ineffectual to terrify us from our holy assemblies. And we having, I say, thus oftentimes purchased our liberty to meet, by deep sufferings, our opposers have then taken another way, by turning in upon us the worst of wickedest people, yea, the very offscourings of men, who by all manner of inhuman, bestly, and brutish behaviour, have sought to provoke us, weary us, and molest us, but in vain. It would be almost incredible to declare, and indeed a shame, that among men pretending to be Christians it should be mentioned what things of this kind men's eyes have seen, and I myself, with others, have shared of in suffering! They have often beaten us, and cast water and dirt upon us: then they have danced, leaped, sung, and spoken all manner of profane and ungodly words; offered violence and shameful behaviour to grave women and virgins; jeered, mocked, and scoffed, asking us If the Spirit was not yet come? And much more, which were tedious here to relate; and all this while we have been seriously and silently sitting together, and waiting upon the Lord. So that by these things our inward and spiritual fellowship with God, and one with another, in the pure life of righteousness hath not been hindered. But, on the contrary, the Lord knowing our sufferings and reproaches for his testimony's sake, hath caused his power and glory more to abound among us, and hath mightily refreshed us by the sense of his love, which hath filled our souls; and so much the rather, as we found ourselves gathered into the name of the Lord, which is the strong tower of the righteous; whereby we found ourselves sheltered from receiving any inward hurt from their malice; and also that he had delivered us from that vain name and profession of Christianity, under which our opposers were not ashamed to bring forth those bitter and cursed fruits. Yea, sometimes in the midst of this tumult and opposition God would powerfully move some or other of us, by his Spirit, both to testify to that joy which notwithstanding their malice we enjoyed, and powerfully to declare in the evidence and demonstration of the Spirit against their folly and wickedness; so as the power of truth hath brought them to some measure of quietness and stillness, and stopped the impetuous streams of their fury and madness; that even as of old Moses by his rod divided the waves of the Red Sea that the Israelites might pass; so God hath thus by His Spirit made a way for us in the midst of this raging wickedness peacefully to enjoy and possess him, and accomplish our worship to him; so that sometimes upon such occasions several of our opposers and interrupters have thereby been convinced of the truth, and gathered from being persecutors to be sufferers with us.

NEVER be afraid to doubt, if only you have the disposition to believe, and doubt in order that you may end in believing the truth.—Robert Leighton.

LET any one fix his attention on a moral truth, and it spreads out and enlarges its dimensions beneath his view, till what seemed at first as barren a proposition as words could express, appears like an interesting and glorious truth, momentous in its bearing on the destinies of men. And so it is with every material thing. Let the mind be intently fixed upon it, and hold it in the light of science, and it gradually unfolds new wonders.—W. B. O. Peabody.

EXPERIMENTS IN SOCIALISM.

V.—THE MORAVIAN ANABAPTISTS.

THE main object of these articles has been to show that when people assume that a certain proportion of our population cannot be set to work because there is nothing they can usefully do, they are making a most lamentable and far-reaching mistake. They are failing to apprehend the most elementary of economic truths. The real work of every mortal is to make his own living, and if any able-bodied man is unable to do that, it is not because of any economic impossibility but because a selfish and artificial constitution of society prevents him doing so, and because for one reason or another those who have the power to correct what is wrong in that constitution do not choose to exert their power. If we had no land beyond what we were making the utmost use of, the case would be totally different; but with abundance of land at disposal, we have the simplest means of enabling every honest man to maintain himself, whenever we choose to do it. Whenever and wherever the attempt has been made to enable people to live by direct resort to the land, it has invariably been found that the difficulty has not been to produce abundant maintenance for every worker, but is simply a difficulty of exchange, and it has been shown in these articles that when that one difficulty has been overcome by planting colonies on a sufficiently large scale and by making them industrial as well as agricultural, the most complete success has been attained. The whole question is one of land and capital, and fairly honest and capable organisation, and it does not matter one brass button where the capital comes from, or whether the control is public or private. Let the welfare of the workers be the prime object, let the scale be sufficiently bold, and the management honest and fairly competent, and you may do anything you please, and that without the least disturbance of existing industries or commercial interests—except in so far as those interests are maintained by taking an unrighteous advantage of the weakness and misery of the poor.

And it does not matter what are the social theories or the religious beliefs of the people who undertake the business. They may be agnostic reformers like the new Harmony people, or religious transcendentalists like those at Brook Farm; they may be ignorant fanatics like the Shakers, or Jesuit priests co-operating with barbarians as in Paraguay. They can always raise for themselves abundant food. The only difficulty is the producing and the exchanging of a surplus sufficient to meet their secondary requirements. I suppose if we had looked all over Europe any time during the past three or four hundred years, we should hardly have found any people less likely to succeed in a practical matter of this kind than the Anabaptist Moravians of the sixteenth and the latter part of the fifteenth century. They were not a homogeneous body of people; not even of any one nation. They were a miscellaneous host drawn together by certain religious beliefs, the leading one apparently being that the New Testament was the one and only guide for Christians. At a time of political chaos and religious persecution, a rumour went abroad that down in a certain corner of Austria there was a little haven of rest and peace, where, under the shelter of some of the nobles of the land, the people were free to live their own lives and follow their own religion, and from all the four winds of heaven, people flocked towards this blessed shelter—not because of any fitness for agriculture, or associated labour, or communal life, but because they were, as we should account them and as they were accounted by the world around them, fanatics, cranks, fools. Hardly any gathering of mortals would have been less likely to develop a social community that, in the fullest sense of the word, would flourish for a hundred and fifty years and then came to ruin only by their superabundance of wealth. But they began upon the land, and they resolved that they would not buy and sell for profit. It was not the Christian thing to do, to be making profit out of each other's necessities. They would buy what they could not do without in the way of raw materials, but they would raise their own food, and run their own workshops, and they would have everything in common just as the early Christians did.

Now it would be ten thousands times more foolish and fanatical for us to attempt to apply to our own difficulties the same simple principles in the same crude way, than it was for these Moravian Anabaptists to do so. We have four or five hundred years more of history and experience to look back upon than they had, and we have means of interpreting history such as these poor people never had. It would be blind and stupid of us to attempt to apply those principles in just the same way; but all the growing light of those four or five hundred years has made it only the clearer that those principles are absolutely right. All our social troubles beset us because our social system as a whole is based on buying and selling for private profit, and not for the common good. Much of our system is as completely communal as was that of the Anabaptists, and that is the only part that is entirely satisfactory. These people seem to have had at one time some eighty or ninety "households," each consisting of from 500 to 2,000 people, and they had everything in common—houses, schools, infirmaries, mills and workshops and factories—all were carried on for everybody alike. But it was all done in the narrowest and pettiest way. In many departments of our social life we adopt the same principle applied on a broad, bold, municipal or national scale. But in both cases the results have been the same magnificent success. The Moravian Protestants dug and delved on their own lands. They had their own vineyards, and orchards and cornfields and gardens, and they fed all their workers abundantly. What they could not eat themselves they had no need to send to distant markets. Fellow Protestants came swarming around them, and took their food in exchange for such things as their swarm could make. When eventually they were given a fortnight to clear out of the country on pain of hanging or burning, the people left behind them mills, all sorts of machinery, breweries, bakeries, linen and woollen factories, potteries, and workshops for the making of everything they could require, besides immense stores of corn and sheep and cattle and horses. From foundation to summit their whole fabric had been built on common land and for the common good, and they grew so rich and prosperous and comfortable that the Austrian Emperor began to plunder them by ruthless taxation, and the good Christians all around them, who were working every man for himself, cried shame upon them, because they were heretics sucking away the life blood of the country. The nobles—who found their own advantage in having their lands so well tenanted—tried to protect them against Emperor and Church and envious neighbours; but in the end they had to go, and though they begged hard that at least a few of their homes might be left undisturbed for the aged and sick among them, no mercy was shown. They were all turned out at the beginning of a Black Forest winter, after a century and a half of such prosperity as had imperilled their religion, and finally brought about their ruin. These cosmopolitan Anabaptists, with their mediæval methods and poor machinery and ignorance of science, were a thousand times better off in every way than vast numbers of our own population to-day as part of a great Christian nation with 13,000 millions of capital, unlimited land, and all the mechanical and scientific resources of the highest civilisation at command. They were able to get at the land, and out of that and their own factories and workshops they fetched all they wanted for healthy and comfortable life. That is their story in its main lines, though, of course, it is not their whole story.

Neither of these famous experiments—neither the Austrian Anabaptists, the North American Shakers, nor the South American Indians, could possibly have succeeded as they did if efforts had been confined to the land alone, or to factories and workshops alone. One was the necessary complement of the other, simply because each made a market for the other. Where the same thing has been tried under similar or even vastly more advantageous circumstances, but without this mutual support of the field and the factory, as it has been shown in this series, the attempt has resulted in disastrous failure, and it always will do so. We are about to try a momentous change in our land system, and as the proposals sketched out involve the public acquisition of land, the encouragement and assistance of the actual land worker, and the fostering and promotion of co-operation, the promised legislation may be hailed with hearty satisfaction. But it is not the mere giving of access to the land that will solve our social troubles and silence the wail of the unemployed in our streets. It is undoubtedly a step in the right direction, and if it increases the output of the land as a whole it will be for the public good. But it will not be the unqualified good that many anticipate, apart from co-operation. It is to this element in the Government proposals that we must look for final results, and there is no reason in the world why the public purchase of land, the advance of public capital, and the assistance of credit banks and co-operative societies—all of which are indicated in the Government proposals—should not be resorted to for the direct creation of home colonies, which in ten years' time would do more to instruct the nation in sound progressive economics and to heal the running sores of the body politic, than ten generations of the outworking of individual effort on the land, only slowly and painfully groping its way to corporate enterprise on precisely the same principles as proved only too successful with the Moravians three hundred years ago. Every real advance in our own social organism has been on the same lines—not for individual profit, but individual services publicly organised for the common good. If our churches would all of them now take their stand on the really Christian lines of these Moravian Anabaptists and of their own postal service, and would call on the Government not only to give the worker access to the land, but properly to equip and organise them so that they may get their own living, make proper contribution to the common wealth, and eventually become not only self-supporting, but self-directing—subject, of course, to central control—if all the churches would combine to urge this direct application of the great principle of brotherhood they would carry the vast mass of the population with them on the most direct of all possible roads towards a radical solution of all our social problems together.

GEORGE F. MILLIN.

A NEW EARTH.

BY HOPE WEST, IN THE "CHRISTIAN REGISTER."

"THE earth is the Lord's." Most men believe that dully; but many consider it a rather poor piece of property, well enough, perhaps, for God's footstool. And Earth's motherliness is so general, so levelling, as to be largely held in contempt: not many acknowledge her as "nearest of kin."

When our President sets aside "a special day of thanksgiving and praise to the Almighty, because of the blessings we have received," has he at heart one thought of "Mother Earth"? Is reverence for earth a part of anyone's piety? Do not the majority think of earth as at enmity with man?—"the natural man," his own enemy?

We read such nonsense as this even in the Register. Speaking of man, "Nature is always trying to get rid of him, and he exists only because he has gained the power to subdue nature, to overcome her crude forces and violent antagonisms, and make them do his will." No thanks to the earth. But how did he exist before he gained this power? Is it natural for a man to forget his babyhood, and, plainly, Nature wants him to forget it; but he cannot deny it when it is brought before him, even if he would deny his mother.

As a child I was taught that the earth was God's footstool, and so I thought of it. No one pays very intimate attention to his footstool. I accepted a rose without a thought of the bare, brown earth about the roots of the rosebush. And later in life I had not outstepped my teachers. If I had been asked, what is the most beautiful thing in the world? I might have answered, A love-lighted face, quite forgetting "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." I thought that love had nothing to do with earth: its plans and purposes were all above it. Sometime love would allow me to leave the earth.

If the earth is not all-wise, it is, at least, able to do the will of One all-wise. All that a man is, earth's discipline has made him, all that he possesses earth has given him. The bare brown earth is not only beauty-full, it is also service-full. Service-full is a better word used here than service-able.

The earth serves divinely. This selfless service is for all alike. But, while there are souls so near to the soul of Nature, that, lacking all other comfort, they can press cheek to the earth and be comforted, others see in this divine service only indifference. Earth speaks to them, but they do not hear. And abundant crops mean planting, ploughing, and harvesting, no more.

Plant a seed in the earth, and let anyone watch the wonder of what happens, if he can,—except with more earth and another seed. You may say, if we knew the secret of the seed, the earth would be stripped of most of its honours. So learned a man as Lord Kelvin has thought it possible that the seed was a gift to earth, "brought by some seed-bearing meteor,"—as unsatisfactory a theory as could be thought of. The secret of seed and soul is the same. There is but one Mind, and that is in everything accounting for it. A new earth will compel a new heaven, and that heaven will be a universe wide enough for all things.

We bury our dead and hold that one small spot as sacred. "All manner of four-footed beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air," that have gone down to death, if we think of them at all, we think: What of it? Were they not common and unclean? There are view-points from which humanity shows dulness and little else. The mud lifted by our shoes may have in it more of understanding than is in our human hearts, more of service, more of kindness. But the earth is gentle. It provides for us and heals the hurt we do. I think an arrogant, selfish, unclean soul must stand alone in the universe. It is no more of earth than it is of heaven.

It is no infrequent thing for a man to express his disdain in these words, "of the earth, earthy." Even Shakespeare speaks of "the dull elements of earth and water;" and Dryden, "Earthy spirits black and envious are." What is an earthy spirit? Is it the one whom the earth can comfort? Or is it the one who speaks of "the lifeless clod" and "the heartlessness of Nature?" Dictionaries define both earthiness and earthliness as "grossness," and earthily as "not heavenly or spiritual; carnal." Earthly-mindedness is "extreme devotedness to earthly objects; grossness; sensuality." Earth could hardly be rated lower. It does not seem fit even to be God's footstool.

Man will never subdue the earth: it is older and wiser than he. But he may become acquainted with it,—mind to mind. There is nothing hidden that shall not be revealed, but not a secret will be given up without compensating endeavour on our part. Who but a clear simpleton can think of earth as his slave! And yet men have. There are men to-day who do. They gather gold and silver and knowledge for a few short years and think the victory is theirs.

Earth has not yet done its utmost. Hidden in it are not the faces of those who shall live a thousand years from now, bright, brave, joyful faces, and the brains that will be back of them, but the secrets that the world cannot receive until these are come. For those who lived a thousand years ago the "impossible" has come to pass in the uses of electricity and wireless telegraphy. All this discovery has been by the way of the earth,—mind meeting mind.

There are those who shudder at Nature's hold upon them,—"Earth to earth." But, if Nature is unconquerable, all the better, since it is also responsible. We are safe. We can no more fail Nature than Nature can fail us. Earth is an artificer of wonderful intelligence. The seed is a living thing. It is made out of the dust. The earth must be mindful as well as lifeful. Since earth can produce a seed, why not a soul? Why should the spirit of mortal be proud—above other things?

If I pray by planting and watering and digging about, and the earth answers by giving the rose a brighter colour, or a peach larger and finer than ever before, or an abundant harvest of whatever I may have asked for, is the prayer greater than the answer? Verily it is not, and it is good to know even so much as that about ourselves and our relation to earth. Religion has turned its back upon earth, and a woful mistake it has made. It is our nearest of kin.

Beyond prayer, the act that is a soul's utmost toward bringing about that which it desires, a man is utterly helpless, as helpless as a seed. Life has been given him. It is not his to keep. Nor can he create the least living thing. But he may discover. If Nature is not the creative hand, it is the glove on that hand, revealing as well as concealing. Either earth is infinitely intelligent, or it is the honourable ambassador of Infinite Intelligence. I am cared for by Infinite Intelligence, and, in either case, the earth can tell me that which I long to know. I have but to draw near and question. Mind must meet mind. We can never receive our own until we are able to ask for it.

The nature-lover has come nearer and received more than he who plants and waters only that he may reap; but there is generous answer for all, even the lumberer. The sun shines upon him and his, and the earth is at one with the sun. All of Nature's work is divinely done. When the finer characters are only confusion to the eye, there is the great primer type—gold, silver, and diamonds, coal, copper, and iron, food, shelter, and raiment. Earth has no scorn for her primer pupils. They may even think themselves petted, as children are, but they are also largely excluded. He who communes with the frozen grass and the dead leaves, with the broken and the shadowed, he it is who is warmed to the heart although, if he had feared and held back, he could not have believed that possible.

The diamond has a wonderful story to tell, but the living grass tells more.

It is doing. It gives and takes. It goes and returns. Beside the grass jewelled with dew-drops diamonds are coldly sparing, covetous. By his choice of these the man classes himself.

Before we can know anything positive about God and his heaven, we must become acquainted with earth. There is a strong relationship between flesh and soul. We have been made ashamed of this relationship. It is time that we were ashamed of that shame. "He that humbleth himself shall be exalted."

When we came to believe in the deathlessness of the atom, we had reached high ground and a wide outlook. Deathlessness is the law on earth as it is in heaven. Immortality will not always be defined as "exemption from death," for death will be forgotten. Using the words "Nature" and "an Intelligent Energy" instead of God and our Father does not change the face of the mother: the one conclusion is inescapable. Mind is the mother of all things. Mind has always been at the front, designing, commanding, leading.

That in due time we cast a hindering body for one in which we shall have greater freedom is as much in the course of nature as the caterpillar's change into the butterfly, or as any other change which we call natural. Change leads all naturalness. It is always ahead, and so insistent in its teaching that it would seem that a wayfaring man though a fool need not err therein. But it is not reasonable, much less worshipful, to suppose that the Eternal would consort with the perishable, Power with weakness, Wisdom with foolishness, Entity with nonentity. The earth is mighty. It is white-hearted, or heaven is degraded.

Thinking is the highest listening. It is mind in touch with Mind. There is meaning in the fragrance of dead leaves. The broken, blossomless thing that stands helpless and hopeless at the end of summer has not lived a useless life, failed, unless I fail. It is now ready to reveal something of "Him that sent me" if I am ready to receive the revelation. I, the creature, could not know of that tenderness in the Creator which we call pity except through my own being, and I could not know of it in myself except through the helpless wretchedness (so called) that confronts me. Even wretchedness may be, in reality, an angel of light.

King David had not offered his eyes for healing when he said so pitifully, "My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God." His courts are here as well as his green pastures and still waters, and they are open courts.

The earth is the Lord's,—might of his might and substance of his substance. When all men believe this, soul will be crying to soul, "Joy! shipmate, joy!"

And the seas need not be smooth.

St. Joseph, Mo.

He is not really living, however full he may be of warmth of feeling, and of energy in action, who does not in some degree know what it is to crave ideas and knowledge, to seek for truth, and to delight in finding it.—Phillips Brooks.

IN THE CROW'S NEST.

I WAS bewailing my state, like Jephtha's daughter, among the mountains; for Corva and the chicks had fled, like birds of passage, to keep May-day in England. I sought out the loneliest little valley I knew, the Val Champagna, between Munt Gravatscha and Muottas Muraigl, which provides exactly the needed setting for sulky desolation; and I had just discovered the right stone on which to be miserable in comfort, and subsided upon it, when

"O the sweet contentment the country-man doth find,

Hey tra-lolli-lolli-lo, hey tra-lolli-lee!"

rolled, in a good round baritone, upon my incredulous ears. If Patience on a monument suddenly cried, "How provoking!"; if a marble Silence beckoned with her rose and began to chatter scandal, the effect would be similar. I am not much of a songster, but the challenge was irresistible, and I clapped into 't roundly:

"The quiet contemplation possesseth all my mind,"—

A man with a pipe sprang up from behind a boulder, and the stave remained unfinished.

"Izaak Walton," I exclaimed, "by all that is unusual!"

"Yes, I'm fond of him," said the Englishman. "Not that I fish. It's his English I like. The Lives are as good as the Angler. Are you an eighteenth-century man?—Oh, I know all about that," he went on, before I could phrase my point, "but I count him pure eighteenth-century. Dryden, too. The eighteenth century was not a period, but a principle. Crabbe belongs to it at the other end—I half think Rogers, too. But not Blake, nor even Burns. I swallow it whole, every morsel of it, except Sam Johnson."

"You would need the mouth of Gargantua," I conceded. "But why this invidious exception? He's eighteenth-century enough, surely."

"No genius," said the man with the pipe. "His writings are nothing. His talk must have been good. But I hate him for patronising Goldsmith, and belittling Gray."

"Why, Goldsmith has no grievance, I think. 'Nihil quod tetigit non ornavit.' And there is another incident—"

"Yes, there is. Why should Johnson have told about it? As for the epitaph, he wrote it to show off his Latin. And he called Gray 'a mechanical poet.' The numskull! Gray did a thing that no other Englishman in history, except, perhaps, Pope, could have done."

"What was that?"

"The expansion of the Elegy. He wrote it first in lines of 8, 'long-metre'—"

"How do you know?"

"Internal evidence!" said the other, impatiently. "This kind of thing:

The curfew tolls the knell of day;
The herd winds slowly o'er the lea;
The ploughman homewards plods his way
And leaves the darkening world to me."

Save that from yonder ivied tower
The owl doth to the moon complain
That wanderers near her secret bower
Molest her solitary reign.

The call of incense-breathing morn,
The swallow, twitt'ring from the shed,
Nor clarion cock, nor echoing horn
Shall rouse them from their lowly bed."

There scattered, earliest of the year,
By hands unseen are violets found;
The red-breast loves to warble there
And little footsteps print the ground."

He went through the whole poem, offering some alternatives, such as "The breezy call of fragrant morn," but I give a few specimens only.

"Well," he went on, "it was not a bad poem. But it needed body and dignity. The thought was too heavy for the metre. So he added two syllables to every line. Think what that means!"

I did my best. "If you are right," I said soon, "it means the insertion of an epithet of two syllables, trochaic, into nearly every line."

"Yes, and why? Because the phrasing was already so nearly perfect. Here and there he could substitute something, or invert something, but only here and there. So he had to make the best of what he had written, and find a trochee which would at least not spoil—if possible, would improve—the effect of his line. Think how splendidly he did it. Wanted, an epithet for owl. If you had searched for two years, would you have hit on that absolute best, 'the moping owl'?"

"Probably not."

"No, nor even Pope. Why, man, it's Shaksperian."

"Do you count Shakspeare to the eighteenth century?"

"Of course I do, and to the twentieth, and the thirtieth, too. 'The moping owl,' and then 'the envied kiss,' 'her ample page,' 'some village Hampden,' 'the madding crowd,'—the line is strengthened every time. When Mason was finishing Gray's ode on Vicissitude, and wanted an epithet for 'crowd,' he could find nothing better than 'madding'. Even where the new word is less striking, see how perfectly it matches the sound and sense: 'mouldering heap,' 'busy housewife,' 'useful toil,' 'homely joys,' 'living lyre,' 'genial current of the soul,' 'desert air.' Where nothing was needed, how skilfully he adds the required nothing! 'The 'customed hill'; 'animated' instead of 'breathing,' perhaps. The other devices, I allow, are not quite so happy. 'The fathers of the hamlet sleep' was perfect as it stood. 'The rude fore-fathers of the hamlet' does not touch quite the same stop. Still, he succeeded admirably, all through, except in one verse."

"Which verse?"

"That about the violets and robins. It was too dainty for a second touch. 'Scattered of' with 'the earliest of the year' makes nonsense. 'To build and warble' is all wrong. But none knew that better than Gray. He sacrificed the verse in a later edition."

"You write verse yourself?" I suggested.

"No. I make verse, of course; we all do; but I write down nothing except translations."

"May I ask what you have translated?"

"Oh, several things, for instance, by Conrad Ferdinand Meyer. Do you know his piece about the old Switzers, when Leo XIII. wanted to stop their Trinkgeld?"

"Very well," said I. "Might I hear your version?"

He recited as follows:—

"The lobby by Raphael made splendid and proud

Resounds to the tramp of the on-coming crowd;

They troop in their quaint puffy doublet and hose

As if Murten's trumpet-peal called them to close.

"Your Holiness, shield of the truth and the true,

This can't be allowed, for it really won't do!

You niggler in candles, and save on the fire—

Don't try to beat down your Helvetians, sire!

"When the summit celestial in glory you reach

The bonus we get is eleven dollars each; So is it, so has it been, time out of sight:

We stand on our ancient historical right!

"Your Holiness knows us—how modest and mild,

Unassuming and gentle, from father to child;

But once make the effort to dock us of pay,

And, roaring like lions, we leap on our prey!

"Come, Holiness, out with the dollars! if not,

We ransack your boxes and drawers on the spot:

By thunder and plunder and Belzebub's lair,

We'll put up to auction St. Cephas's chair!"

"His horrified Holiness crosses himself, And wavers, and ends by conceding the pelf.

Then where are the lions? Such lambkins are they!

'O father, most holy, now bless us, we pray!'"

I said what I was called upon to say, and then asked the man with the pipe what wind had blown him into the Val Cham-pagna.

"Oh," he replied, offering his card, "I am a traveller in French wines, and have had some business at Samaden. The name attracted me."

If any reader regards this account as improbable, and charges me with colouring the facts, I shall reply that some of it is true, at any rate.

E. W. LUMMIS.

THE Exhibition of "Palestine in London," opened at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, by the Bishop of London on Tuesday, should by no means be missed by teachers, nor, indeed, by any who may be glad of such an opportunity of realising the conditions of the country and the life of the people of Palestine. The exhibition is to be open until July 2, from noon till 10 p.m.

THE VAN MISSION.

THE weather has been most unsuitable for van meetings. A year ago delightful evenings were the rule before June came in, while so far this season scarcely a meeting has been unaccompanied either by heavy rain or piercing cold, and on some nights meetings have been out of the question.

Under these circumstances it is gratifying to be able to report many first-class meetings from all parts of the field. Everything, so far, points to a repetition of last year's success, and some of the results have exceeded anticipation.

As reported a fortnight ago, the campaign opened at Bradford, Manchester, with No. 1 Van (Lay Missioner, Mr. A. Barnes), which afterwards moved on to Ashton, where a pitch had been secured in the market-place. No meeting, however, was possible. The rain came down in torrents. On Friday Rev. John Barron, the new minister at Ashton, determined to begin in spite of the weather, and kept a small audience together for nearly two hours, while on Saturday night he and the missioner, Rev. A. C. Smith, and Rev. T. P. Spedding, held an umbrella meeting which was only dispersed when the missioner declared that they must leave for trams. On Sunday Mr. Smith had an audience of over 300. The van left for Mossley on Monday, June 3, and stayed there four nights, in consequence of the splendid prospects at the opening. Wednesday, however, was lost through rain, and cold and damp seriously interfered with Tuesday and Thursday. The Mossley congregation displayed great interest, and over 120 signed the visitors' book. Rev. J. E. Stead conducted the mission, his helpers being the Rev. W. G. Price, of Stalybridge, and the Rev. T. P. Spedding. Many Mossley friends went out to the Upper Mill meetings, which were in charge of the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, of Sheffield. Here the missioner had occasion to ask a small favour from the wife of a local minister, who, however, declined the loan of a Bible on the ground that she had no sympathy with the mission. On the other hand, Spiritualist friends offered the use of their hall for a meeting if the night should prove unfavourable. The van is at Huddersfield over to-morrow (Sunday) in charge of the Rev. W. W. Robinson, of Gainsborough; Monday-Wednesday, Mirfield; Thursday-Sunday (23rd), Dewsbury; missioner, the Rev. J. Ruddle.

No. 2 Van (Lay Missioner, Mr. Lenney) was taken by rail to Thornhill, in Duffries, to be ready for June 3. Rev. W. H. Lambelle, of Middlesbrough, joined in time for the Monday's meeting, and the Rev. J. Forrest, of Glasgow, conducted the week-end services. Mr. Lambelle writes: "The appearance of the van in the main street, with the name and the significant words, Truth, Liberty, and Religion, which stand boldly on each side, naturally aroused curiosity, and called forth expressions not altogether of a complimentary character. The men were very shy, but listened carefully to what was said. About 25 adults gathered near, and as confidence arose this number increased until at the close there were quite 100 men present—no women." Questions were asked, and the meeting was a decided success. Opposition, however, soon sprang up in the village, and the prejudice was so pronounced that men refused to fulfil their engagements to move the van; while people were cautioned against taking the tracts and pamphlets, because though "they would do no harm to one 'born again' they had the serpent's bite for all others." A divinity student was put up as expert heckler; and some one told Mr. Lambelle one evening that he was the first Unitarian they had known in Thornhill, and as he had not been invited there he was not wanted! These things were all taken in good part, Mr. Lambelle kept the objects of the Mission well to the fore; his meetings increased in numbers and kindliness, and he writes that the results must be considered satisfactory in every respect. For a whole week the place has had an absorbing topic of conversation and discussion. The Van has been uppermost in all minds, from the minister down to the boys and girls coming to the van in the field asking for a "wee book." At Sanguhar this week Rev. W. E. Attack, of Bradford, is the missioner, and next week Rev. A. Thornhill, of Carlisle, will be in charge of the work.

No. 3 Van (Lay Missioner, Mr. B. Talbot) should have been used for the first time at Stamford on May 30, but the rain prevented the meeting, as well as one on the Saturday. Rev. H. B. Smith, of Mottram, was the missioner, and with him was Rev. C. E. Pike, of London, who was to move into Rutlandshire. On the Friday nearly 100 persons were present, and double this number during part of the Sunday service. Mr. Smith says that the meetings were orderly, and that special interest was shown in the questions. "There was evident keenness and eagerness to receive on the faces of many in the audience. There is an unmistakable hunger for what we have to give. On Monday morning a man called to see me, and apologised for having unwittingly contradicted me with a false statement." On leaving Stamford the van was taken to Peterborough, where an audience of over 200, mostly men, was found. There was much questioning each night, some persistent opposition, and vain attempts to make the teachings of the mission look weak and dangerous. At times also the audience was very difficult to manage, and the proceedings did not pass off without noise and rudeness. The tiny market-place was crowded on the Wednesday, and the missioner had to contend against the babel voices of the fair and the efforts of a volunteer band. The conditions were very different at Yaxley, a few miles south of the cathedral city, and Rev. G. Lansdown, of Billingshurst, who "came into residence" on the 6th, accepted Mr. Talbot's advice to move on after two nights to Ramsey. Two nights were spent in this small town, with audiences of 230 and 450 respectively, and the report states that the utmost attention and sympathy were shown. Next week St. Neots and Sandy (Rev. A. Hurn).

No. 4 Van (Lay Missioner, Mr. C. Barker) began work at Oakham, where Rev. C. E. Pike was encouraged by the presence of an audience of about 200 people. Unfortunately, however, the mission arrived in the midst of the excitement of the election, and after the first night competing meetings were held by the rival parties. The Van audience on Tuesday came down to thirty, showing very little improvement even at question time. Mr. Pike writes:—"On Wednesday we had a similar difficulty to contend against. A women's Suffragist meeting took most of our people, but we held our meeting, and at its close took advantage of the presence of such a crowd to distribute about 500 tracts, &c. The political meetings had roused a rowdy element in the crowd, who moved our van. The bump against the kerb caused the breaking of some crockery and knocked down a lamp which was fortunately put out in time, or a serious disaster might have occurred."

Melton Mowbray was the next stopping place, and here Rev. W. C. Hall, of Small Heath, Birmingham, joined the van, and in this town a notable success has been scored, the people regretting that more meetings could not be held, and asking for a return visit. The pitch is described as of the worst, away from the town and the traffic. The Market Square, however, is small and the place really offers nothing better than the site selected. The meetings, with the exception of Saturday, were attended by audiences ranging from 200 to 350, the attendance on Saturday probably owing to shopping claims, not exceeding 180. Mr. Hall writes in high appreciation of the Mission. Rev. J. M. Mills, of Bootle, is now with the van, which is at Loughboro' over the weekend, and moves on to Coalville on the 17th, and to Ashley-de-la-Zouch on the 20th.

GENERAL BAPTIST ASSEMBLY.

THE two hundred and fifty-fourth annual meeting of this Assembly was held at Trowbridge on June 4 and 5.

At a conference, over which the outgoing President, the Rev. J. Watmough, of Headcorn, presided, the Rev. W. Harvey-Smith gave an address urging the need for a forward movement, and in the discussion which followed the Rev. J. Wain, W. Reynolds, J. H. Smith, S. Burrows, G. Latsdown, J. A. Brinkworth and others took part. The Assembly sermon was subsequently preached by the Rev. Walter Reynolds, the service being conducted by the Rev. F. T. Reed. The Rev. Joseph Wain afterwards conducted a communion service.

At the business meeting the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, the new President, took the chair. The report was more encouraging than of recent years, the trust property being also in a more satisfactory position.

A resolution of welcome to visitors of other churches was responded to by the Rev. F. Allen (London and S. E. Provincial Assembly), Rudolf Davis (Western Union), and Delta Evans. Greetings were received from the Rev. A. J. Marchant (happily making good progress after a serious operation) and the secretary of the B. and F.U.A.

The draft of a revised constitution, presented by the Rev. W. Harvey-Smith, was referred to the Board for further consideration.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEAL.

London: Mansford-street Mission.—The Rev. Gordon Cooper writes from "The Parsonage," Mansford-street, Bethnal Green, E.:—"Kindly allow me to appeal again to your readers for contributions to our Country Holiday and Convalescent Fund, and our Window gardening Society. I shall be most grateful for all subscriptions and donations, which will enable us to pay off the debts incurred last year (and in the former case there is a heavy deficit of £18), and to carry on the work this summer as fully as before. May I also say that one of our lady visitors in connection with the Provident Bank has had to give up the work. It has occurred to me that among your readers there may be someone who would be glad to take her place, and to join us in the work of the Mission."

Chester.—The South Cheshire District Association of Sunday-schools and congregations held its annual meeting at Matthew Henry's Chapel on Wednesday week, Mr. A. Orrell, the retiring president in the chair. An encouraging report was read by the Rev. H. Fisher Short, and it was adopted on the motion of the Rev. J. C. Street, seconded by the Rev. D. Davis. Mr. Hall Brooks, President of the East Cheshire Union, also spoke. The annual sermon was preached by the Rev. H. D. Roberts, of Liverpool.

Dudley.—A meeting of the Lay Preachers' Association, which is affiliated with the Midland Christian Union, took place at the Old Meeting House on Saturday last, the 8th inst. The following lay preachers were present:—Messrs. E. H. Atkinson, Oldbury; Josiah Baker, Kinver; R. A. Clarke, Birmingham; T. H. Hill, Nantwich; A. Horner, Walsall; W. H. Nightingale, Birmingham; W. L. Teasdale, Wolverhampton; Frank Taylor, Stourbridge; and J. Thornton, Birmingham. Mr. W. H. Nightingale presided. After prayer by Mr. Baker, the secretary (Rev. A. Thomson) read a number of apologies for absence, and then introduced the topic "Materials for Sermons." A lively and interesting discussion followed, in which numerous side-issues affecting lay preachers were touched upon. Messrs. Baker, Horner, Hill, Teasdale, Taylor, and the chairman took part. Tea was subsequently served by some ladies of the congregation in the school-room, where an enjoyable sociable hour was spent. All present recognised the value of such gatherings, where lay preachers could give vent to their difficulties, narrate their varied experiences, and by a comparison of notes and by mutual sympathy assist one another in work so valuable to the churches. It was decided to hold the next meeting at Small Heath (Birmingham) on Saturday, October 12.

London: George's Row Mission.—On Tuesday next, the 18th inst., a sale of work is to be held at the Mission, to be opened by Mrs. Enfield at 3 o'clock. Admission is free, and friends are reminded that the nearest stations are Aldersgate (Metropolitan) and Old-street (Tube, South London, Bank, Angel, Euston).

London: Hackney.—The bazaar in aid of the guarantee fund now being raised by the members of the New Gravel Pit Church, held at King's Hall, Holborn, June 5 and 6, has resulted in a contribution of about £400. At the close of the proceedings on the Thursday evening, Mr. Bowles, treasurer of the church, on behalf of the committee, presented Miss Whitehead with an oil painting by Mr. Phil Corrish as some small recognition of her untiring zeal to which so much of the success of the bazaar had been due. The bazaar has afforded a most agreeable occasion for a reunion of many old friends of the Hackney congregation who now reside in different parts of London. The members are most grateful for the kindly interest shown by many friends both far and near, and at morning service on Sunday last the Rev. H. Rawlings made the following reference to the matter:—"I cannot close the service this morning without alluding to the event of the past week, which has been the object of so much effort during the past months. I am sure that we shall all feel the results to be most encouraging. And with this feeling there should be another, inspired by the confidence which our friends have placed in us by supporting us so liberally—namely, a deepened sense of responsibility as to the spirit in which we carry on our work and the efficiency which we strive to attain to. These are my feelings, and I am confident that they will be shared by every one of you."

North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission.—At a recent meeting of the committee the grants to the assisted churches for the ensuing year were fixed; the treasurer, Mr. David Healey, J.P., reported the result of the appeal for a special fund to carry on the new movement at Blackburn; the National Conference questions respecting Advisory Committees and Ministerial Settlements were considered and answers were approved. Then it was announced by the chairman, Mr. Thomas Harwood, that the Rev. R. Travers Herford, who has been the secretary of the mission for fifteen and a-half years, was about to relinquish his post. Mr. Herford explained that it was mainly on account of the pressure of other work that he had decided to resign; but he also felt that, having held office as long as he had, he was justified in asking to be released. The Chairman and several others spoke highly of Mr. Herford's long and valuable services; but, perhaps, the most gracious compliment paid was that which came from the Rev. John Moore, who has acted as consulting secretary for the last few years. Mr. Moore said he had resigned his post in the hope that Mr. Herford might be induced to take his place, for his intimate knowledge and long experience eminently fitted him for that position, and it was highly desirable in the interests of the mission that his services should be retained in that capacity. A resolution was passed, placing on record the committee's grateful recognition of the valuable services rendered to the mission by Mr. Herford and Mr. Moore. Mr. Herford has kindly consented to remain in office until his successor is appointed.

Swansea.—A "Peace day" was observed at the Unitarian Church on Sunday last, and in special sermons on the subject the Rev. Simon Jones made references to the coming Hague Conference. He lamented the efforts of the military party to secure the schools as a training ground for soldiers, and severely criticised boys' brigades in the churches.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

A LARGE album of photographs of Boston, presented to Dr. Brooke Herford when he returned to this country in 1892, has been left by the kindness of his daughters for the present at Essex Hall, where it may be seen on application to the clerk in the Book Room. There are forty-three photographs, including several birds' eye views of the city, charming pictures of Boston Common and the Public Gardens, of the Harvard Gates, and of Longfellow's house at Cambridge, also a number of photographs of churches and public buildings. Three other photographs have since been added, of the new Boston Library. Intending visitors to the Boston Conference may also consult the United States and Canada Baedekers at Essex Hall.

WE are very glad to publish this week Miss von Petzold's most interesting account of her recent lecturing experience in Berlin, and the meeting of the Protestantenverein which she attended at Wiesbaden in Whitweek. It is a notable fact that Miss von Petzold not only gave public theological lectures, but conducted a religious service and preached in Berlin. It was, as she says, probably the first German service conducted by a woman in a church in that city.

MR. RICHARD HEAPE's generous interest in the historical associations of the Rochdale congregation is well known, and all that he has done to make the church beautiful. It will be seen from his letter in another column that he is anxious to complete the series of ministers' portraits which he has been so successful in collecting. We trust that this letter may lead to the discovery of further Rochdale portraits, and may at the same time suggest to members of other congregations a similar practical interest in the enrichment of their own churches.

THE second Peace Conference was opened at The Hague last Saturday, in the Hall of the Knights, in the Binnenhof, the Huis ten Bosch, where the Conference of 1898 was held, not being large enough to accommodate the greatly increased number of representatives taking part. M. Nelidoff, the Russian Ambassador, was elected president, and in his opening address spoke of the good results which had followed from the former Conference. Since 1899, he said, thirty-three arbitration conventions had been concluded between different States. Four grave and complicated questions, capable of creating friction between the Powers had been taken before The Hague Arbitration Court, and the Commission of Inquiry established by the Act of 1899 had had to consider, as everyone remembered, a case of infinite gravity, which might, without its happy intervention, have had the most dangerous consequences. The Conference has been engaged this week in arranging its procedure, and organising the main committees which are to deal with the several branches of the subjects to be considered.

THE Special Correspondent of the Tribune told on Thursday of an interview with the Baroness von Suttner, author of the famous novel "Lay Down Your Arms," who is at The Hague, to watch the proceedings of the Conference.

"While deploring the lack of a strong initial message, such as that which inaugurated the first Conference, and the existence of certain reactionary tendencies, she is hopeful of a substantial result, and is absolutely confident of the future. . . . The Baroness von Suttner differs from many of her Germanic compatriots in heartily supporting the British initiative for an arrest of armaments. 'Of course it should be discussed,' she said. 'It may be that if we were rebuilding the world by logic, we should, as many of my friends say, organise it first on a juridical basis, and disarm afterwards. But necessity knows no logic, and the masses of the people, who know the burden of armaments, know nothing of the juridical organisation of societies. What they see plainly is an abyss of ruin for all if this competition is allowed to continue.

"Of course, the subject must be discussed. Those who wish to smother it only show that they are afraid of it. Well, it cannot be smothered, and it cannot be long postponed. Happily, it is not only on these Conferences that we rest our hopes. They are but one feature of a movement of union that is proceeding throughout the world. The peoples go already far beyond their Governments. What we have to do is to build bridges to make it easy for the Governments to cross from the land of hate to the land of co-operation. Make sure of this: if the Governments will not, the people will presently take the matter into their own hands. Have you watched the progress of anti-militarism in France? That is one omen: If those in power lose their opportunity, the worse for them. But in a flood, or in a regulated stream, the régime of brotherhood must come."

THE Duma is again dissolved. The Tsar's proclamation is couched in a style which has become familiar, but two points emerge with sufficient clearness. The present government is resolved to oppose every attempt of Russia to secure freedom and prosperity. And the third Duma, the election of which is announced, is to be a packed assembly. Even the Court seems to feel the impossibility of carrying on without some sort of Parliament, and it remains to be seen whether it can succeed in obtaining a chamber sufficiently representative to impose upon Western Europe and at the same time subservient to the grossly corrupt interests which dominate the palace. The peasant deputies, we learn, are afraid to return home without a land law, lest the wrath of their constituents should be turned from the government upon themselves.

WE are glad to see in the June British Friend, in the record of the recent Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends, that Mr. E. W. Brooks reported of the Russian Famine Fund that over £18,000 had been remitted to Moscow and Samara for famine relief. He said that a brighter account had just been received from M. Shishkoff, and the work of the committee, he believed, was nearly done, for this season at least:

THE Primitive Methodist Centenary Fund is being well supported. In the course of about an hour on Monday, promises were handed in and read from the platform amounting to £4,783, from 260 donors. The financial success of the centenary movement is believed to be now assured.

For many years the Bible Christian Methodists have been noted for the courage and determination, the zeal and self-sacrifice which they have shown in what might seem the hopeless task of trying to Christianise the inhabitants of China. To do something towards this work they have willingly given as they are able, money and men. Their missionaries have known what it is to toil on from month to month and year after year, waiting, praying for the success that seemed slow to come. They have also known what is meant by the experience called the turn of the tide, when, after long delay, converts, semi-converts, inquirers, and people interested in various degree, and requiring various kinds of instruction and attention, have been so numerous that the workers have been at their wits' ends for helpers and for means.

THE Rev. S. Pollard, of Chao-tong-fu, concerning whom disquieting rumours have been published in the newspapers lately, has been for many years one of the ablest and one of the most successful of the Chinese missionaries. He has been working among the Miao tribe, has reduced the language of the tribe to writing, and has long been busy in a translation of the Gospels. What led to the recent attack upon him is not yet clear, but it was known from a previous letter that he was not without anticipations of trouble. These anticipations were well grounded, for he was attacked by a band of fifty or sixty men on April 8, and severely beaten. When at length he was able to get medical attention it appeared no bones had been broken, and he is stated to be in no danger. Perhaps the ancient Apostolical spirit is not anywhere better represented in modern times than in the working and suffering of some of the faithful men who have preached Christ in China. In a letter of Mr. Pollard, written many years ago, and published in the memoir of a friend of his, these words occur: "Sometimes I feel overwhelmed with the thought of all the misery and oppression that are still remaining. Then I pull myself up and say, Sam Pollard, not one of us must give in! Fighting and praying men are needed now if ever they were. And then I feel glad that I am here, even though I am alone."

This is the time for Summer schools, and one of the latest is that organised by the Hampshire Congregational Union for its village preachers and evangelists. Needless to say, the gathering which was at Boscombe did not pass off without discussion of the New Theology, and as is fitting, the scholars were refreshed for these high themes by frequent excursions.

The British section of the International Association for Labour Legislation is to be congratulated on the success of its efforts to produce an English edition of the Bulletin, which has been appearing for some years in French and German. No student of labour questions can afford to neglect the opportunity thus provided of becoming acquainted at first hand with the laws and legislative proposals of the chief industrial nations of the world. Among the objects of the association are the promotion of international agreements on questions relating to conditions of labour, and to organise international congresses on labour legislation. The association is thus one of the forces which at the present day are working towards the federation of the world and the consequent cessation of war and the abolition of armaments which are more burdensome than war itself. The Hon. Sec. is Miss A. Sanger, 4, Bloomsbury-square, London, W.C.

THE value of lay preaching, or, as we might say, of the non-professional ministry, comes to be more and more freely recognised, and as this is the case it is only natural to find it becoming increasingly organised. At the first annual conference of the lay preacher association in connection with the Congregational Union of Gloucestershire and Herefordshire, a membership of 70 is announced, and these are only some of those who are engaged in the work. One obvious advantage of the combination is to be found in the classes which have been initiated at the Western College, recently removed from Plymouth to Bristol. The new association has incorporated the Bristol Itinerant Society, founded in 1811. This, with its almost a century of work, is thought to be the oldest lay preachers' society in the kingdom.

THE portrait presented to the Unitarian Home Missionary College to mark the seventieth birthday of Col. Pilcher has been placed in the Art Gallery by the Art Gallery Committee previous to its being hung on the walls of the College. The Manchester Guardian and the Manchester Courier have given very appreciative notice and congratulated the artist, Mr. T. C. Dugdale, on the production of a good picture and an excellent likeness.

Miss Dorothy Tarrant, of Girton College, daughter of the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, of Wandsworth, has obtained a first class in the Cambridge Classical Tripos, and alone among the women students is in the first division. That highest honour she shares with five men. Last autumn, Miss Tarrant was alone in the first class of classical honours in the London B.A. examination. It is a pleasure to which we have grown accustomed to congratulate Miss Tarrant on her University honours, and this is the greatest of all.

THE Leeds City Council has appointed Mrs. J. Wreghitt Cannon a member of the Education Committee. Mrs. Cannon was a member of the Leeds School Board for nearly seven years, resigning her post in 1899, through ill-health. She is a daughter of the late Rev. Charles Howe, and the wife of Mr. Cannon, architect, of Leeds.

A LADY who has recently returned from a visit to New Zealand, where she spent three months at Wellington, writes very warmly of the splendid work Dr. Tudor Jones is doing out there. Her report fully confirms what we have heard from other sources of the eager response to Dr. Jones's ministry, of the growing congregation, of the evening attendance of some 400, and of the hall too small for the congregation. "To meet the need which is now being felt for a suitable place of worship," our correspondent writes, "the Doctor and his wife are instituting a fund for building a chapel, and are working for a bazaar to augment the fund. There is great scope in the Colony for ministers, as the people are to a large extent Unitarians, without being aware of the fact, and stay away from church because the doctrines taught there are not those which satisfy their wants and intelligence. Through the Doctor's able and eloquent sermons, those who have once heard him in nearly all cases return to hear more, and hence the large increase in the numbers who now attend."

"Unitarian Tracts in Japan, No. 1. Main Lines of Unitarianism, by ERROKE HERFORD, D.D." So far we can read on the cover of an interesting little pamphlet, on which the fascinating hieroglyphics which follow doubtless say the same thing in Japanese. And then within, twenty-four pages of this pamphlet are covered with similar signs, in orderly perpendicular lines, which we understand are a translation of Dr. Herford's well-known tract, by Mr. Toyosaki, who was formerly Japanese student at Manchester College, Oxford, and is now earnestly at work in his own country.

M. ROGET, formerly of St. Andrews, and now lecturer on the English language and literature in the University of Geneva, has issued an interesting pamphlet on "The Projected International Monument to the Heroes of the Protestant Reformation at Geneva." It is a plea for Anglo-Saxon support for the Calvin monument, which is to be erected in celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the great reformer's birth, July 10, 1509. The pamphlet is printed by W. Kündig & Son, Geneva.

"Friendly Words, sent out sometimes to and through friends, from and with friends." Edited by E. S. Lang Buckland. Price 1d. Derby: James Harwood, Derwent-buildings, Tenant-street. No. 1 of this little publication contains an address on "Fraternity," from which we quote the concluding sentences: "There are those poor in body, and there are those that are poor—and very poor—in heart and home and hope. If there is one question that every mind should faithfully meet, and as fervently strive to master, it is the problem of poverty. If there is one responsibility that every heart should feel and know and realise it is the common care and the meaning of Fraternity."

THE paper on "The Knowledge of God," read by the Rev. R. W. Boynton to the Ministers' Meeting in London on May 23, is now issued in pamphlet form by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

A FAULT which humbles a man is of more use to him than a good action which puffs him up with pride.—Baxter.

LITERARY NOTES & NEWS.

AN eager welcome awaits Professor William James' new book, "Pragmatism: A New Name for some Old Ways of Thinking." A publisher's note explains the scope and purpose of the book in the following terms: "The word Pragmatism is taken by Professor James to mean two things: first, a certain method of settling disputes, and, second, a theory of truth. This second part of Pragmatism has been called Humanism by Dr. Schiller. Professor James recommends it as a way by which empiricists, or lovers of facts, may find their way to a religion, while at the same time rationalists, or lovers of principles, may be brought nearer to facts. Pragmatism, he says, unstiffens our oppositions everywhere, and should help to reconcile thinkers." Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co. are the publishers, and it will be welcome news to the impecunious race of serious thinkers and readers that the price is only 4s. 6d. net.

ANOTHER pleasant announcement is that Messrs. Duckworth will publish a new book by the Rev. Stopford Brooke on June 25. It will be called "The Sea Charm of Venice," and will be uniform in style with "The Roadmender." Again the price has its attraction, 2s. 6d. net. We predict that this volume will go as a thing of joy and beauty to many a holiday haunt this summer.

THE number of earnest, well-informed books dealing with Christianity in its relation to modern social and industrial conditions has become a very interesting feature of American religious life. Quite recently the Macmillan Company, of New York, have published three books on this topic, "Christianity and the Social Crisis," by Professor Rauschenbusch, of the Rochester Theological Seminary; "The Church and the Changing Order," by Professor Shailer Mathews, of Chicago; and "Jesus Christ and the Civilization of To-day," a study of the ethical teaching of Jesus Christ considered in its bearings on the moral foundations of modern culture, by Professor J. A. Leighton, of Hobart College. Upon these there comes the publication of a new book by Mr. Ralph Waldo Trine, author of "In Tune with the Infinite." It is called "In the Fire of the Heart; or, The Great Modern People's Movement in Government," and it deals with social, economic, labour, and political conditions as they affect the everyday life and the prosperity and contentment of the common people of the nation.

It is not often that the Publishers' Circular is tempted to an expression of theological opinion, but the announcement that the new addition to the Salvation Army's "Red-Hot Library" is "Sighs from Hell; or, the Groans of a Damned Soul," by John Bunyan, has roused it from religious neutrality. It makes the following comment: "It seems to us to be a mistake to sow broadcast among the poor and miserable Bunyan's ravings as to God using 'His glorious power' to torment poor sinners everlastingly and 'out of measure.'" These words will find an echo in the hearts of all who believe in the sweet reasonableness of the Gospel and the humane influence of books. The very title of the series, "The Red-Hot Library," is a cruel offence both to Christian instinct and literary taste. It is one of the strangest aberrations of the religious mind that it should be so willing to invoke these elements of vulgar ferocity in order to kindle enthusiasm and teach men to love the Author and Giver of every good and perfect gift.

AMONG the good and perfect gifts we are always ready to include beautiful books, for they minister in so many ways to noble pleasure. It is possible, of course, to have a taste which is merely luxurious, and which values books simply for their splendour and expensiveness. But sensitiveness to the beauty of a book and to the care which has been lavished in providing a worthy setting for its message is a literary virtue of no mean order. Among the cheap reprints which threaten to crowd most volumes of dignity out of existence, every library should contain one or two books which claim a ritual of fastidious care in their use. They remind us that a book at its best is a perfectly beautiful creation.

It is this instinct which is satisfied so richly by the illuminated Psalters and Missals of the Middle Ages. Some of the most exquisite of them were written and adorned for wealthy patrons, but most were for use in the sacred offices of the Church before commercial prosperity had entered into competition with religion for the possession of the best. Unfortunately, these noble relics of the book-maker's art are bought up eagerly at the present time by men of colossal fortune. They have become part of the luxurious furnishing of the American millionaire. We should like to see them claimed for public use, not only by the great national collections, but also by local libraries and museums, where they could be exhibited to gladden the eyes of the common people. In the best things there is something too good for private ownership.

WE had the pleasure recently of inspecting the illustrated prospectus of a magnificent fac-simile reproduction of the Horulus Animæ, which is one of the glories of the Imperial Royal Court Library at Vienna. It is described as one of the most beautiful illuminated manuscripts in existence. It was written between the years 1517 and 1523, and was decorated with miniatures by Gerard Horebout, the illuminator who designed most of the miniatures in the Grimani Breviary. The Horulus Animæ is a devotional book which was much in use in the Netherlands and Germany, corresponding in many respects with the Book of Hours which was so popular in France. The text of the Vienna manuscript is German, based upon the original of Sebastian Brandt, and no printed copy of it is known to have survived. It has thus, apart from its beauty as a work of art, a distinct value for the student of liturgical books. The reproduction will be in a strictly limited edition, and of the price—£30—we need only say that it is beyond the dreams of avarice for most of the best lovers of books. But what an opportunity it presents for the generosity of wealthy donors who might secure a copy for the public use. For their special information we may add that the English publishers are Messrs. Ellis, of 29, New Bond-street, London.

MANY cheaper reproductions of illuminated manuscripts are available, fortunately, for the average man. The modern processes of photography and colour printing have brought many things within our reach for purposes of study and artistic pleasure. The Trustees of the British Museum have issued in recent years some beautiful coloured fac-similes, which are a source of constant delight, and also two portfolios of photographic plates. The authorities of the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris are also showing great activity in the same direction, and their catalogue will repay close attention. But better than the catalogue is an hour in the shop of Mr. Bernard Quaritch, where these things can be seen and inspected at leisure. Then there are numerous books on the subject, from the modest little volume, crammed with information, by Mr. J. W. Bradley, and a whole series of French works (for here, as in so many other directions where art and literature are concerned, France leads the way), to the standard books of reference which must be consulted at the British Museum, or the Bodleian, or the Rylands Library. It is a pleasant hobby and a very harmless one, alike for the theologian in search of recreation and for the plain Christian who values the humanities above the controversies of the Faith.

W. H. D.

A POET OF PROMISE.*

"REPOSE and other Verses," by J. Marjoram, is a first production, but withal a volume of poems—to call them verses would be inadequate—of which any writer of established reputation might reasonably be proud. It has its immaturities, found chiefly in words which convey imperfect images, and in structural obliquities of a minor sort; its excellencies are greater, and are of qualities of imaginativeness and phraseology, which may mark the rise of an independent and original singer. The richness of the surprises of these poems, their succinct descriptions, their lithe turns of fancy, and their fine pressures of sentiment, unmistakably commend them to the reader of contemporary poetry; and our repeated reading confirms the favourable estimate of them made, we have noticed, by more than one journal of literary reputation.

Such a verse as the following, taken from one of the least highly-coloured of these pieces, is of itself sufficient to win for the whole more than discursive attention.

"And the Spirit of Sleep is a little child,
A drowsy child that holds its hands,
Clasps the world, and is reconciled—
And dreaming, murmurs of fairy lands."

For pure vigour, giving us the feel of action, what could be better than "Swords"? Its poetical sympathy is palpable. The second verse runs:—
"Cry them one hoarse order—See th swords

Leap, quiver, settle and await

* "Repose and other Verses." By J. Marjoram. (Alston Rivers. 1s. net.)

Further order, that accords
 Leave to loose themselves and fall—
 Be so swift! Be handled, so!
 Bright and ready, full of hate—
 Who has drawn them, he should know,
 Who has held them, reads—and fears
 In their curving mien such sneers
 As the stoutest might appal:
 "Make appeal to swords, keen swords,
 To decide and cleave and clench, for ever, all!"

Or take a verse from the "Invocation of the River while Diving":—

"From honey-coloured visions of smooth sand bars,
 From under the southern bank where no
 sun rays pierce,
 From pools unruffled that nightly entrap
 lone stars,
 From dappled fringes of tiny peninsulas
 Ripples return to splash me—Searchingly fierce
 They sting me, draw me tense, as a bow-string strung,
 And, ere I slacken: what shall I not have sung?"

The sound-effects of these poems, in spite of—perhaps by reason of—their er-rancy from the mechanicalness of structural orthodoxy, are exceptional, and these alone should secure for Mr. Marjoram—to our knowledge an interesting pseudonym —recognition and a good reputation among readers of present-day verse.

AN URGENT PROBLEM.

SIR,—We must all thank Mr. Roberts for his acute remarks and queries. May I explain, first, that most of his trouble has arisen from his taking my exposition of Professor Foster's book for a confession of my own faith? I am afraid that quotation marks are a nuisance to the reader, but in this case I did not spare them, not because they are handy for an indolent reviewer, but because I did not want anyone to fall into Mr. Roberts' mistake.
 One quotation which he reproduces ("The form of his—Jesus"—faith in God, the God-idea, may be changed, but the content will hardly be surpassed") was part of the final summing-up which I had carefully guarded by the phrase "what seems to him (i.e., Professor Foster) the whole pith," &c. In this connection, too, Mr.
 Roberts points out that Professor Foster is inconsistent when, after agreeing with Harnack that we are not to depend upon "Jesus Christ's teaching alone," he still holds that "the religion of Jesus is religion at its purest and profoundest." I agree that there is some discrepancy here in the form of Professor Foster's statement, and I devoted a large part of my penultimate paragraph to a criticism of this side of Professor Foster's views, because, as I have said, "his own methodic principles should have prevented him from dismissing Paul and John," &c.
 Indeed, this is my chief objection to Professor Foster's results, which do not seem to me to take sufficient note of the Harnack point above mentioned. I can quite understand that Mr. Roberts does not accept the Harnack dictum, even while he challenges Professor Foster's unfaithfulness to it—but that is no reason for taking it out of the reviewer! And he must settle as best he can with Professor Foster about the words "form" and "content"; it seems to me a small verbal point, but in any case I have no responsibility for it.

These may perhaps suffice for samples in this kind. Coming now to what are properly my own views, I am sorry that Mr. Roberts' memory has caused him to associate me with the term "The Absolute Christ." I have not used that ill-sounding phrase, and it would not express what I want to say about Christ. But sometimes Theists speak as if belief in a God were a kind of absolute datum of the human consciousness, a permanent and universal principle of which the various religions of the world are in their respective degrees the more or less adequate embodiments.
 In that case Christianity is one of these relative or temporary embodiments, while Theism (if I may quote from myself), "of which it is a variant, is absolute and permanent; whereas, of course, one is no more absolute or permanent in the history of religion than the other." This "absolute" Theism was natural to the unhistorical age of Pope—"Father of all, in every age, In every clime, adored."
 But if the consensus gentium is worth anything, then we must include in our survey not only the atheistic religion of Buddhism, but also the whole evolution of man from earliest human time. Now, in that evolution, the idea of God came into being, as an idea in men's minds, at a certain stage; and in future ages, by the same showing, it is probable that our present idea of God will give place to something as different from this present idea as this present idea is different from early ideas of totem. Theism, then, is no more absolute than Christianity, in any proper or useful meaning of the word
 "absolute." If we are in for "relativism," let us have it downright and be in earnest with it. And when we see this, we are prepared to ask, with regard to any belief that we cherish, "In what sense is it true to the absolute and fundamental reality of human spirits, so that amid all change it will permanently minister to human need?" Thus, e.g., I feel that Mr. Campbell's ideas about the Incarnation "put Jesus into a relative scale just when and where we want to see him as absolute."
 Clearly, as I think, this cannot be done by taking Theism as your fixed and "absolute" point, while you leave the religion of Jesus subject to the vicissitudes of history and relativity. You must first realise that they are equally "relative" before you can declare either of them to contain anything "absolute." You are then at a point of view where you can proceed to inquire in what sense either, or both, can be held to contain elements of finality. And this means, for any man who holds the modern doctrine of development, In what sense can either or both serve the purposes of human evolution as such—i.e., the further progress of our race within the limits of humanity?

I believe that a careful answer to this question will bring us this result: that the Christian religion as we have known it in the past and see it still developing, proves itself coincident and conterminous with this complete human ideal, expanding at need with the enlarging aspirations of the human spirit, and assimilating in every age every aspect of the human ideal that could be worked up into practical human life. And if this claim should seem to rest upon notions of the miraculous, let us hasten to add, in correction of such a presumption, that there is nothing miraculous about it, for it is Christianity that has given birth to this complete and completely human ideal, and therefore it is simply a natural result that its whole line of development answers at every new juncture to its original principle. It is for this reason that it is possible to say that so long as ever men aim at being more and more human, they will be aiming at being more and more Christian.

One or two illustrations:—(1) When a modern European says that he is a Theist but not a Christian, he does not mean that he is a Theist of a sort that he might have been had he lived before Christ. He knows that his Theism has come to him because there has been such a thing as Christianity, which has made it possible that Greek and other kinds of Theism should be perpetuated in the world, but, still more, has impressed its own spirit upon the world's Theism. A modern Theist is really a Christian of a sort; there is no universal strain of belief in the race generally which you can isolate and denominate Theism. We believe in God because Christianity has given us that belief, and that belief has flourished and abides because it is a part of that spiritual aspiration which belongs to the complete human ideal which came into the world with Christ, and which all the Christian doctrines are attempts to embody. (2)
 There is no reason for thinking that new moral systems will go on being produced indefinitely. I know that some evolutionists have held that they will be, but the idea springs from a misconception of the nature of the case. It is true that we have to expect, in the course of ages, ever new developments, new forms of piety, &c. We may even conceive that whole new departments of human faculty will come into existence parallel to and additional to the already existing three—the intellectual, aesthetic, and moral. But these additional departments ($x^1, x^2, x^3 \dots$) will be different from the moral, as much as the moral is different from the intellectual, and the intellectual from the aesthetic. There will also, apart from this, be progress within each of the now existing departments. But intellectual progress will never become more than intellectual; moral progress will never produce anything higher than perfect goodness. Now, the case of Christianity is that it has given us the notion of perfect human goodness, as such—i.e., not the idea of civic goodness, or philosopher-goodness, or Deuteronomic goodness, but a goodness that aims at absolute goodness, that would carry up temperance and justice and manliness into the utter surrender of self in faith and hope and charity. Is it not obvious that any further progress in morals must be, not beyond, but within these attainments of the Christian spirit? Before Christianity there were civic and other morals which we now regard as so many branches, or embodiments, of the purely human ideal, the completely human morality. But the possessors of these various moralities did not and could not so regard them. And now that the ideal of Man has come full circle, we know that our further progress will be within that ideal. (3) I need not apply the same ideas at length to "religion" as a whole. But test Islam (Mr. Roberts' example) by these ideas, and it will be seen why its claim to be the culmination of progress is rejected. Does it embody, did it originate, our complete human ideal? Does it reconcile individuality with solidarity? Does it lose its soul, and so in the end gain all? Does it retain, and heighten, all the good of all the religions that had gone before it—e.g., Judaism? Does it make Man supreme in his own sphere? And does it crown Love as king in man's heart? Which religion does this? And will any religion ever do more?

FRIENDS' YEARLY MEETING.

SIR,—I note that in your issue of June 8 you say that "one of the most significant events of the Friends' Yearly Meeting" was the proposal of a new minute by myself. I can hardly allow such a statement to pass unchallenged, for, as a member of the Society of Friends, I should be sorry to think that so unimportant a matter as that which you refer to, was one of the most significant events of our annual gathering. As a matter of fact, one day of the Yearly Meeting was devoted to a consideration of the responsibility of the Society of Friends to social questions. In company with two others I was asked to introduce the matter, and quite as an aside in the consideration of much more important questions, I suggested that we might add a new query to the list of those which are periodically read out in our meetings. The query which I suggested is somewhat different from that which you attribute to me. It is as follows:—"Is the condition of the poor around you a matter of Christian solicitude on your part? Do you bear in mind that it must be contrary to the will of our Father in Heaven that any of His children should be placed in circumstances that must almost inevitably arrest the development of their higher nature? And are you taking your right place in social service?"

There was no opposition to the proposal to adopt this query, but a committee was appointed to arrange for deputations to visit our meetings up and down the country with a view to a fresh laying before them the responsibility of their members in connection with social service, and this committee was requested to consider my proposal for the adoption of the above query.

I should not have troubled you with this letter had I not seen from the paragraph published on June 8, that you had obviously been somewhat incorrectly informed of what actually took place at our meeting, and consequently your paragraph was likely to give rise to false impressions.

PORTRAITS OF MINISTERS.

SIR,—For some years I have been endeavouring to obtain portraits of past ministers of the Blackwater-street and Clover-street Unitarian Churches at Rochdale (now amalgamated), and I have succeeded in obtaining twenty-one, which are placed in the vestries. Portraits of those named below are what I still require, and I should be glad to hear if any are known to be in existence, or if there are any descendants through whom I might inquire. All I want is to obtain permission to have photographic copies taken for presentation to the church, and I shall feel very much obliged for any assistance in my work.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

APPEAL FOR ADDITIONAL SUBSCRIPTIONS.

SIR,—Four years ago an anonymous subscription of a thousand pounds a year was offered, provided an additional sum of two thousand pounds was raised. The challenge was nobly responded to, with the result that the British and Foreign Unitarian Association has been enabled largely to extend its work, and to make known the principles and truths of Unitarian Christianity among increasing numbers of people.

The report presented at the annual meeting, held at Essex Hall in May, bears witness to the extent, variety, and usefulness of the work undertaken by the Association at home and abroad.

During the last few years many generous subscribers have died, and it has not been easy to keep up the subscription list to the required level. This year (1907) it is necessary to make good losses to the extent of £900 to be in a position to claim the payment of the anonymous subscription of £1,000, and consequently to avoid curtailing or crippling the work of the Association.

Opportunities for Unitarian missionary work are opening out in all directions. We have entered upon a new era in religious thought and life. It is for Unitarians to do their part in making known the blessings which flow from a reasonable and reverent religious faith. In addition to the ordinary work of the Association in assisting congregations, sending out preachers, and publishing literature, four Vans are at present engaged in proclaiming our message in towns and villages where Unitarian ministers have never been heard before, and the people are hearing them gladly.

The Committee appeal with confidence to the Unitarians of Great Britain and Ireland to come to their aid. It will be seen from the list of new and increased subscriptions that several generous friends have already come forward.* To the hundreds of Unitarians who are probably unacquainted with the work of the Association this appeal is also made.

May I, as the newly appointed treasurer of the Association, invite your careful consideration of this urgent appeal? I trust it may be possible to obtain during the next few weeks the amount required

THE NEW COMPENSATION ACT.

SIR,—Several secretaries of congregations have been making inquiries of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association respecting the liability involved in the Compensation Act which comes into operation on July 1. May I have the courtesy of your columns for the following particulars so far as the Act is likely to affect congregations?

The term "employer" includes any person or body of persons corporate or not, and "workman" includes any person who works under a contract of service, whether by way of manual labour, clerical work, or otherwise, and whether the contract be written or verbal.

Persons whose salaries exceed £250 a year are outside the operation of the Act. Persons who are employed quite casually are also excepted. For example, a man engaged to assist the chapel-keeper to prepare for one special meeting of the congregation would probably be excepted, but if the same person came regularly to render assistance in cleaning and preparation for meetings or services, he would be included.

The employer is liable to pay compensation in case of injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the workman's employment—if he is injured, then during his incapacity (which may be for the rest of his life) a sum equal to one-half his earnings, but not exceeding £1 per week; if the accident should prove fatal, £150, or a sum equal to the earnings of the three preceding years—whichever is the larger—but not exceeding £300.

It would seem that ministers whose salaries are under £250, and all paid workers, such as chapel-keepers, sextons, gravediggers, organists, organ-blowers, * £300 has already been subscribed, leaving £600 to be raised.

bell-ringers, and paid members of the choir, come under the Act; but that voluntary workers, such as Sunday-school teachers, unpaid members of the choir, organisers and teachers of week-evening clubs and classes, district visitors, and such-like, are not included. Congregations should, therefore, take the precaution to effect an insurance covering paid workers of every description. Most good insurance offices will issue a policy covering all liabilities under the Act on payment of 3s. a year for every £100 expended in salaries and wages.

I may add that this letter has been submitted to the solicitor of the Association, Mr. Howard Young, and he approved of its contents.

Secretary.

BOSTON CONFERENCE FUND.

SIR,—Your readers will be interested to learn that the fund, started on the initiative of Dr. Herbert C. Smith, from which grants have been made to Unitarian ministers towards their expenses, has enabled the committee charged with its distribution to render assistance to forty-nine ministers. There were several applicants to whom the committee were not in a position to render aid, but it is gratifying that by means of the fund such a large number of ministers will be able to participate in the important meetings at Boston in September. The whole of the available funds have now been allocated.

MICHIGAN UNITARIAN CONFERENCE.

SIR,—The Michigan State Unitarian Conference will be held here in Ann Arbor in the course of the first or second week of October next. We should be glad to have delegates or visitors to the International Congress in Boston present at our meetings and on our programmes.

Ann Arbor is about twenty hours from Boston, eight hours from Niagara Falls, and six hours east of Chicago on the direct line between Niagara and Chicago. It is one of the most interesting university towns in America, being the seat of the University of Michigan, which is the oldest of our western state universities, with an attendance this year of over 4,000 students.

I should be glad to have any delegates or visitors to the Boston meetings who expect to remain in this country a fortnight or more after the meetings, and who might be able to come to Ann Arbor, write to me to notify me of their plans. When we know who among the visitors from abroad may be available for our meetings, the officers of the conference will doubtless invite two or three to speak.

My address for the summer months will be Dimock, P.O., Susquehanna Co., Pennsylvania.

BLACKFRIARS COUNTRY HOME.

SIR,—The Country Home at Mitcham, in connection with the Blackfriars Mission, was opened at Whitsuntide as usual, and several families have already enjoyed a holiday there, while many more are waiting their turn. The length of stay is generally a fortnight, and for the mother especially the rest and fresh air are invaluable. Unfortunately our funds are low, as we were unable to sublet the house for the winter, and we trust to a generous response to this appeal, in order to keep it open all through the summer:

Hon. Treasurer.

SPECIAL SUNDAY EVENING SERVICES.

SIR,—In reply to inquiries, will you allow me to say that I have the offer of the very large and prominent theatre, called "The Euston," opposite St. Pancras Station, for Sunday evenings, and that I shall probably accept it.

The one great want will be about a hundred volunteers, each of whom will undertake to deliver, in a given street or streets, about 150 copies of a pretty book of hymns, on the cover of which will be printed an invitation. There will be nothing else to do, and lads and girls can do it, but I hope that even some "important people" will lend a hand. I propose to join the little army myself, and all names and addresses of volunteers should be sent to me.

The meetings will not begin until the end of October, but volunteers' names and addresses will be welcomed any time. The delivery of the invitations will begin about October 14.

HARROGATE SERVICES.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to call attention to the arrangement for summer services at Harrogate? They will be held at the Scotch Tea Rooms, Royal Arcade, Parliament-street, on Sunday evenings during July and August, at 6.30 p.m. Announcements of preachers and subjects will be made weekly in the INQUIRER "Church Calendar." I shall be glad to receive the names and addresses of intending visitors and Unitarian residents. Offers of help in the choir will be gratefully accepted.

THE VAN MISSION.

THE Mission is attempting an affirmation of religious truth which avoids sectarian bitterness and puts controversy for its own sake in the very last place. And that there is a response to such a spirit and method the present series of meetings very plainly shows. The reports from the Midlands and from the London Van are particularly encouraging. In Scotland the meetings have so far been held in very small places, and the average attendance falls short of a hundred adults,

The Lancashire and Yorkshire meetings are so far suffering unduly from the unsettled weather, and while many good attendances are reported several disappointing results have been met with from this cause. The following figures, however, are interesting:—No. 1 Van reports 12 meetings, with an aggregate attendance of 1,550 adults; No. 2 (Scotch) eleven meetings; attendance, 900; No. 3 (London and Southern Counties), 15 meetings; attendance, 2,500. No. 4 (Midlands), 11 meetings; attendance, 2,830. The average for the 49 meetings is 159, against 176 for the whole of last season, and as this result exceeds the estimate very considerably, there is every likelihood that the meetings throughout will be as good as those of the first year.

No. 1 Van (Lay Missioner, Mr. A. Barnes). Rev. A. H. Dolphin reports good meetings at Delph, "in spite of the weather," and we have the welcome announcement that a number of the young men at Mossley have promised to assist their minister, Rev. J. E. Stead, in arranging for a monthly service to be held in the town. "Should have been glad if we could have remained at Upper Mill a little longer," says the report, "as, in spite of a cool reception, they were gradually warming up to us. There was a good deal of discussion at both places, and I have come away feeling that a good impression has been made." Rev. J. A. Pearson and Rev. J. E. Stead, with members from Oldham and Mossley, helped at the meetings. Rev. W. W. Robinson, of Gainsborough, has been the missioner at Slai-thwaite, where only small meetings have been held, and at Huddersfield, where the Mission opened favourably on Monday night. The Van is now at Mirfield, with Rev. J. Ruddle, of Sheffield, in charge, and moves to Dewsbury to-morrow; and to Ossett and Normanton on the 27th and July 3 respectively, with Rev. E. C. Jones, of Bradford, as missioner.

No. 2 Van (Lay Missioner, Mr. T. Lenny) was at Sanquhar last week, but only the briefest reports are to hand. Rev. W. E. Attack, of Manchester, who cut short a holiday in order to help, was, however, fully impressed with the value of the work, and considered the meetings extremely satisfactory. An English missioner is at some disadvantage in these out of the way places. A Scotchman would be more at home with the ways and the speech of the folk. An old farmer volunteered the information to Mr. Attack that the week's mission was wanted, had done good, and might be repeated with good effects. This week Rev. A. Thornhill, of Carlisle, is at New Cumnock, but no news has come through. Rev. J. M. Whiteman, of Burnley, joins on Monday at Auchinleck, moving on 26th to Mauchline. At the beginning of July, Rev. J. Forrest will be at Ayr, and will travel with the van during the whole of that month.

No. 5 Van (Lay Missioner, Mr. B. Talbot), after the splendid meetings at Ramsey, moved on to Huntingdon only to find that the place was irresponsive. The missioners received a friendly call from one of the clergy and took a meal at his house, finding that he was well acquainted and in sympathy with Unitarian thought. The second night he paid a further visit, being accompanied by a churchwarden. It transpired that one of the questioners at the meetings was a grandson of Robert Raikes, of Sunday-school fame, and he expressed himself in high terms of appreciation of the work of the missionaries. On Rev. G. Lansdown's departure, Rev. A. Hurn, of Acton, became missionary, beginning his work at St. Ives, where the Van stood beside the Cromwell statue. The visit coincided with the annual sports; the town was enjoying a holiday, and thousands of people were in the place, many of whom listened to this new and strange teaching. St. Neots, the next town, displayed great and increasing interest in the Mission, and on the last evening 700 persons were present. The proceedings, however, did not pass without some opposition, and at the close a score or so of the more indignant sang "Nothing but the blood of Jesus." In the second part of this week Rev. C. Roper, of Kilburn, is at Biggleswade, and moves to Baldock on Monday. Stevenage and Hitchin are next on the programme, unless an arrangement can be made in response to various suggestions to visit the Garden City.

No. 4 Van (Lay Missioner, Mr. C. Barker) was due at Syston, near Leicester, and after the inspiring meetings at Melton Mowbray, Rev. W. C. Hall and his companion were keenly conscious of the change. The people are chiefly employed in agriculture, and in the evening the streets were practically deserted. Two of the meetings were attended only by children; the adults present on one occasion, we understand, numbering only two! When Mr. Hall said good-bye his place was taken by Rev. J. Morley Mills, of Bootle, at Loughborough. Here Rev. W. Burgess and his people entered heartily into the arrangements, and splendid meetings have been held. A contingent of the Church Army, under a captain, attempted a counter meeting but with no result, the missionaries retaining the sympathy of the audience, and closing the meeting with a display of good feeling. The new church at Coalville was anticipating a visit this week, where Rev. W. Burgess and Rev. T. J. Jenkins, of Hinkley, were to assist Mr. Mills. Mr. Lee and Mr. Bryan, of Nottingham, have also assisted in the speaking. Ashby-de-la-Zouch, which was in the itinerary for the week-end, has been abandoned on local advice in favour of Moira and Donisthorpe, where Rev. J. E. Stead, of Mossley, is missionary as well as at Swadlincote, where the Van is due on Monday until Friday, when it moves to Burton.

Mr. Spedding finds it impossible at the moment to deal with the whole of the heavy correspondence, and will be obliged if friends writing re later arrangements will accept his apologies for delay. Matters affecting the immediate movements of the Vans must obviously have precedence.

It makes all the difference in the world whether we put truth in the first place or in the second.—Whately.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

LEGENDS OF THE SAINTS.

V.—ST. URSULA.

SAINT URSULA is a saint about whom there have been so many different stories that it is hard to know what is most likely to be true. Little is known about her early life, but it is thought that her father was possibly a king of Cornwall, and that he and her mother were both Christians, and led a happy, peaceful life, beloved by their subjects, and rejoicing in the beauty and sweetness of their daughter. All went well until Ursula was old enough to be married, and had grown so beautiful that numbers of British princes wanted to wed her. She would have none of them, however, and her father and mother were pleased to have her still at home with them. But at last Conan, son of the powerful king of the Picts and Scots, made a vow that she should be his wife.

His father sent ambassadors to Cornwall, demanding her hand for his son, and Ursula's father was much afraid of offending the king if he refused, and so bringing a troublesome war upon his peaceful little kingdom. The ambassadors were asked to wait, and Ursula went into her room and opened her heart in prayer to God. She was greatly perplexed, but at last went to bed trusting that God would show her a way out of her difficulties.

In her sleep a vision came to her. Her little room was suddenly filled with a wonderful light, and a beautiful angel appeared, who told her what she should say. She did not tell her parents of her vision, but the next day she came before the ambassadors looking very queenly and beautiful, and followed by a hundred other fair maidens dressed all in white. Then, to her parents' astonishment, she spoke clearly and decidedly. She said she would marry Conan, but only on these conditions: first, that he should become a Christian; second, that she should be allowed three years in which to make a pilgrimage to Rome and the Holy Land; and, lastly, that he should gather together eleven thousand maidens who should accompany her.

The ambassadors went home and spoke so loudly in praise of Ursula, that Conan and his father agreed to the conditions she had laid down. Maidens were gathered together from far and wide, the legend says, and sent to Cornwall, and there Ursula's father had eleven great ships built to carry them over the sea. While the ships were building, the maidens learnt how to manage them and became clever sailors, and St. Ursula would talk to them of her faith and tell them of the holy places they were going to see. At last the day came when all was ready, and they sailed away down the river to the sea, the white sails dancing in the sun, and the eleven thousand virgins chanting songs of praise.

It would take too long to tell you of all their travels and adventures. They did at last reach Rome, and spent some time visiting the churches, and shrines, and other sacred places, and they seemed to have given up all idea of going further. Traveling even so far as Rome had taken them so long, that half of the three years allowed to St. Ursula had gone, and she felt they must turn homewards again. When they reached Mainz, a great surprise awaited them. Prince Conan had grown weary of waiting for his beloved, and had come to seek her, and from this time he shared all her dangers and trials, even at the last sharing her death. They travelled on as far as Cologne, where they had stayed on their outward journey, but while they had been going further, a barbaric people, the Huns, had besieged the city, and were encamped round it. They were amazed to see the ships with their curious crews come sailing down the Rhine, and when they heard that all these virgins were Christians who had been on a pilgrimage, their anger was roused, and they rushed out to kill them. They told them first to deny their faith, but neither St. Ursula, her faithful Conan, nor the virgins would do this, and so, the legend says, they all bravely and steadfastly met their death.

In later years, the people of Cologne raised a church to their memory, in which there are many relics of these legendary maidens; and of St. Ursula herself there are almost endless relics and pictures both in this church and in the cathedral, so that Cologne might almost be called the city of St. Ursula.

Her story has always been a favourite one with painters, especially her vision. A famous painter, called Carpaccio, painted eight pictures for the convent of St. Ursula in Venice, in which he told her whole history from the arrival of the ambassadors to the martyrdom at Cologne, and of all this wonderful series the most beautiful is the one that tells us of her vision. The great artist Memling is thought to have painted a wonderful set of miniatures which are in the Church of St. Ursula at Cologne. He also seems to have loved the story of her vision best, and to have put his best work into that.

It is Memling who painted the celebrated shrine of St. Ursula in the hospital of St. John at Bruges. He was wounded while serving in the Duke of Burgundy's army in the year 1476. He came back to Bruges, and was taken to the good monks of St. John's Hospital, who nursed him and cared for him, and helped him to get strong and well again. Then, in gratitude to them, he painted this wonderful shrine. It contains relics of St. Ursula, and the pictures are so pure in colour, and so marvellously finished, that people who care about paintings will travel long distances to see them.

There is one picture by the French artist Claude, which you can see in the National Gallery. It is called the Embarkation of St. Ursula, and is rather a curious dark picture. St. Ursula's boxes—very much like trunks that anyone might use nowadays—are being carried down to the ships.

In pictures by other painters St. Ursula is painted with many different emblems. Sometimes she has attendant virgins with her, and always the crown and palm of martyrdom. Sometimes she has a white banner with a red cross, to show she went on a pilgrimage, sometimes an arrow—with which she was killed—and a dove. The latter, according to legends, is said to have hovered over the place where she and the eleven thousand virgins were buried. She has always been considered as the special patron of all young girls.

CRUEL, SHAMELESS FASHION.

MINISTERS of every denomination are asked to-morrow (Sunday) to bring before their congregations the subject of Kindness to Animals, and the Society for the Protection of Birds has issued a special appeal, asking that a few plain words may be said respecting the wearing of "ospreys," paradise-plumes, and other feathers of wild birds.

It seems that the milliners have decreed that the ruthless habit of wearing "ospreys," so far from being discouraged, shall receive a fresh impulse; and, though this is only one form of the cruelty in fashion, sport, and greed of various kinds, it is one in regard to which one would think that the protest of compassion and humanity would appeal with special force to all honourable women. Yet we are reminded that as long ago as 1893 the Times said in a leading article:—"If in every pulpit of the land the shocking story of the egrets were told, surely for once humanity would prove stronger than fashion. Let it be clearly understood, once for all, that the feathered woman is a cruel woman; that, for the sake of a fashion which pleases no rational being, and should disgust all who can think and feel and understand, she brings dishonour upon her sex."

Any of our readers who do not realise the full extent of this cruelty, we would refer to an article, entitled "The Barbarians," which appeared in the Nation of June 1. "Osprey plumes," it should be understood, have nothing to do with the bird of that name, the fishing eagle. What they are, and what is involved in their use, the following passage from the article in the Nation will show:—

"The plumes so falsely called after it (the osprey) are torn from the back of the little white heron, one of the most beautiful and useful birds in all the tropics. It is only in the breeding season that those feathers are grown, and they fall in graceful curves over the tail and wings of the full-grown birds, just when they are nesting and rearing their young. Then it is that the hirelings of fashion go about among the reeds for slaughter. For every plume a parent bird has been deprived of its mate; almost for every plume a brood of young has been left to die slowly of starvation and to rot upon the nest.

"For many years past the brutality of the fashion has been perfectly well known. There is no dispute about the facts, or the only dispute is a shameless lie of the milliners, who will blandly inform a customer that the plume is 'artificial,' if she shows some glimmering of compunction about wearing it. Probably this is the only case in which a salesman ever tries to palm off a genuine thing as a sham. That the attempt is made seems to prove some lingering aversion to cruelty even among women who follow fashion. But they are easily won over. Blinded by ignorance and desire combined, they do not pause to convince themselves that feathers like those could not be artificial, and that the only artifice about them is that two parts of feathers may be stuck back to back to give 'a fulness.' Certainly, no natural feather ever grew like that; but every feather in the plume was, nevertheless, plucked from the back of the small white heron—the egret, as its proper name is—killed during the breeding season.

* * * * *

"It is nearly ten years since the British Consul in Venezuela estimated the total of egrets killed for plumes in one breeding season at over a million and a half in that State alone. Millions have also come from Florida, where the species is being gradually exterminated. In India, Africa, and other tropical places where it occurs, it is slaughtered in the same way. As the chief destroyer of insects and ticks, the bird is the friend of men and cattle. On the African West Coast it is called the buffalo's mate. But let peasants and herdsmen perish in ruin, women must have their 'osprey' plumes. In order that, as BROWNING said, women may go about 'clothed with murder,' whole provinces are devastated, and man's benefactors die by millions, even before they are fledged with the feathers that doom their race."

In the matter of "imitation" feathers we may refer also to a leaflet "The Biography of a Lie," issued by the Society for the Protection of Birds" (3, Hanover Square, W.). It is reprinted from Bird Notes and News of July, 1903, and explains in the most definite manner how various specimens of "imitation ospreys" purchased in the West End and elsewhere examined by the highest scientific authority proved to be real feathers; and the leaflet adds:—"There are sixty species of heron, and all produce these dorsal plumes at the nesting season, and every species at which hunters can get is pursued and persecuted for the sake of this distinctive nuptial ornament. For reasons of their own, the trade—i.e., the feather dealers—have elected to describe as 'real' only the best part of the plumage of the great white heron and the little egret; the coarse under-plumage of these species and the plumage of all other herons they label 'artificial' or 'imitation,' though it comes from birds just as the other does, and is obtained in the same cruel manner. 'An osprey,' said Professor RAY LANKESTER, when interviewed on the subject (Daily News, October 16th, 1903), 'has never been imitated, and whatever the shop-keeper may say it is always the parent bird slain at the breeding season which supplies women's hats and bonnets. These questions have been so often placed before me that I am quite tired of assuring the public of the facts of the matter.'"

If the simple statement of facts in this matter is not sufficient to induce a woman at once and for ever to discard the use of such feathers, and to take every opportunity of dissuading others from the purchase or wearing of them, we fear that no argument will be of any avail, and we must be content simply to lay the matter in this way before our readers. The story has been told again and again, and yet "in the street and the park, in Belgravia and in Whitechapel, in the theatre and in the church, are to be seen these plumes of murdered parent-birds dishonouring womankind." For the sake of a cruel fashion and pitiless pride the wholesale slaughter goes on, and some of the most beautiful and harmless races of wild creatures are being remorselessly destroyed from the face of the earth.

WE have quoted from the article on "The Barbarians" in the Nation of June 1. A fortnight later the following letter from "Bird Lover" appeared in the same journal:—

"With reference to your crusade against the practice of wearing egret plumes, you may like to be reminded of the fact that, following the example of the late Queen Victoria, the present Queen has shown her full sympathy with the movement against this ruthless fashion. In March, 1906, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds received the following letter from Miss Knollys:—

"The Queen desires me to say in answer to your letter that she gives you as President full permission to use her name in any way you think best to conduce to the protection of birds. You know well how kind and humane the Queen is to all living creatures, and I am desired to add that Her Majesty never wears osprey feathers herself, and will certainly do all in her power to discourage the cruelty practised on these beautiful birds."

It was clearly in ignorance of this fact, as well as of the cruel character inseparable from the custom of wearing these plumes, that a member of the Royal Family wore an egret feather in her toque at the Derby."

THE WORLD'S PEACE.*

BY THE REV. RICHARD W BOYNTON.

"And they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."—Micah iv. 3.

THESE words of ancient prophecy have helped to buoy up the hope of the world's peace by pointing to the ideal future in which that hope is to be realised, through twenty-six centuries and more of almost constant warfare, of which the end is not yet. They go to the bottom of the subject by making it clear that an industrial civilisation and a state of war are in irreconcilable opposition to each other. The figure of Micah, apparently looking out upon the approaching pacification of the world, is reversed by the later prophet Joel, the prophet of a narrow and aggressive Jewish nationalism. "Proclaim ye this among the nations," he cries. "Prepare war; stir up the mighty men; let all the men of war draw near, let them come up. Beat your plowshares into swords and your pruninghooks into spears; let the weak say, I am strong."

The contrast brings out what has always been true in the long experience of the world. The arts of peace languish and die when recourse is had to the violent arts of war. There are never enough of the materials of life to spare for both. In periods of warfare the strength of men is turned to destructive ends, and it is only when peace has been restored that the normal and constructive activities of life can be resumed.

In the days when early man was emerging from the animal state, the incessant fighting between families and clans may have done something to develop in him that strength and skill which in the course of time made him the most formidable as well as the most ferocious of animal species. But as soon as an industrial state became possible and the race began to create products to satisfy its needs beyond the spoil of hunting and fishing, then in peaceful ways opportunity arose for self-development without destructiveness. Now in a state of advanced civilisation, we can only look on war, which to early man was one of his normal pursuits, as a state of dangerous disease. It means the temporary breaking down of all those ties of intercourse which make possible the common life of a people or of the nations of the world. In our own mighty nation the circulation of these healthful influences of commerce and civilised life, on which we depend for our very existence, is as regular and unbroken as the continuous, unnoticed flow of blood in a healthy body. We can scarcely imagine the acute distress of having these currents of life between our various communities rudely interrupted, as between the cities of feudal Germany or of mediæval Italy, by constantly recurring warfare. For a whole generation our country has been freed internally from any serious dread of war. But with the gradual passing of the generation that knew and had cause to feel that dread, we tend to lose the sharpness of the lesson that it taught, and to grow indifferent. The long absence of the disease makes even its possibility seem unreal. So it is well that there should be occasional reminders of the true nature of war, and of the need that we jealously guard the nobler ways that make for peace. For here, as elsewhere, "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

One great reason for this is that there is still enough of primitive man in us all so that, at least from a safe distance, "the pomp and circumstance of glorious war" has for most men an endless fascination. It is the supreme instance of self-assertiveness on the part of the people, and as such it puts our ordinary activities and even our sharpest commercial rivalries in the shade. War, more than any other spectacle, feeds the innate love for dramatic events. Still, it appears not enough for us that we should know ourselves to be the most powerful and most prosperous nation on the globe. The passion now and again seems to seize us to test that power by crushing some supposedly rival nation.

Hence the danger—because of the peril of feeding this appetite—lurking in the gradual change of programme of the coming Exposition at Jamestown, held to commemorate the founding of the Colony of Virginia, so as to include a large and threatening emphasis upon warlike preparation and parade. "A great living picture of war with all its enticing splendours," is the way in which the official organ of the Exposition has announced the new military and naval features, against the earnest protest of Carroll D. Wright, Edward Everett Hale, Cardinal Gibbons, John Mitchell, Miss Jane Addams, and many others on the Exposition's Advisory Board, as well as leading churchmen and public-spirited citizens everywhere. Such an exhibition as is proposed, and it is to be feared in spite of objections will be held, is surely a backward step for this nation. It has been our glory that we did not need, by reason of our splendid isolation on the American continent, to compete in preparedness for war with the heavily burdened nations of Europe. That we have not carried these impedimenta through the hundred years of our youthful development has been the open secret of our swift advance in all the arts of civilisation to a leading place among the peoples of the world. But now the greatest danger that confronts us is that the false ambition may seize upon our people to become the greatest in readiness for war. Trusted and powerful leaders are urging upon the nation the narrow advice of Joel. They are bidding us spend millions of dollars annually for building battleships and forts and equipping military forces by land and sea, millions that are urgently needed for the cause of education and better government and all the higher arts of peace.

It appears to be, indeed, a national conviction that in the time of peace we must prepare for war. But can we fail to see, what Gladstone so clearly pointed out, that to prepare for war is to expect it, and to expect it is to go a long distance toward bringing it on? "With emphasis," says his biographer, Mr. Morley, "he insists that we have no adequate idea of the predisposing power which an immense series of measures of preparation for war on our own part, have in actually begetting war. They familiarise ideas which, when familiar, lose their horror, and they light an inward flame of excitement of which, when it is habitually fed, we lose the consciousness" (Life, ii. 44). I have recently seen a letter from Germany, that great empire prepared for war by being constantly armed to the teeth, in which the dread of the whole people is expressed that war may be very near. So rampant is this fear throughout the empire that even the women are being taught to prepare bandages and minister to the wounded. Plainly this is a mania that feeds on its own illusions.

Gladstone's statement, drawn from long experience and study of European affairs, brings out the danger of what it is proposed to do at Jamestown. There are no "enticing splendours" to real war, either on land or sea. General Sherman expressed the simple, unvarnished truth out of a terrific experience when he said that "War is hell." It is wholesale and organised murder. It is the deliberate letting loose on a grand scale of all the savage, debasing, destructive passions of our natures. No man can question that it offers a place for heroism and nobility of devotion and sacrifice. But these are not the "splendours" which the programme at Jamestown is to bring out. Those, rather, are the splendours of war, not for the participants, for whom it is always squalid, devastating, and terrible, but for those who look on from a safe distance as at a spectacle. The array of uniforms, the pomp of gold cord and insignia of rank, the symmetry of drill, the sheen of perfectly polished guns, the sense of sleeping power in mighty warships—these are the baits with which it is proposed to lure the populace on to the deceptive conclusion that war, if it comes, is after all, a foreordained and glorious and splendid thing.

I lay such stress on all this because, in common with other observers of the times, I feel that we as a nation are in a peculiar way open to the insidious temptation to copy the older peoples of the earth in seeking for unhallowed glory in war. This seems evident to anyone who will look below the surface, notwithstanding the apparent general preference for peace. It is noticeable that we have more than one layer of population; and when one speaks another may be silent. One may be uttering the hope of Micah for universal peace, while the other is secretly cherishing the opposite hope of Joel, that the country may be speedily plunged into war. The early colonists, with their recent escape from war-burdened Europe, were in no danger of being dazzled by the false glamour of battle. They did what fighting had to be done against the Indians and other threateners of their peace. But they sought with greater eagerness to build up intercourse and commerce and other helps to the nation's life. Never was a war fought with greater reluctance than the American Revolution, and never were arms so gladly laid down at the end.

But to-day we have a huge mixed population, a large part of which has never yet become assimilated to American ideals. Our records of crime, and especially the appalling list of murders which makes human life more unsafe in the United States than in any country of the world except Southern Italy or Sicily, go far to show what heaps of inflammable material are lying around loose in our body politic. No lesson of history is more certain than that it is the swaying of a passionate extreme of this irresponsible mob in every large community that draws an otherwise sober and rational people into conflict. It was a dangerous portent that this element was the one ten years ago in our great cities that caught fire from the demand for summary vengeance made in the frenzied appeals of the yellow press and forced Congress and the President to a war that right reason might have avoided, as well as far sooner disposed of the ills which war was invoked to cure.

I do not mean to give the impression that it is the foreign or labour or socialistic masses among us that are chiefly eager for war. On the contrary, many of these recent comers are sobered by the sad experience of the older nations from which they have come, into an earnest desire for peace. And the record of the labouring and socialist classes in standing for peace and against the creation of war sentiment is notably high. It was the Central Labour Assembly of Boston, for example, that publicly protested against the desecration of Labour Day by a great naval review in New York Harbour last year. In the purely American population—using that word as standing for the older stratum of our people—the spirit of internationalism is often weakest, and patriotism is apt to be narrowly national and easily affronted. But perhaps the most dangerous influence current in the national mind is a sense of superiority to the other nations and races of the world. This is the premonitory blindness that, when unchecked, leads on to terrible blunders, if not to self-destruction.

* * * *

President Eliot, of Harvard, has lately, in a notable speech in Ottawa, called the attention both of the Canadians and ourselves to the happy results following upon a self-denying ordinance entered upon by England and the United States at the close of the war of 1812 regarding war vessels on the Great Lakes. By mutual agreement the fleet of each country was reduced to the smallest proportions, purely for police purposes—three or four vessels of one gun each upon either side—and these have proved ample for almost a hundred years to discharge the duty required of them.

The oceans of the world are only greater bodies of water dividing from each other nations that have common interests. Mankind is one, as every extension of commerce and communication clearly proves—with similar needs around the world. The surest way to take off all false glamour from army and navy life is to regard the soldiers and sailors as simply an international police force. Their business is not to shoot and kill each other for the supposed glory of their respective peoples—for we now see that such shooting and killing prove nothing, except that one nation is stronger or more skilful at wholesale murder than another. All the glory supposed to be won for France by the wars of Napoleon proved to be no gain, but a weakness and a shame. The army and navy are to be regarded as an international police. The duty they have to do is hard, urgent, and necessary, and high qualities of intelligence, skill, and soldierly devotion require to be put into it. But of showy uniforms, gilt trappings, and "enticing splendours" there should be nothing—nothing—

"Lest we forget, lest we forget!"

Great heroism and noble sacrifice will still be there, as in the walks of peace; but it will be essentially the heroism and sacrifice of firemen and police, displayed without dramatic setting in the plain, daily discharge of prosaic duty. The coming Hague Tribunal, like that of eight years ago, will stand for this international ideal of the world's peace. May our land give to it the support of an overwhelming higher public sentiment!

THE APPEAL OF THE CHURCHES FOR PEACE.

THE memorial from the churches to the Hague Conference, to which we referred in a recent note, was adopted by the Executive Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at a meeting held at Essex Hall on June 12. It has been signed by the President of the Association, Mr. W. B. Bowring, and forwarded to be presented at the Hague with similar memorials from nearly every religious denomination, not only in England, but on the Continent. The following is the text of the Memorial:—

"Representing, as we do, almost every variety of religious denomination, and every political party, we beg to express our united desire for persistent efforts on the part of our several governments to secure international peace, and to establish such a spirit of cordial and friendly relationship, as may render unnecessary the ever increasing growth of huge armaments which now absorb so much of the manhood and resources of the nations. We severally urge the representatives of our own country at the Hague Conference to press upon all the assembled delegates the favourable consideration of this general desire for peace and the spirit of goodwill, a desire which we believe is growing and deepening among the people of every civilised country.

"We approach the conference with this earnest appeal, because we believe that the depth and prevalence of the movement against war, with all its accompanying calamities and miseries, is very imperfectly realised or understood by many of those who live and act in the more immediate circles of sovereigns, statesmen and diplomats. This intense popular feeling claims more recognition than it has hitherto received because it is the mass of the people who in every country have to bear the burden and to endure the sufferings involved in war.

"We do not presume to suggest the exact means by which the spirit of international peace can be most surely strengthened and made effective, but we hope that the deliberations of the conference may lead to an arrest in the competition of ever-increasing armaments, to a lessening of the waste involved in this competition, and to the consequent relief from the heavy burdens thus laid upon the shoulders of the people.

"We trust that steps will be taken to extend, in every way possible, the acceptance of the principle of Arbitration by the nations, so that the reason and conscience of calm and experienced men may be brought to bear upon the settlement of international disputes instead of having recourse to the horrors of war.

"We desire to express our gratitude to those who established the Peace Conference and the Arbitration Court of the Hague, and to all who are labouring to give the Conference practical and growing influence in the relationships of civilised nations."

A VISIT TO BERLIN.

To the uninitiated it may, indeed, have seemed the height of presumption that the minister of a little Unitarian church in the Midlands should have ventured to go to Berlin for the express purpose of delivering some theological lectures in that centre of learning and culture, the home of the greatest living theologians, such as Harnack and Pfleiderer. What good, indeed, does she imagine she will do there? How is she to get a hearing at all when every educated Berliner knows that he can hear the same thing a thousand times better in the first University of Europe? It does seem a wild scheme, does it not? So much for the uninitiated.

When I mentioned my plan to a very dear friend in Leicester, wondering if a certain generous individual might be willing to support it, she began to look just a little doubtful, saying, "I am afraid not. He has not got enough imagination for that sort of thing."

As it turned out, however, the generous individual had sufficient imagination, and showed it in the tangible form of a £5 note. All the same, the dear friend had hit the nail on the head as far as the ordinary Britisher is concerned. He may know a little of German theology, and possibly of the German bureaucracy, but he really has no idea in what way these two factors dominate public life in Germany. He may himself believe in Parliamentary methods as much as in unsectarian education, he may also pride himself on a certain vague kind of cosmopolitanism, but, alas! when he is asked to help to put these noble principles into practice outside his own small domain, you will find him sadly shake his head. "Oh, no! he must confine himself to his own country; he has not much faith in foreign missions; every country had far better work out its own salvation," &c., &c.

Now, it so happens, Mr. Editor, that the minister of the Free Christian Church in Leicester unites two nationalities in one person; that is to say, on the one hand she has the advantage of being born and brought up in the Fatherland with a good many aristocratic and bureaucratic old-world traditions; on the other, she has elected to make her home in the "land of the free," and has succeeded in adapting herself to that land to such an extent that although she has preserved her native accent in speaking English, she has actually succeeded, according to the Berlin papers, in speaking German with an English articulation!

But, to leave these more frivolous—considerations aside, the above-named facts have for a long time past awakened a strong desire in her not to confine her energies to her adopted country, but to go back when opportunity arises and speak in Germany of that glorious freedom of conscience which has been the heritage of the Unitarian churches for upwards of a century. If England has a free representative Government, why cannot Germany have the same? If England is prepared to do away with sectarian education, why should not Germany do likewise? If English Nonconformity has shown the necessity of freeing the Church from State patronage, if English Unitarianism has had the courage to stand out from the beginning for an absolutely undogmatic Christianity, is it not time for Germany to do the same? It is true, neither the theological nor the political institutions of one country must be slavishly copied by another, but surely there are principles of political freedom and of religious liberty which should hold good for every civilised country and every Christian community?

Moved by thoughts like these, and having enlisted the sympathy of some very good friends who had enough imagination to interest themselves in my plans, I took the plunge, and ventured to arrange for a course of three lectures in the large hall of the Architektenhaus in Berlin. It was just a trifle late in the season. (Next year I mean to go earlier.) Berlin was already beginning to emigrate to the country, also there was quite a tropical heat-wave passing over the city. Nevertheless, the hall was well filled on the occasion of my first lecture, for which I had chosen the subject "Prophecy Old and New." Having given an account of the early development of Hebrew prophecy, and having passed in review the main scriptural prophets, I closed with some suggestions as to what prophecy should be to-day—namely, a working of the Divine Spirit in the heart of each individual for the regeneration of society and the progress of justice and liberty—taking occasion to dwell on the importance of making a firm stand against the overwhelming increase of militarism and the ever-growing power of the present-day bureaucracy. The lecture was favourably commented on in all the leading papers, only the highly orthodox Reichsbote and the Tägliche Rundschau taking exception to it.

The next lecture was held a week later, the subject being "Our Longing after a New Jesus." In this lecture I gave an account of the various lives of Jesus, beginning with that by David Friedrich Strauss, and bringing the subject up to the present-day criticism as it is represented in Germany by the school of Ritschl. We must reconstitute our Churches on the basis of the pure and lofty humanity of Jesus, and German clergymen must have the courage to refuse to recite a creed in which they no longer believe.

It was at the close of this lecture that a man got up to ask a question, and when I gave him permission to do so, he proceeded to make an elaborate speech against me, getting very excited, and calling me, among other things, a false prophetess! As soon, however, as I saw what he was about, I left the hall and told the people to do likewise. In the end he was duly put out, and that closed the incident. None of my friends took the matter seriously, but thought it rather a good joke. It was again the Reichsbote and the Rundschau which took good care to report every word of this entirely uneducated man, while most of the liberal papers took no notice of it at all.

My third lecture was to have followed the next week, but as I had in the meantime, through the kind instrumentality of the American Ambassador, received permission to conduct a German service in the beautiful American church on the Nollendorf-platz, I decided that it would be best to substitute this service for the third lecture, as Whit Sunday was close at hand. I conducted the service on the evening of the Friday before Whit Sunday, and preached a Whitsuntide sermon to a crowded congregation. The order of the service had been printed on sheets, and we had been fortunate enough to secure the services of a good choir and a first-rate soloist. This, I should say, was the first German service conducted by a woman in Berlin, and I much hope that it has served to open the eyes of the Berlin people to the perfect propriety of seeing a woman in the pulpit.

I brought my work in Berlin to a close with an autobiographic article which the editor of the Lokal-Anzeiger had requested me to write for him. The Lokal-Anzeiger is the most widely read paper in Berlin, and it is said to be the only paper which Royalty reads! I was very pleased to find that the article, which dealt with my own religious development and my work at the Free Christian church in Leicester, was published without any omission or addition.

Friends in Westphalia had arranged another lecture for me in a small provincial town; but, evidently having had no idea of the extent of my heresies, they became nervous through the newspaper reports that reached them, and begged me to defer my lecture to another occasion, as they feared a public disturbance would ensue in the place, which is strongly Roman Catholic on the one hand, and strictly evangelical on the other. I gave in to them willingly, not because I was afraid of the disturbance—I should have rather enjoyed it—but because I was most desirous of going to Wiesbaden for the annual meeting of the Protestantenverein, to which both the president (Director Schrader) and Dr. Fischer, of Berlin, had heartily invited me.

At Wiesbaden I had the pleasure of meeting a good many new and some old friends, and I need scarcely say that I enjoyed the proceedings thoroughly.

Pfarrer Fischer, of the Jerusalemer Kirche, son of Dr. Fischer, read a bold and interesting paper on the political outlook of the Lutheran Church, passing in review the various heresy cases that had occurred lately, and emphasising the importance of absolute firmness on the part of liberal theologians in their dealings with an orthodox Government.

Pfarrer Jatho, of Cologne, preached an eloquent sermon in the beautiful Ringkirche, laying stress on the necessity of distinguishing between the Jesus of history and the dogmatic Jesus of the later church.

Pastor Traub, of the Christliche Welt, spoke on the social work of the Church, and gave a most interesting account of the various German trades unions, such as the "Christliche Gewerkschaften," the Hirsch-Dunckersche Vereine, and the Social Democratic Unions. He warned emphatically against the "Christliche Gewerkschaften" as being entirely governed by Roman Catholic particularism on the one hand, and by Stöcker's aggressive evangelicalism on the other.

On the Friday, the last day of the Congress, Schuldirektor Schmidt, of Berlin, read a paper on the subject "Volkskirche oder Bekenntniskirche"—i.e., "A Church of the people versus a creed-bound Church"—in which, to my utter astonishment, he laid it down as a maxim that there was no need to abolish the creeds, but rather to interpret them in a liberal spirit, so to speak, in the Hegelian sense, in which the dogma of the virgin birth would stand for the incarnation of the Divine in humanity.

One or two members present ventured to disagree with the learned speaker, and amongst them was the minister of the Free Christian Church in Leicester, who considered the subject so important that she felt constrained to get up and speak at the last moment. It was then 12 o'clock, and her train for England was due to leave at 1 p.m.

She gave her impressions of the various liberal theological conferences which she had been privileged to attend in former years; how she had always been keenly stimulated by them; what deep admiration she had always felt for German scholarship; but how, on going home, in spite of it all, she could not but ask herself such questions as these: These noble, brave men who speak here so courageously of a liberal religion, of the Church of the future, are they or are they not the same that stand up Sunday by Sunday at the altar of their churches to recite in solemn assembly the Apostles' Creed, and say that they believe what they have just asserted that they do not believe? Are they the same that preach such cautious sermons Sunday by Sunday that one might well believe that there existed no such thing as a liberal theology? Has, indeed, the time not come for German clergymen to go a similar way as two thousand British ministers went when they decided rather to leave the Established Church than to conform to a prayer-book in which they could not believe? No, the German Church of the future must not go on compromising with orthodoxy, and if she is to have creeds at all, it must be such as her ministers can truthfully recite, not such on which they put a different interpretation from the ordinarily received meaning of the terms. Indeed, she concluded, there was a hard struggle in store for the liberal clergy of Germany. She herself was sympathising deeply with them, and was praying for their ultimate victory. But of one thing in particular she was strongly convinced—namely, this: that if they were to fight the battle successfully to the end, they must enlist the help of their women in the cause; it must be their wives and mothers and sisters who would have to encourage them in the fight, who would have to stand shoulder to shoulder with them and say, "Lieber Mann, geh nur zu"—"We shall be with you in the battle; we, too, are ready to make sacrifices for the sake of truth and liberty."

There followed a long and hearty applause, and it seemed as if one had only expressed what the majority present had felt all along. There was no time to stay and listen to speakers who got up in hot haste to defend the integrity of the German clergy, and to explain how differently the German Church was situated from the English. A few friendly words and hand-shake with the President was all that was possible, and then a rush home to catch the train!

I have since heard from Herr Schrader that Direktor Schmidt's paper met with more opposition than agreement, and that no vote was taken on the resolution. Herr Schrader has also most kindly sent me a good many pamphlets to show what active part the Protestantverein has taken in stirring up public feeling in connection with the heresy cases of the last few years. Prof. Pfeiderer spoke in defence of Dr. M. Pinker at one of these meetings.

It is a fine thing to be in the midst of a great struggle. It is a glorious thing to know that one is living at a time that requires strong men and strong women to shape the future. It brings one very near to the Master to realise that the time has come for liberal religious thinkers when they must be ready to go and sell all they have and follow truth at all costs. In this country the struggle has been waged for centuries. It will end, no doubt, in the disestablishment of the remaining State Churches. The great principles of perfect religious liberty are no longer new to the British people, but in Germany these principles at the present day only exist in theory. I am told it used to be better in times gone by. The worst of it is that the power of the State (which, in Germany, means the bureaucracy) dominates every sphere of public life. A servant of the State must be Protestant or Catholic; so must his children be. The consequence is that religious indifference and atheism are rampant among high and low.

The Prussian Court is strictly evangelical. The Empress builds one church after another. The Minister of Education is after the Imperial heart, of the good old orthodox type, insisting on the teaching of the Catechism in the schools and promoting theological teachers in the Universities, not according to their scientific qualifications, but according to the degree of their orthodoxy.

It is true, Harnack is at Berlin, and so is Pfeiderer. But exceptions confirm the rule. Harnack is President of the Evangelisch-soziale Congress, and last winter he made a speech on the Emperor's birthday. People say that he is to follow Studt one day. That, no doubt, would be a great gain to the liberal churchmen. But at present Harnack takes no part in the great campaign for religious liberty in Germany. Pfeiderer does not seem even to attend the Protestantverein any longer.

A regeneration of the Lutheran Church will have to come from the new generation. There are brave men and true belonging both to the Protestantverein and the Christliche Welt. They have begun to speak out in public lecture-halls, if not yet from the pulpit.

The time is ripe for great changes. We can all do a little.

I mean to go again next year, and I want the sympathy of all Unitarians. Above all, I want practical sympathy in the shape of contributions to my Anglo-German Mission Fund, which is at present utterly exhausted. Advertising in Berlin is outrageously expensive. We have spent quite £25 on advertising, though two-thirds of that was taken in tickets. It would be easier, of course, to work the large provincial towns, but Berlin is the centre of it all—if you can rouse Berlin, half the battle is won.

GERTRUD VON PETZOLD.

WINIFRED HOUSE

INVALID CHILDREN'S CONVALESCENT HOSPITAL HOME.

THE annual meeting was held at University Hall, Gordon-square, on Tuesday afternoon, Mr. G. B. Mower White, F.R.C.S., of the Great Northern Hospital, presiding.

Mr. W. B. BLYTH, in presenting the accounts as treasurer, drew attention to the fact that for the first time a grant (£56 5s.) had been received from the Hospital Sunday Fund, a very welcome imprimatur on the good work done at the Home. Annual subscriptions amounted to £423 18s., donations to £46 16s. The Hospital Saturday Fund grant was £35. The total ordinary income was £741 10s. 2d., and the total expenditure £799 16s., but a legacy of £100 had also been received, and thus the accounts closed with a balance of £41 14s. 2d. in hand. The total cost of maintenance was £715 11s. 7d., that of management only £23 17s. 9d. Under maintenance the cost of provisions was £278 11s. 1d., and of drugs, &c., only £7 10s., to which the chairman pointed as a most admirable feature in such a nursing home.

Miss MARIAN PRITCHARD, hon. secretary, read the sixteenth annual report, which stated that 46 children had been tended during the year ending April 30, the average number of beds in use being just under 17. The classified list showed hip and spinal cases 14, rickets 6, ear disease 3, debility from various causes 23. And the report continued:—

"With one exception all the hip and spinal cases have done well, and the children with rickets have derived immense benefit. The others, who may be classed together as 'walking ones,' have gained considerably in health and strength. Only one case had to be returned as unsuitable, and another was obliged to be sent away, having developed whooping cough a couple of days after his arrival. Happily this malady was soon enough discovered to make it possible, by the help of every precaution, to prevent the disease from spreading.

"With these few exceptions the children have made splendid progress, and it is most gratifying to note the delight of the parents when they see the improvement in their little ones as the weekly visits come round. And it must not be forgotten that there is an important indirect influence effected by Winifred House; indeed, in a sense it may be called a school for mothers; for Miss Hope is constantly appealed to in points of difficulty with regard to the management of children by perplexed parents, or in the matter of feeding them, &c., &c. One asked, 'How do you make those milky rice puddings that Mary likes so much? I could never get her to eat rice pudding when she was at home.' Again, another wrote, 'Since Tom came back he won't let his brother and sister behave badly at meals: "they wouldn't do that at Winifred House," he tells them.' And only a few weeks ago one mother said to the lady who had introduced her child into the Home, 'Willie is wonderfully improved; and he is not only better in health, but he behaves so much better, too. You see, we don't know so well as they do there how to manage the children; and besides, we've no time to teach them good habits. But now that he has been taught I'll do my best to keep him up to the mark.'

"All the workers in the Home feel that in this keen appreciation of their efforts, in that confidence and affection with which they are regarded by parents and children alike, lie both their greatest incentive to continued exertions and their best reward.

"But while the report of the children is eminently satisfactory, it is with great regret that we have to tell of some failure in the health of our greatly esteemed and much beloved Lady Superintendent, Miss Emma Hope. The constant and engrossing work, so splendidly carried on for the past nine years, has begun to tell upon her; and, under medical advice, she has been accorded a six months' leave of absence. We are, indeed, glad to know that already there is a distinct improvement, and we look forward with confidence to the beginning of September, in the hope of welcoming her back to Winifred House, full of renewed health and vigour.

"Only those who have an intimate knowledge of such work can realise to the full what a serious strain upon the resources of the Home the absence of such a Lady Superintendent as Miss Hope must entail. Happily, however, Miss Bertha Hope, who had received a similar training to her sister in the Pendlebury Hospital for Children, and who had already taken holiday duty for her last summer, was able and willing to step into the breach; and the superintendence of the Home has therefore continued to be carried on in a most thorough and efficient manner during this difficult period."

After due acknowledgment of thanks to Miss Bertha Hope and to the Honorary Medical Officers, and a passage on finance, pointing out the need for more annual subscribers, the report went on:—

"The YOUNG DAYS Cot Fund continues to bring in an annual subscription of £25, which is made up by readers and friends of that magazine, to the editor of which, the Rev. J. J. Wright, the Home is much indebted.

"The BRIXTON COT is still maintained by the teachers, scholars, and friends of Effra-road Church, with the addition of a generous subscription of £25 from an unknown donor. And here we cannot refrain from referring to the loss by death of two warm sympathisers with our work from that congregation, namely, Mrs. Frederick Nettlefold, to whom, with her husband, we are indebted for the SYDNEY COR; and the Rev. F. W. Stanley, the minister of the Church.

"Among the names of those interested in Winifred House who have this year passed 'behind the veil' the name of Mr. William Colfox should specially be remembered, for he represents one of the links which bind the old work of Mrs. HAMPSON'S HOME with the later activities connected with her Memorial Home; having been a generous subscriber first to the one and afterwards to the other, for the past twenty-seven years. It is pleasant to know that this honoured name will still have a place in our list, as his daughter has kindly promised to continue her father's subscription."

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, congratulated the meeting on the excellent condition of the institution. As a surgeon, he said, he had for years been dealing with the kind of case they sought to bring back to a state of perfect health, or as nearly perfect as was possible, and he doubted whether any of them knew as well as he did what good and valuable work they were doing. The Home had his fullest sympathy. The special work they did could only be carried out under such conditions. The institution should not be too large, because they wanted to deal with cases in extreme detail, such as was not possible in a large institution. In the hospital they did what they could to start the child on the way to cure; then, after two months or so, a nursing home must be found, and that was where Winifred House came in. There the child could stay as long as it was getting any good, there was no limit of time. It was very gratifying that their good work was now recognised both by the Hospital Saturday and Sunday Funds. It should be clearly understood that their work was to cure cases, and he quoted with approval the statement of the report:—"This Home is intended for invalid children who are recovering from disease, after treatment either in hospital or at home; and who only need careful nursing, under medical supervision, wholesome food, and fresh air, in order to complete their restoration to health."

They ought not to aim at increasing the number of children passing through the Home each year, else they would fail in their primary object. He noted their economical management, by which the annual cost of a bed was only about £47, including everything, whereas in a general hospital £70 would be a low estimate of the cost. They had every reason to be proud of the institution, and the manner in which it was conducted. It was most excellent work they were doing, such as was done by only a few institutions. There was every reason for them to go on, and that the Home should prosper in the future as it had done in the past.

Mr. A. WILSON seconded the resolution, which was unanimously adopted.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS proposed, and the Rev. W. L. TUCKER seconded, a resolution of thank to the officers and committee, and their re-election. Mr. Tucker bore witness, as a worker in a very poor district, to the great benefit received by the children who went to the Home, and to the delight of the parents at the treatment their children received.

Mr. T. P. YOUNG moved, and Miss MARIAN PRITCHARD seconded, the resolution of thanks to the medical officers and staff, with best wishes for Miss Emma Hope's speedy recovery. Miss Pritchard said she had received a letter from Miss Hope, who was at Seascale, in good spirits, and looking forward to be back again in September.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman, moved by Dr. URBAN PRITCHARD, and carried by acclamation, brought the meeting to a close:

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Union was held last Saturday at Leeds.

In the afternoon the Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE presided over the business meeting in the Priestley Hall, and there was a good attendance.

The Rev. A. H. DOLPHIN, hon. sec., presented the report, which stated that much good work had been done, and Mr. G. E. VERITY, the treasurer, in presenting the accounts, explained that the expenditure of the year had exceeded the income by £121, and there would have been a big deficit but for £350 received from the bazaar fund. That fund was rapidly diminishing, and some steps would soon have to be taken for increasing the ordinary income or cutting down expenditure. A special committee had been appointed to look into the matter. He referred with special pleasure to the successful achievement at West Bowling, Bradford. In the course of a few weeks the sum of £1,320 had been raised, and a new church had been opened practically free of debt.

The Rev. JOHN ELLIS, district minister, presented a comprehensive report on the work of the aided churches, and of the efforts that had been made to extend the influence of the Unitarian Church. His preaching engagements on Sundays had been chiefly at Barnsley, Elland, and Huddersfield. At Harrogate, also, progress was being made, though the time was not ripe for the founding of a church there. The mission van had met with great success at Skipton, Bingley, Shipley, Heckmondwike, and other places. "The outbreak of the New Theology controversy has," he said, "quickened in some of us a keen sense of the need for our message in this age, and of the great opportunity which is open to us for a larger share than ever in the reconstruction of religious thought that is now taking place."

On the motion of the CHAIRMAN, seconded by Mr. R. E. NICHOLSON, the reports were adopted.

Mr. Grosvenor Talbot was elected president in the place of Mr. Henry Lupton, who wished to be relieved of the duties, and Mr. Lupton and Mr. G. E. Verity were elected vice-presidents. Mr. J. T. Dodgson was appointed hon. treasurer in the place of Mr. Verity, and the Rev. A. H. Dolphin was re-elected hon. sec.

Following the meeting there was a service in Mill Hill Chapel, at which a sermon was preached by the Rev. A. W. Fox, of Todmorden.

PUBLIC MEETING.

In the evening a largely attended public meeting was held in the Priestley Hall.

Mr. GROSVENOR TALBOT, who presided, said that the difficulties which their friends had to encounter in their ministry were great and numerous. Times had changed, the aspects of religion had changed, and the qualifications of their ministers had necessarily changed with their times and circumstances. Some years ago Unitarian ministers had to declare what their faith was, but he claimed that now it was fairly well known in all denominations in the country. He pleaded for more enthusiasm in the work of the Unitarian Church, and urged them to remember that the Christian Church need not be weak simply because it was situated in a small town.

Fraternal greetings were extended to the meeting by Mr. G. W. Rayner Wood (Manchester), the Rev. W. Harrison (East Cheshire Christian Union), and the Rev. A. W. Fox (North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission).

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, in an address on "The Organisation of Our Work," said that the question of finance was a difficult one, inasmuch as their surplus was fast disappearing, and they had no right to expect that another bazaar would be equally successful as their previous effort had been. But a still greater difficulty was the condition of those churches which depended upon the Union for support. He did not think that the minimum stipend of a minister should be fixed, but it should be varied according to the value of the work which he did. A minister's value must depend upon the amount of work that the church could give him to do. If the work that a church could provide was not such as would entitle the minister to a living wage, then he would advocate a combining of churches. For example, one minister might have charge of two congregations, or two ministers of three congregations, according to the requirements of the locality. They could not continue to supply one minister for one church, except on condition that the church raised a very much larger amount than was at present the case. A church, he suggested, should have its own minister, if it raised at least two-thirds of his salary.

Mrs. W. SINCLAIR, of Sheffield, moved:—

"That this meeting of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union rejoices in the second Hague Conference as an important step in the direction of universal goodwill and peace, and earnestly hopes that its deliberations may result in a further extension of the principles of arbitration as a means of settling international disputes, and that they may lead towards a progressive reduction of that ever-increasing burden of armaments which presses so heavily on the nations of the world."

She said that the second Hague Conference would be stronger and much more representative in character than its predecessor. In 1899 twenty-six countries were represented at The Hague. On the present occasion, with the exceptions of Abyssinia, Nigeria, and Morocco, every country known to have a form of government at all would send its delegates, numbering in all about 140. The first Conference had been disappointing in many ways, but great good had come out of it. It was no small thing to have established a permanent arbitration board, as an outcome of which thirty-eight arbitration treaties had been made between different Powers. Unless they as Unitarians were false to their best traditions, unless the universal human brotherhood was to them but an empty form of words, they must see that no reproach was deserved by them in that matter. It was difficult to get people to listen to words of peace after the first shot had been fired. The moral was obvious: "Arbitrate before you fight." When provocative speeches were made by certain statesmen, when inflammatory articles appeared in the columns of the Press, the true mischief-makers too often got off scot free. It was a pity that those who provoked the war could not fight it out. Times of peace would soon become little better than times of war, but the most confirmed militarist must admit the utter futility of that constant increase of armaments, since, as all the nations were doing the same, the relative position remained unchanged. Surely, even if they did not actually decrease their armies, the Powers might hold and mark time before considering any further increase. It should be their duty to teach the young that true patriotism, while it certainly meant love for their own country, did not mean ill-will towards other countries, and that while it might be a good thing to make their country so strong that nobody would dare to attack it, it would be infinitely better to make her so beloved that no one wished to do so.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. F. G. JACKSON, and carried unanimously.

The Rev. C. J. STREET gave an address on the "Church and Social Service," and urged that the sacrifices of brotherhood were demanded of every member of the Christian church. But there should be no need for them to be demanded; they should rather be readily and thankfully given by everybody who called himself a Christian brother. The social needs of the present generation were diverse, and their societies were so complicated that they could not expect any particular church to be continuously working in one particular direction socially. He regretted the comparative neglect of the needs of their own church by those men who gave themselves heart and soul to the life of the community in other ways.

Votes of thanks to the chairman and to the Mill Hill Chapel congregation for their hospitality concluded the meeting.

THE June Mill Hill Pulpit contains a sermon on "The Fourth Gospel," the fifth of the series by the Rev. Charles Hargrove on "Thirty Years' Changes of Religious Thought." The text refers to the Transfiguration, and the sermon shows, in a striking manner how in the fourth Gospel we see Jesus transfigured in the faith of his disciples.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Blackburn (Welcome Meeting).—The Rev. E. W. Sealy, M.A., has been welcomed as the minister of the newly formed Unitarian Church in Blackburn. He seceded recently from the Church of England, having last held a curacy at St. Chad's, Devonport, where he had charge for seven years of a mission, and was known as "the People's Parson." He served on the Devonport Board of Guardians and on the Distress Committee. The welcome meeting at Blackburn was held on Saturday, June 15, and was very largely attended. In addition to a number of neighbouring Unitarian ministers, there were four ministers of other denominations present, Congregational, Baptist, United Methodist, and Swedenborgian, while two others wrote sending fraternal greetings. Mr. G. W. Pemberton, who presided, offered a very cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Sealy, and spoke with hope and courage of the future. The Rev. T. P. Spedding, Mr. Thomas Harwood, the Revs. R. T. Herford, C. Travers, J. M. Whiteman, and J. H. Weatherall and Mr. H. Pilling, all joined heartily in the welcome, as did the Rev. F. Hibbert, of the Chapel-street Congregational Church, the Rev. J. Farquhar, of the Montague-street Baptist Church, the Rev. W. H. Faulkner of the Regent-street United Methodist Free Church, and the Rev. Mark Rowse of the Swedenborgian Church. The presence of these brethren was very cordially acknowledged by several speakers as marking a happy breaking down of old sectarian animosities and distrust, and they spoke with equal frankness and goodwill of the sympathy which might unite them and their common ground in social efforts and work for the kingdom of God. Mr. Sealy expressed his grateful thanks for the hearty welcome he had received, and the cordial speeches. He contrasted the anxiety through which he had passed, and the joy he experienced in the freer conditions in which he now breathed. He gratefully acknowledged the presence of his brother ministers, and especially those of other churches, who had defied criticism and joined in that meeting. He believed he was absolutely at one with them in the way they looked at the churches. The churches were for the furtherance of the kingdom of God and of righteousness. The singing of the "Doxology" and the Benediction brought this notable meeting to a close.

Bristol: Lewins Mead Domestic Mission (Appointment).—Mr. Thomas Graham, of Todmorden, has received a unanimous invitation to become the Missionary, and he has accepted, and begins his work in July. He succeeds Mrs. Broadrick, who has retired on account of her health. A Todmorden newspaper says: "The town will shortly be the poorer by the removal to Bristol of Mr. Graham, one of its most worthy and respected citizens. For many years he has been closely and actively identified with all local movements which had for their object the educational, social, and moral advancement of the people. The Unitarian Church and Sunday-school will feel his removal the most keenly. There he has filled positions of responsibility which are only bestowed upon men who can be trusted, and he has never belied the confidence reposed in him. His influence for good has radiated far beyond the limits of his own community, and it is not too much to say that other religious bodies in the district will feel that they are sustaining a loss as well as the Unitarians. We wish him every success in his new sphere of labour."

Carlisle.—Sunday-school anniversary services were held last Sunday. Addresses to children and parents were given by the Rev. A. Thornhill at morning and afternoon service, and in the evening Mr. Haig's cantata, the "Story of Joseph," was admirably rendered by the choir and elder boys and girls of the school. The services were very well attended, over a hundred and forty being present in the evening. The collections for the school fund amounted to £2 10s. The school is thriving with an average attendance of over one hundred, and the constant addition of new children.

Cribyn.—On Sunday, June 9, there passed away in her 84th year Mrs. Jenkins, of Mynach

Villa. She belonged to a family most of whose members have for generations been strong supporters of the Unitarian movement in Cardiganshire; and she, herself, was one of the most enthusiastic and generous of them all. She was a member of the Capelygroes congregation, having been admitted in her 19th year—about 65 years ago. Her removal will cause a wide gap in the life of the congregations at Capelygroes and Cribyn, of both of which she continued a strong supporter to the end. She was ever to the fore in everything pertaining to their welfare; and her house was always open to receive ministers and others when visiting the neighbourhood. The interment at Capelygroes was very largely attended, the service being conducted by the Revs. D. Evans, R. C. Jones, and J. Davies.

Dudley.—Successful trust fund services were conducted on Sunday last, the preacher being Dr. John Ewart, of Stourbridge. An augmented choir made the musical part of the service very effective, giving an admirable rendering in the evening of Gounod's "Sing Praises unto the Lord."

Glossop.—The church anniversary services were held last Sunday, when the Rev. Frank Walters, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, officiated in the afternoon and evening. The scholars and members of the congregation marched in procession through the town before the afternoon service, and sang hymns in front of the houses of friends of the congregation, and for an invalid who had been confined to her bed for many years. There were crowded congregations, very good singing, inspiring sermons, and the collection amounted to £50 5s. 2d., which was an increase over previous years' offerings.

Halstead.—A flower service was held at the Free Christian Church on Sunday, conducted by the Rev. P. E. M. Edwards. The church band played suitable selections and led the singing.

London: Essex Church.—The Hospital Sunday Collection amounted to £230 3s.

London: George's-row Mission.—Mrs. Enfield opened the sale of work in the school-room of the Mission on Tuesday afternoon, in aid of the "George's-row Conference Fund." The stalls were well furnished with goods provided very largely by the women of the Mothers' Meeting; and other members of the Mission, in fact, the whole effort was due to their own happy thought, and sprang from their desire to raise a fund to enable their minister, the Rev. F. Summers, to attend the International Conference at Boston. Mrs. Enfield, who was introduced by Mrs. Carter (though no introduction, as she said, was needed), expressed her great pleasure in being there and in the work they had all done for so good an object. She hoped their effort would be abundantly successful, and when Mr. Summers came back from Boston, he must tell them all about it. A vote of thanks to Mrs. Enfield, moved by Mr. H. Sims, and seconded by Councillor R. Shaw, was very cordially passed, and the sale began. The total amount taken was £33 9s. 6d.

London Sunday-school Society.—One of the happiest of annual gatherings at Essex Hall is the aggregate meeting of elder scholars from the London schools for a united service. This was held last Sunday afternoon, under very pleasant weather conditions, and there were over 400 scholars present, representing fifteen of the schools. The Rev. F. K. Freeston conducted the service, and gave an address on "Honour," with the thought of which he coupled "love of the brethren" and "reverence." Mr. John Harrison presided at the organ, and at the piano for the anthem, "The Lord is my Shepherd," sung by the voices from one of the schools. The four hymns were sung with right good will.

Oldbury.—Sunday-school anniversary services were held on June 9, the morning preacher being the Rev. C. M. Wright, of the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham. In the afternoon Mr. W. J. Cross, of Handsworth, gave an address to the children, and in the evening the Rev. W. G. Topping preached. The hymns were to be repeated last Sunday, when Mr. George Thomlinson, of Leeds, who has been conducting a temperance mission in the town, was announced to preach.

Rawtenstall (Appointment).—The Rev. D. Rhoslyn Davies has accepted an invitation to the Bank-street Unitarian Church in succession to the Rev. Jenkyn Thomas, and is expected to commence his duties on July 7. The congregation has just lost one of its oldest and most respected members in the death of Mrs. Goulding, who was connected with the old chapel, and had helped to build up and support the present chapel from its foundation in 1853. Her first husband was Mr. Henry Whitaker, who was secretary of the church for many years, and was a descendant of the Rev. Richard Whitaker, the first minister of the old chapel in 1757. Latterly Mrs. Goulding had shown her sympathy and activity in the good work by undertaking the office of secretary of the Ladies' Aid Society, which post she held for over eight years. She was in her 78th year.

South Shields.—On Sunday, June 9, anniversary services were conducted at Unity Church by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, of Middlesbrough, and on Wednesday, June 12, the annual tea took place, at which visitors from Newcastle, Byker, and Gateshead were present. After tea a public meeting was held in the church. Mr. A. Robinson occupied the chair, and an inspiring address on "The Kingdom of Man" was given by Rev. F. Walters, of Newcastle. Another address by the Rev. G. A. Ferguson, of Gateshead, was on "Mr. Campbell and his book." Ald. Affleck, of Gateshead, and others also spoke.

Stockton.—On Sunday, June 9, services in connection with the 219th anniversary of the church were conducted by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, of Gee Cross, who preached morning and evening to large congregations. The annual conversazione was held on Monday evening, when the Mayor of Stockton (Ald. Harrison) presided over a large assembly. The minister, Rev. R. H. Maister, Ald. Green, Mr. W. J. Watson, and other friends took part in the proceedings. The recent Sunday-school anniversary services were conducted by Rev. A. G. Peaston, of Barnard Castle, and were well attended by the teachers and scholars. The annual entertainment on behalf of the funds of the school established a record as to the number present and the financial result. "Our Guild" brought its session to a close by giving a "social" for the benefit of the church funds.

Swansea.—In memory of two frequent worshippers at the Unitarian Church, Messrs. David Davies and J. S. Johns, who both passed away last week, the organist on Sunday evening played the Dead March in "Saul."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THIS week has been saddened for us by the repeated news of the death of valued friends. Mr. A. W. Worthington, J.P., of Stourbridge, had been for some time in failing health, but his death on Monday afternoon came suddenly, thus ending a long life of most unassuming, faithful service. In the fellowship of our churches he was perhaps best known as one of the original secretaries of the National Conference, and secretary from the first of the Sustentation Fund. For the past more than twenty years he had lived at Stourbridge, the scene also of his first ministry, and held a place there in the public life of the district from which he will be sadly missed. To our friend, the Rev. B. Kirkman Gray, the summons also came very suddenly, on Sunday afternoon. Of him, Mr. Wicksteed speaks in connection with the work of the National Conference Union for Social Service. In THE INQUIRER he had long given us constant help, and we owed much to his earnest spirit and deep human sympathies in the record of many efforts of social progress. Mr. Gray, who was trained for the Congregational ministry, and held two brief pastorates in that Connection, served from 1894 onwards as a Unitarian minister, and for four years gave himself to the work of the Bell-street Domestic Mission, Marylebone. Latterly he had been a lecturer in the London School of Economics, and two years ago published his "History of English Philanthropy from the Dissolution of the Monasteries to the taking of the First Census." Both of Mr. Worthington and Mr. Gray we hope to have a fuller memorial notice next week. Another friend, whose loss will be very keenly felt at Norwich, is Miss Clark, to whom also, with the same swiftness as to those other two, the call came on Monday afternoon, at the house of Mrs. Mottram, her nearest friend. Miss Clark, who had for many years a school for girls in Norwich, was a woman of beautiful and noble nature, whose influence was widely and deeply felt. She gave untiring service for many years in connection with the Octagon, as morning superintendent in the Sunday-school, in the Young People's Guild, the Girls' Friendly Circle, and in other ways. There are many who will rise up to call her blessed.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

SIR,—The summer meeting at Oxford of the Union for Social Service has already been announced in your columns for July 8 to 13. The arrangements had been made by our devoted secretary, Mr. Kirkman Gray, in conjunction with Miss Gittins, and, in spite of his precarious health, he was looking forward confidently to attending and taking part in the proceedings. Now we hear of his death, and not only mourn the loss of a zealous colleague, but feel that a spirit of rare purity and beauty has been withdrawn from our counsels. Arrangements as to lectures will be made as soon as may be, and the necessary changes will be duly announced, and all will go on, so far as possible, as it had been planned by Mr. Gray. We must all feel that the best tribute we can at the moment pay to his memory is to give vigour and life to the last piece of work to which he set his hand.

The formal part of our proceedings can be set out as a programme, but the real value of our meetings will depend upon those who attend them. We, the officers, look to them for guidance and suggestion as to the future, and it is rather in the informal conferences than in the set lectures that we look for lasting fruits. All who have attended any similar gatherings must feel that the presence together day by day of a band of friends united by common sympathies and under the shadow of a common idea brings thoughts, experiences, and impressions of lasting significance. Day by day the sense of union grows, and the common purpose gathers strength and clarifies itself. We have purposely refrained from overloading the days with stated lectures, in order to give this collective life room in which to grow, and we appeal to those in all our congregations who have the aims of the Union at heart to bring their knowledge and their perplexities alike into the common stock.

PHILIP H. WICKSTEED.

AMERICAN NOTES.

THE May anniversaries of our religious fellowship in the United States have come and gone. Once more our Unitarian tribes have assembled at their denominational Zion for worship and conference, and to hear reports concerning the year's activities and results. In point of numbers and general interest the meetings averaged well with those of other years. We are not a very demonstrative folk, and the Boston environment is not especially favourable to enthusiasm. Still, there were moments when the monotony of committee reports and the chill New England reserve were happily broken into by a display of real spontaneous feeling, as when tribute was paid to the efficient and successful labours of our devoted and modest Field Secretary for New England, William Channing Brown, in leading the movement to double this year the financial contribution to the missionary funds of the American Unitarian Association. At the initiative of a few ardent young ministers, and somewhat against the judgment of the denominational leaders, this endeavour was made. Once launched, however, all worked heartily for it, and the sum first indicated—$150,000—was raised in full by the churches and generous individual givers. It is hoped that an average of $100,000 annually may hereafter be attained.

Rev. Earl M. Wilbur, Dean of the new Unitarian School for the Ministry at Berkeley, California, gave an interesting and cheering account of the growth of his institution.

The topic of ministerial salaries, relief funds, and pensions was also much discussed in public and private gatherings, and steps were taken towards some solution of the financial problems of our clerical life. Another meeting of great interest was that at which interdenominational greetings were brought us by representatives of the Orthodox Congregational, Universalist, Quaker, and Christian bodies. Professor Fenn's paper on the ministry, read to the clergy in King's Chapel, touched high-water mark. Through all the week there were many references to the approaching International Congress of religious liberals in Boston. There is a glad expectancy in all hearts concerning its promise and importance to our liberal cause. In this East and West, North and South, seem to share. The writer, as executive secretary of the congress, has recently made a missionary journey through the West in its interest, speaking in some twelve cities and college towns. Chicago, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Milwaukee, Indianapolis, Detroit, Ann Arbor, Madison, &c., were visited in turn. Everywhere there was a display of warm interest, and many pledges to attend the Congress next September. Letters from the South tell of an unusual stir caused by the announcement of our international meetings. Over a hundred of our American women's societies have been studying all winter the story of liberal religion in European and other foreign countries. Over three hundred addresses on this theme have been made by the writer, by Dr. S. A. Eliot, Dr. Crocker, Revs. J. T. Sunderland, F. C. Southworth, J. F. Meyer, Professor Rau, and other speakers, to alliances, clubs, and conferences, while our denominational journals have contained much valuable matter on the subject.

The local committee is delighted to learn that so large a delegation is coming from Great Britain. The more the better. The delegations from Continental European nations are not large, but very impressive by the intellectual and moral weight of their representatives. Professor Otto Pfeleiderer is to deliver in October a course of lectures in German at the Harvard Theological School, and the Deutsche Gesellschaft, of Boston, under the presidency of Professor Münsterberg, of Harvard, is preparing to give him a splendid reception at our leading hotel, the Somerset. It is hoped that other of our German-speaking delegates will be able to remain, over and participate in this occasion. The French, Hungarian, Scandinavian, and Dutch delegates will also receive social courtesies, so far as their time-permits.

But it is to England we look for our chief foreign constituency. It is our desire and hope to have every British clerical delegate occupy a Boston or suburban pulpit on September 22, and thus personally participate in the opening of the Congress. The Secretary of the Congress will be at the Unitarian headquarters in Boston all summer to greet any delegates who may make an early appearance.

The present summer is an unusually cool one—almost cold. This does not negative a sudden transition to great heat; but it will be well to be prepared for both climatic contingencies.

A day recently spent at Niagara Falls renewed the impressions of former visits. Since both banks of the river at this point have been made Government property and opened freely to the public, the park-like surroundings and relief from greedy exploitation add much to the sublimity and beauty of this great spectacle of nature. But the tumultuous rush and awful roar of the cataract are too overpowering for a long stay. A single day suffices to enable the active visitor to see the falls from every point of view, especially if he avails himself of the coupon tickets ($1.50) sold on the trains and at the stations, which provide a carriage drive to desirable points of view and an electric-car ride down the gorge on the American and back by the Canadian side. The trip (60 c.) in the staunch little steamer Maid of the Mist along the verge of the descending mass of waters should be taken for its awe-inspiring impressions. Those not averse to discomfort may enter the Cave of the Winds, under the American Falls ($1.00). An inexpensive lunch and a few (hideous) souvenirs complete the necessary expense of the visit, unless one prefers to spend the night at a hotel instead of on the sleeping-car. But the memories of the visit will be golden for the rest of one's life.

Visitors to New York City will find pleasant welcome at the Unitarian Headquarters at 104, East Twentieth-street, in the rear of All Souls' Unitarian Church, where Rev. Geo. H. Badger, the Unitarian Secretary for the Middle States, or his representatives, will be glad to receive them. The Unitarian headquarters in Philadelphia are at 102, South Twelfth-street, and the Chicago office is at 175, Dearborn-street, with Rev. W. M. Backus in charge.

The Second Bulletin of the Boston Congress has appeared as a supplement in the American and British Unitarian journals. A German version has been issued as a supplement by the Protestantenblatt, of Berlin, and Die Christliche Welt, of Marburg. Another in French has appeared in the Protestant, of Paris, and La Vie Nouvelle, of Montauban, as well as the Dutch organ, Hervorming. This, with a large private distribution and many Press notices at home and abroad, assures a large advertisement of the Congress throughout the world.

Professor Montet and Revs. E. Rochat and L. Maystre, of Geneva, together with Rev. Tony Andre, of Florence, form a congenial party which sails from Genoa on August 22, and intends visiting New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Hudson River, Niagara, the St. Lawrence, and Canadian points ere they turn their faces towards the Congress. Our Dutch friends come by a Rotterdam steamship.

Thirteen countries have now appointed delegates to our session in Boston.

An interesting figure at the Congress will be Abbe A. Houtin, whose illuminating and brave books, "La Question Biblique au XX^e Siècle," "L'Americanisme," "La Crise du Clergé," &c., have been promptly placed on the Roman Index. He will treat of the New Catholic Movement at the Congress.

Another visitor of note will be Dr. Max Fischer, of St. Mark's Church, Berlin, recently the object of synodal persecution on account of an address he gave at the 1904 meeting of the Protestantenverein.

The Harvard theological department is about to issue a quarterly called The Harvard Theological Review, Professors Fenn, Ropes, and G. H. Moore will direct the publication of the quarterly, which will not appear until next January. The purpose of the magazine is to record and comment on theological intelligence of current interest. It will be partially supported by the endowment of the late Mildred Everett, daughter of the late Dean Everett, of the Harvard Theological School, and editor of The New World, whose discontinuance was so much regretted by our liberal fellowship.

The late visit of the Rev. L. P. Jacks, of Oxford, editor of the Hibbert Journal, was most welcome to his many friends in the United States, who have learned to love him as a man and prize him as a scholar.

The Rev. Paul R. Frothingham and Mrs. Frothingham will soon be on their vacation visit to Europe, returning in time for the National Conference session in Boston, over which Mr. Frothingham will preside. President S. A. Eliot, of the Unitarian Association, has taken a summer home not far from Boston, so as to be within reach for consultation with regard to Congress affairs.

The sudden death of our English-American fellow-worker, the Rev. John Cuckson, came to us as a great surprise and shock. For a year past he had seemed to be in failing health, but kept up his usual stint of work and flow of spirits. He was a man of sterling qualities of character, manly independence, and as a preacher, both in the literary form of his discourses and their electric delivery, had few equals in our liberal pulpit. We shall miss him greatly, especially in the Ministerial Union, of which he was the president at the time of his death.

CHARLES W. WENDTE.

IN THE CROW'S NEST.

It was necessary, of course, to visit my parishes. I already called them mine in thought, and felt that I should always hold them dear, whether I found it possible to become their minister or not. I suppose a lady never feels quite indifferent to a man who has asked, albeit unsuccessfully, for her hand. The day which I first proposed turned out to be one on which a Landesgemeinde was to be held—an assembling of all the burghers of a government district for the adoption or rejection of laws—and, much as I should have liked to see it, I thought it better to choose a quieter Sunday for my visit.

The coach left Samaden at 6.40 a.m. A peasant woman, travelling without any head-dress, for whom I opened the door, thanked me with an accent which had no taint of Schwitterdütsch. I thought she was travelling down the Unterengadin (for passengers to the Münstertal are rare) and did not attempt to converse with her. One place remained vacant, and the fourth was taken by a soldier. Another travelled in the extra coach. They were returning from strike duty at St. Moritz. Six hundred Italian masons had marched away, three days before, over the Maloja. When the strike was at its height my pupils and I had the Realschule all to ourselves, and were guarded by a military patrol. All the regular masters had been called out for special service, and on one occasion the headmaster of the school happened to be in the squad which was detached to guard it. As for the dispute itself, the demands of the men were not unreasonable; a ten-hours day, fortnightly payments and a scale of wages which would give a skilled mason about five-pence an hour; but they presented their claim at the knife's point, and that is not the way to deal with Bündner folk.

At Bevers, where the railway swerves off towards the Albula tunnel, the vacant place was taken by a German, who stared at me as if I had been a ghost. After several efforts to speak, "were you not," he articulated at last, "in the train from St. Moritz?" I owned up, and awaited developments. "Then how did you get into this coach?" He was labouring under the impression that Bevers was the only place where the coach-route touched the rail, and my explanation that they were only ten minutes apart at Samaden relieved him immensely. As soon as he was quite sure I was no Hexenmeister—the peasant woman with the good German supported me, and an appeal to the soldier resulted likewise in my favour—he became very genial, and pretended not to perceive that I was an Englishman.

The railway behind us, we rolled along through Ponte, where the bridge of the great fight has been displaced by a workmanlike, but unpoetic iron structure, Madulein, with Guardaval above it, where Adam of Camogask avenged his daughter's honour and freed his fatherland, Zuoz, the old capital, with its ancient prison tower, Scans and the Val Sulsanna, which leads by the Scaletta pass to Davos; crossed the Punt Ota, and were in the Unterengadin. Between Scans and Zernetz, there is a long and beautiful gorge,

Where Inn, full many a fathom low,
Wears with his rage no common foe.

Beyond it we enter a wide plain, and I must change coaches and have time for breakfast.

In the inn I see my peasant woman, who is evidently to be my companion over the Ofen pass.

"Excuse me," she says, are you the Herr Pfarrer?"

Not yet, I tell her, but perhaps before long.

"I thought so! I thought so! Oh, how glad I am."

The road from Zernetz to the summit, which rises more than 2,000 feet, is very lonely, and very beautiful. At one place it offers a most remarkable view along a mountain-river gorge, from a point high above it. This is La Serra, the defile of the Spöl. We make one long stop at the Ofenberg, a solitary inn renowned among chamois-hunters, where I found lunch awaiting me. I suppose there is a telephone connection with Zernetz.

My companion and I had much talk. I was sure to like the valley; one could not help liking it. Its advantages were catalogued for me, and I quite believe they are all genuine. I wish I dare print what I was told about the people—such simple, natural, human things. But in that thinly-peopled valley to repeat an incident is to name a name; and the world has grown small.

We reach the summit, and there, majestic in the distance dwarfing all the nearer giants, towers the huge Ortler; and there, nestling under an arve wood, high on the mountain side, is Lü. Cierfs comes next into sight, scattered into three hamlets. A steep-winding road takes us down through stone-pines, and across a waste, into the meadows which surround the village.

The Pension Alpina is closed, but the tavern next door, which belongs to the same host, is open, and my room is actually in the more modern building. I leave my bag, and remove some stains of travel. The coach waits for me, and takes me down past the shallow lake, through Fuldera Daint, into Fuldera Dora. A young girl whose perfect features are set off by a kerchief, exquisitely draped, guides me to my correspondent's house. Many of the children in these villages are ideally beautiful.

I inspect the little church, and we arrange the morrow's services. At Cierfs, my host shows me over the church. I am early abed, and rise early.

At half-past nine I conduct a service in a crowded church at Cierfs. A trap takes me to Fuldera, and at eleven I find the church there equally full. I am sorry to have no language for these people but German, for they are clearly much less at home in it than the Oberengadiners. Still, a German Pfarrer is better than none.

I pass my afternoon in the pine wood, and in the evening I go into—

I ought to have told you. It is a great day among the young people. They have studied a play in German, and have already given a trial performance. To-day they are to give it again, and people are coming from Santa Maria and Münster, yes, even from Mals, away in the Vintschgau, over the Tyrol border, to see it. Of course, I must go, too.

The theatre is the very tiniest, I should think, in the whole world. It is a room in the Pension Alpina. The drop-curtain presents a picture of Cierfs itself, with the church spire in the middle. This, and all the scenery, were painted in one week by a Fuldera man. The play is "Der tolle Hofjunker," which is a comedy. It was indeed as funny as any comedy I ever saw. The man who played the barber is a born actor; but every character contributed, one way or another, to the amusement of the audience. And the audience had come in the best of humours, and met the actors half way.

I saw only two acts, for a deputation appeared in the inn to wait on me. The place was full of guests, who had come for the entertainment. (The play was but one item.) I sat at the head of a rough tavern table, with ambassadors from the three parishes to right and left; all round us was laughter and talk in at least five dialects; the wreaths from porcelain pipes floated gracefully about our heads. And so I was solemnly called.

"We three parishes have assembled, and resolved. We call you to the care of our souls." Duties and conditions were exactly detailed, and I was asked to reply. I thanked them, and asked for Bedenkzeit, which they readily granted. A company of Tyrolers came noisily in, and we made room for them.

This was the merriest night of all the year, and there was no drunkenness, and no unseemliness. These people, the inn-keeper told me, do not frequent the tavern, and do come to church. Next day I climbed up to Lü, which will be a great air-cure resort when it has a road and a hotel. I met one of the deputation at work in a field. He addressed me in French. It is clear that a Pfarrer in the Münstertal must learn the Romanish of the countryside. German is not enough.

Let not ambition mock. If duty did not point elsewhere, would it not be a worthy use, not merely of a year or two, but of a whole life, to devote it to the encouragement in well-doing, the comfort in sorrow, of those simple, genuine villagers?

E. W. LUMMIS.

THE SECRETS OF SILENCE.

SILENCE tells us the unutterable things, and souls that are akin speak in tenderest fashion to each other when their lips make no movement. Silence is, indeed, an atmosphere in which contemplative minds grow fruitful, and shallow ones embarrassed; while the heart which has made evil its choice, fears it as a frightened child fears the dark. To all of us there is something almost painfully impressive mingled with its calm—a solemnity that crushes even while it soothes the spirit; and this is experienced more or less poignantly in proportion to the activity which characterises our every-day life. For, while the scholar and the thinker hate every sound which distracts their attention from study, the work performed by the majority of people is carried on to the accompaniment of myriad noises which they scarcely notice while they are busy, but which they miss acutely when they no longer hear them. That is why town-folk, as a rule, come back so contentedly to the roaring streets wherein they feel so much at home after a few weeks in the country. The quietness of the latter, they frankly confess, gets on their nerves—which is, perhaps, only another way of admitting that “there is a spirit in the woods” who demands of man a reverence of thought he is not always capable of achieving.

Visionaries and mystics, since time began, have been disciples of silence, and all great souls have drawn from it the inspiration for their noblest endeavours. We English people, as a race, are proud of the strong, silent men who have helped to make our name honoured throughout the world; and it is an open question whether the best work is not always done by people of few words, the brilliant conversationalists of noted salons, famed in art and literature, notwithstanding. Genius is the only legitimate excuse for volubility, and even those great ones who possess it should be merciful, lest their hearers be overwhelmed and swept off their feet by a too-forceful flood of eloquence. Economy of speech is, at all events, a virtue not to be despised by the thoughtful in this twentieth century, when everybody tries to talk, at least with fluency, if not always with sincerity; and one might venture to lay it down as an axiom that Truth has deeper meanings for those who know how to listen and be still.

There is a great difference between the silence of a stupid man and the silence of a thinker. But, while the latter will be listened to with eager enjoyment when he is surprised into continuous speech, the former will never cease to earn our respect if he is wise enough to remain dumb. To be at once uninformed and talkative is a disastrous thing, for the utmost that can be obtained as the result of such a combination is the cheap “smartness” which pleases “the ears of the groundlings,” and exasperates those who are stumbling after knowledge. De Quincey, speaking of Mrs. Wordsworth, says, “she talked so little that Mr. Slave-Trade Clarkson used to allege against her that she could only say ‘God bless you!’” and he adds, rather shrewdly, that her “repose of mind” was much more adapted to uphold the comfort of Wordsworth’s daily life, “than a blue-stocking loquacity, or even a legitimate talent for discussion.” Whether or not it is desirable that all men’s wives should be restricted within quite such narrow conversational limits, it is certain that few women noted for the rapid way in which they chatter about everything in heaven and earth, could have won from the poet the admiration and reverence expressed in those lines beginning “She was a phantom of delight.” Mrs. Wordsworth’s was

“A countenance in which did meet Sweet records, promises as sweet”; and no one who has ever walked through Grasmere Vale, and looked forth from the windows of that primitive little cottage where the “simple life” was lived by people great of soul a century before it became a cult of fashionable modernity, could doubt whence came the inspiration of so quiet and beautiful a mind.

This brings us back to the silence that is found in nature, and beloved of those whose spirits have something in common with the mystery abiding in solitary places. Silence, if you think of it, is allied with all exquisite things. We find it sometimes even in London, when we go to spend an hour among the Raphaels and Botticellis at the National Gallery, or loosen our imagination in the sylvan haunts of Kew. But it is only in the shadow of the hills, or under foam-flecked crags, that one really gets to the heart of that great stillness which broods over infinity, and against which the roaring tides and tempestuous winds seem but as the ruffling of foam on a stretch of untrodden sand. How often has one sat motionless on some lichened rock by the Cornish sea, hearing, through the rhythmic swirl of waves, that “music of an unlike fashioning” which is only audible to the soul! Or how often has one sought to capture the secret of that silent glow and warmth steeping some breathless moor, as the July day gathered up every point of light and colour before sinking into the equal calmness of night! When one has exhausted one’s raptures about the variety and loveliness of a landscape, one must always feel a certain impotence of speech as one realises how ineffectual are words to describe its soundless ecstasy, born as that ecstasy is of innumerable quiet things—leaves, and grass, and innocent flowers—which do not force themselves upon one’s attention, and are content if they may but breathe and die unnoticed. Doubtless, if our senses were fine enough, we should hear many sounds pulsing about such shy nooks as the speedwell loves—the buzz of tiny insects, the rushing of the sap, the stir of growth; but the blossom is, if anything, sweeter to us because its coming and going are noiseless, apparently, as the waxing and waning of the dawn. The human soul, like this delicate thing, attains its truest life in silence; and the peace that passes understanding is born, not of the strenuous hours when our activities are fully employed, but of the equally fruitful periods of quiet thought and reflection in which ideas are re-adjusted, and irritabilities soothed.

Martineau has beautifully said, “Silence is in truth the attribute of God. . . . All great things are born in silence. . . . Silence came before creation, and the heavens were spread without a word.” Character, too, is moulded in silence, and those who bear life’s ills with the noblest fortitude “neither strive nor cry.” An excited controversialist does less good to his cause than the patient worker, who, convinced that certain ideas are right for him, is more anxious to make his own life accord with them than to proselytise the world. There is, as we have all been taught in our childhood, a time to speak, and a time to refrain from speaking; but in these days it were, perhaps, as well to lay a little more emphasis on the merits of silence than on those of eloquence, for when everybody is talking, Truth is apt to escape in the heat of argument. She, that pure spirit, who will hover by her martyrs at the stake to the very last, abhors the troubled atmosphere of disputation; and, while the doctors wrangle in the schools, she unveils her face to some potential Christ on the mountain-slope, where he has sought for her in solitude.

EXPERIMENTS IN SOCIALISM.

VI.—PARIS “SOCIALISTS” IN 1848.

THERE is just one other Socialistic experiment to which in a series of articles of this kind attention ought to be drawn, and with that I will close. One might go on quite indefinitely. Fifty or sixty years ago a man named Macdonald, a Scotch printer, and an ardent follower of Robert Owen, set out on a tour of inquiry in North America with the purpose of writing a book giving an account of all the Socialistic settlements he could find. He devoted ten years to this inquiry, and accumulated a great amount of material, though the book was never written. There were in all probability a good many little communities he did not discover, but he actually found seventy-eight societies of one sort and another, either existing, or that had recently collapsed, and that in the United States and Territories alone. The truth is that for many a long day the world has had a vision of a brighter life than it has been living, and has been every now and again trying to embody its visions in concrete form. The wonder is that it should so often have been the wicked world outside all the churches that has had these dreams of peace and harmony and union, and should have tried to realise them here on earth, while the churches have so generally been content to look on in a spirit of critical disbelief in the possibility of thus applying their own teaching. It might well be that the trained intelligence of church leaders might be unable to encourage such schemes from a perception of their inherent impracticability; but the least that might have been expected from them was that they should closely have studied these pathetic attempts to realise the higher life, with the view of determining wherein the impracticability consisted, of discovering the real causes of failure and the conditions of success. But for the most part they have gone on pointing to another world for the social embodiment of their principles, while graceless outsiders have been perversely insisting on it that if the principles are good for anything at all they ought to be realisable in this world. What a comedy it is!—the people who do believe in Christianity, sniffing and scoffing contemptuously at all attempts to build up societies on its teaching, and the people who don’t believe, and will have nothing to do with the churches, breaking their hearts and bringing themselves to poverty and despair because they, somehow, can’t make the Christian principles work!

If ever there was a “Socialistic” scheme that might have provoked to sardonic laughter all the gods of Olympus it must surely have been that with which the name of Louis Blanc has been so unjustly associated, and to which all the enemies of Socialism have so gloatingly pointed whenever they have required a striking illustration of the absurdity and absolute futility of Socialistic theories. I am alluding, of course, to the memorable setting up of national workshops for the unemployed in Paris in 1848, which, as most well-informed people are aware, not only failed in what was supposed to be its object, but, by its failure, brought about one of the most terrible insurrectionary outbreaks in European history

It really is not worth while to go into this matter in any detail. Everybody who knows the history of it knows that it was not a Socialist movement at all, nor was it the ebullition of mere madness such as it has often been pronounced. It was the work of political scoundrels, one or two of whom richly deserved to be hanged for it. The Paris Socialists and this insane scheme have been held responsible for the frightful disturbances which followed. But the fact is that an insurrectionary storm had long been brewing, and this labour-organising madness only precipitated and intensified the outbreak. Reckless pursuit of wealth, commercial gambling, and the scandalous misrule of the clever but unprincipled and most rapacious Louis Philippe had brought the country to the verge of ruin; and all over France, but especially in Paris, the unemployed were swarming in daily increasing numbers. It was this condition of things which had given Louis Blanc his enormous popularity among the working classes. In 1839 he had founded his Revue du Progrès, and in this he wrote a series of papers on the "Organisation du Travail," which, in 1840, were published in book form, and turned the thoughts of all working Paris in the direction of Socialist industry. After the revolution of February, 1848, he became a member of the Provisional Government, and, as the idol of the working classes, the most popular man in France, he was, of course, a member to be reckoned with. As a journalist and author he had made himself the representative of Socialism, while many of his colleagues in the Government—including Lamartine, its ruling spirit—were in the strongest opposition to his theories. How were they to oppose him without bringing all working Paris about their ears? There cannot be a doubt that a rascally lawyer, M. Marie, who hated Blanc and all his ways and works, conceived the idea of practically demonstrating the folly of the demagogue's theories, and thus destroying his credit and authority with the working classes. Under Louis Blanc's influence the Provisional Government had passed a resolution of five clauses—first, to provide work for all who needed it; second, to convert the Bank of France into a State bank; third, to nationalise the railways, insurance companies, and savings banks; fourth, to set up public workshops and stores; and, fifth, to establish agricultural colonies on co-operative principles.

Now, that is a programme to which all Socialists would subscribe; but it is a very large order, and how it could best be carried out is a question upon which the most ardent Socialist, if only moderately prudent, would think a good deal before setting about it. Beyond all dispute, M. Marie's purpose was not to carry it out, but to show that it could not be carried out, and that any attempt would only make bad matters worse for the working classes themselves. Of the five items in the resolution he picked out two, taking care to leave out the last item on the list. He persuaded the Government to undertake to find work for everybody who could produce a certificate granted by any mayor showing that he needed it, to organise public workshops, and to make him—M. Marie—director of the whole scheme. This was, I think, in March, 1848, and before the end of April 100,000 men and women had presented themselves with certificates. It had, of course, gone out all over France that work was to be had in Paris, and that everybody could earn at least a couple of francs a day. The policy should, of course, have been to keep all country people in the country, and to withdraw as many as possible from Paris. Agricultural colonies as designed by Louis Blanc would have tended to this. But Blanc was persuaded to accept the presidency of a committee for discussing the labour problem, while Marie became Minister of Public Works, with full power to put the theories of his demagogue rival to the test in his own way. Louis Blanc had nothing to do with it, and from first to last protested against the way in which his proposals were being caricatured. Instead of spreading the people over the country and organising work for them in land colonies, M. Marie and his factotum Thomas, a young engineer from whom he is said to have derived his scheme, confined their organisation to Paris, and the effect, of course, was what has been experienced in London, in a less formidable degree, when a Mansion House Fund has been started or a Labour Committee has been formed. The people flocked in by thousands. Every bit of public work, necessary or unnecessary, that could possibly be devised was taken in hand by an industrial army organised on military lines, with its escouades, brigades, lieutenancies, and companies, with headquarters in the Parc Monceaux, where there were shoals of staff officers taking high pay for a mere pretence of work. Very soon, of course, all sorts of odd jobs were finished, and no work could be found for the formidable army enrolled, while 50,000 or 60,000 men were still clamouring for enrolment, and others were actually throwing up their employment to come to Paris for engagement in the national workshops. Within six weeks of the opening of the enterprise nothing could be found for the people to do, and in the Parc Monceaux troops of hilarious labourers were to be seen engaged in what was described as merely wheeling away a hill in barrows and then wheeling it back again.

Whether M. Marie had thought the matter out sufficiently far to have arrived at any definite idea of what was likely to happen when he had demonstrated the futility of Socialist methods of reform, there seems to be no evidence to show; but that it was all his doing, and that he was at heart a virulent opponent of Socialism, there can be no reasonable doubt. His right-hand man, Emile Thomas, "rounded" on him and his colleagues in the Provisional Government. "M. Marie," he says, "told me that the prime intention of the Government was to allow this experiment to be accomplished, because they believed only beneficent results could follow, since it would prove to working men the falseness of inapplicable theories, and would show the disastrous consequences it must entail for themselves, and that, thus enlightened as to the future, their idolatry for M. Louis Blanc would crumble down, and that henceforth he must lose all his prestige and strength, and must for ever cease to be dangerous." M. Lamartine, Minister of Foreign Affairs in the Government, and a witness of indisputable weight, says: "M. Marie organised the national workshops with ability, but without result with regard to productive labour. . . . During four months he made of the Ateliers Nationaux, instead of a strength at the mercy of Socialists, a pretorian army, managed by leaders who had the secret assent of the anti-Socialist part of the Government." This pretorian army, says M. Lamartine, certainly scandalised Paris by the uselessness of the work they did, but they protected and saved Paris more than once. "Far from being in the pay of Louis Blanc, as it has been asserted," he declares, "they were inspired by his opponents." The danger of pretorian guards is pretty obvious, and history has shown it; and, of course, there came a time when this cruel and iniquitous political manoeuvre must end. On June 22, in much fear and trembling, the Government decreed that all men under 25 should be excluded from the national workshops, and advised that they should enlist in the army. As might have been anticipated, this was recognised as the beginning of the end, and Paris, with all the idle riffraff of France concentrated within its walls, broke out in insurrection, which after three days of terrible bloodshed, was suppressed by the artillery of Cavaignac. And from that day to this the opponents of Socialism have continued to point to this disastrous prelude to the Second Empire as a conclusive illustration of the folly and futility of Socialist theories, and in denunciation of the mischievous principles of Louis Blanc, whose teaching on many of the great questions of life I have no hesitation in saying was, as far as I know anything of it, not only profoundly religious, but essentially Christian.

GEORGE F. MILLIN.

THE VAN MISSION.

"Is it not a pity to disturb the religious beliefs of people by sending a Unitarian Mission into their midst?" That is the substance of two or three queries which have come to hand from well-wishers who are anxious, however, that the result of this effort shall not be simply to add one more to the many disintegrating forces of our time. It would be idle, of course, to deny that some disturbance of opinion is inevitable—and desirable, unless all our preaching and teaching from the beginning until now has been misconceived. Every good cause is distinctive. It may or may not be good policy to emphasise the distinctions, but it is a denial of faith in one's own Mission to deny these, and a waste of time to minimise their significance. A tradition—a heritage—is also a responsibility, and it involves a very decided belief in the value of our faith. The Mission, therefore, does not suppress any announcement of principle merely because of any fear lest it may disturb the opinion of a third party. It may feel that it is a good thing indeed to be able to disturb some notions. During last week, for instance, in one place our missionaries met with a stormy reception at the hands of people who declared emphatically that they believed in hell fire and damnation, and wanted none of these new-fangled theologies! If it is undesirable to slightly "disintegrate" ideas of that kind when met with, our vans might as well be taken off the road. "Reform by creation," whilst it may stand in the forefront, can never completely exhaust the possibilities of any reform programme. So the Mission has always recognised that it would have to face probable opposition of this old-fashioned kind.

But the primary object of the Mission is not to find out occasions of such warfare. Its expressed aim is "to present the truths and principles of Unitarian Christianity to the people in a free and open manner, without any wish to interfere with, or to disparage the work of existing religious agencies, and to co-operate with them in combating the evils and meeting the social and religious needs of our time." It works for Christianity, or for religion if anyone should feel that the one term interprets a wider experience than the other. And here is the fact. That there are the greater number of men outside the churches, unstirred by their appeal, practically unaffected in the daily life by their doctrines, and in innumerable instances directly at variance with orthodox teaching. The bulk of these men will never touch orthodoxy again. They are out of the churches quite independently of any action of ours. But if some agency should carry a commonsense message to a few of these, rehearsing for them the grounds and principles which are generally accepted in our group of churches, and should to any extent succeed in restoring confidence in religion, the "disturbance" is all to the good, and apparently worthy the prayers and the commendations of all anxious friends. And therein is the work which our missionaries attempt—a statement of religion as affecting the immediate interests and occupations of life, and not necessarily dependent upon the doctrinal teaching of any church or creed.

The Mission has now settled down to the serious work of the campaign, and some magnificent meetings have been held during the last week. No. 4 Van, at Loughborough, and Coalville, has done work equal to the best of last season, and No. 3, at Biggleswade, reports meetings almost as large, despite the fact that no local church was near to render help. The Scotch Van, No. 2, is still among small villages where large audiences cannot be looked for, but three out of seven meetings have had over 100 persons present, and on one occasion the figures rose to 220. The only disappointment is in the story of No. 1 Van, which, with two exceptions, has had particularly small meetings. The gross figures for the week June 17 to 23, however, are wonderfully encouraging, giving a total adult attendance of 10,080, an average for the 35 meetings of 285.

No. 1 Van (lay missionary Mr. A. Barnes). At Huddersfield the missionary, Rev. W. W. Robinson, of Gainsborough, was assisted by Rev. W. Mellor and Mrs. Mellor and Rev. A. C. Smith, of Manchester. Friends of the church helped with the music, and on two evenings there were audiences of over 200. Mr. Robinson's report expresses some doubt as to the prospects of success in the larger towns, but he says: "I think the mission will do good work in the villages. In Slaithwaite I was able to talk to quite a large number of persons and to give literature to the people who seemed likely to benefit by it. I made several friends there, and promised to go and spend two or three days sometime this summer." Rev. J. Ruddle, of Stannington, joined the Van at Mirfield, where he had the assistance of Rev. H. Cross, of Dewsbury. The site, however, proved to have been badly chosen, and a change had to be made before an improvement took place. Mr. Ruddle mentions Socialist and Free Church Council meetings as affecting the attendance, and says of the latter: "They had singers, we had none; they were a united home band, probably stimulated by the thought of possible danger; we were two strangers unknown and unloved." In addition to the evening meetings Mr. Ruddle addressed a few people on Saturday and Sunday afternoons. The Van then moved to Dewsbury, from whence better reports are expected, and is at Ossett over the week-end, moving to Normanton on Monday in charge of Rev. R. McGee, of Blackpool, who has taken the place of Rev. E. C. Jones, of Bradford, who, unfortunately, has not been well enough to fulfil his engagement. Castleford and Pontefract are in the next fixtures.

No. 2 Van (Lay Missioner, Mr. T. Lenny).—The week-end mission at New Cumnock, June 8 and 9, was conducted by Rev. E. T. Russell, of Glasgow, and on the Monday Rev. A. Thornhill, of Carlisle, took charge. Mr. Thornhill writes:—"Just before Tuesday's meeting two men were passing. Seeing the words 'Unitarian Van' they stood mute with amazement. 'What does that mean?' asked one. 'Och, some new form o' heresy,' was the contemptuous answer of the other. Needless to add, the answer formed a text for an exhilarating preface to the evening's lecture. On Friday a move was made to Old Cumnock, the populous mining town further north. Attendance, 120 men and many children. It was delightful here to meet with Mr. Donald, an avowed and well-informed Unitarian, who welcomed us into his house and with his guid wife gave us gracious hospitality." During the past week Rev. J. M. Whiteman has been missionary, following Rev. J. Forrest, of Glasgow, who was present over the week-end, and who comes to the Van on Monday for the month. He will be accompanied by Mrs. Forrest. Mr. Lenny returns to London after rendering useful service during June.

No. 3 Van (Lay Missioner, Mr. Bertram Talbot), after the fine meetings at St. Neots, was taken to Sandy, where the audiences were small. Rev. A. Hurn, of Acton, having left for home, his place was taken by Rev. C. Roper, of Kilburn, chairman of the Van Committee. The van arrived at Biggleswade, and every evening there were large audiences, ranging from 300 to 700 on the Sunday evening, when the service was conducted by Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, of the Garden City. On Friday evening Rev. F. Hankinson, of Kentish Town, was present in Mr. Roper's unavoidable absence. On the Saturday, when the attendance was entered as 300, there were probably 500 present during questions, and some slight uproar was caused by a number of young folk from a neighbouring school. The audiences were sympathetic. On Monday the van travelled to Baldock, and on Thursday to Stevenage, where Rev. W. H. Rose, of Walthamstow, was to officiate, as well as at Hitchin, where it is due to-morrow, and on Thursday at Luton with Mr. Capleton.

No. 4 Van (Lay Missioner, Mr. Charles Barker) has held eleven meetings during the week, dinner hour audiences of about 200 having been present on four occasions. The van reached Coalville from Loughborough on Monday week for three days, but stayed until Sunday last, a meeting without the van being held at Donisthorpe on the Friday. A Thursday's mission was to have been held. The success at Coalville, under the Rev. J. M. Mills, of Bootle, assisted by the Rev. W. H. Burgess, of Loughborough, and T. J. Jenkins, of Hinckley, was so great that it was decided to remain there longer. The largest audience was close upon 1,000, the smallest in the evening 400. The Rev. J. E. Stead, of Mossley, succeeded Mr. Mills, and he was present at Donisthorpe on the Friday night, when the hostility was the keenest that the Mission has so far encountered. The van has been at Swadlincote until Thursday, and is now at Burton, with the intention of moving to-morrow to Lichfield. The Rev. L. Tavener, of Ipswich, who is the week's missionary, will be followed on Thursday at Rugeley, and afterwards at Stafford by the Rev. W. Wilson, of Manchester College, Oxford, and Mr. J. Steel, of Belfast.

OBITUARY.

MR. JOSHUA CROOK.

THE Bank-street congregation, Bolton, has lost one of its oldest members by the death, on June 13, of Mr. Joshua Crook, at the age of seventy-nine. Mr. Crook was head of the firm of Joshua Crook & Sons, cotton spinners and manufacturers, and a younger brother of the late Mr. Joseph Crook, who was Member of Parliament for Bolton from 1852 to 1861. Mr. Joshua took but little part in public life, but he was a lifelong member of Bank-street Chapel, of which he was the oldest surviving trustee, his appointment dating from 1863. His upright and honourable character made him greatly respected by his friends and workpeople, and the funeral on June 17 evinced many proofs of the esteem in which he was held. A special meeting of the trustees of Bank-street was held last week, and a resolution of regret and sympathy with his relatives was unanimously passed. Mr. Crook married a daughter of George Harris, the famous Unitarian minister. He leaves three sons and a daughter—Mr. George Crook, J.P., Mr. Sydney Crook, Councillor Arthur T. Crook, J.P., and Mrs. Robert Heywood.

As pilgrims, we approach the great saints, and commune with them in spirit, killing the distance of time and space. We enter into them, and they into us. In our souls we cherish them, and imbibe their character and principles. They may be made to live and grow in us.—Keshub Chunder Sen.

THEODORE PARKER'S WORKS.

At the Whitsuntide meeting of the American Unitarian Association the following statement as to the new Centenary Edition of the works of Theodore Parker was made by the Rev. John Haynes Holmes :—

In the annual report of the president of this Association for the year 1906 it was stated that "two events of the year in the Publication Department require especial mention"; and of these two events it was specified that the second was "the liberal gift of one of the survivors of the men who personally knew the emancipating force of the life and work of Theodore Parker, which will enable the Association in due time to publish a complete and standard edition of Parker's books. This interesting task has been intrusted to a special editorial board, and it is proposed to make the issue of the new edition lead up to the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of Parker's birth in 1910."

The "special editorial board," to which the president of the Association referred in this last annual report, is composed of Rev. Samuel A. Eliot D.D., chairman; Rev. John Haynes Holmes, secretary; Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Mr. Edwin D. Mead, Mr. Frank Sanborn, Mr. Rufus Leighton, Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham, and Rev. Charles W. Wendte. This board has met three times during the past year, has initiated and supervised a searching and exhaustive examination of the material at hand, and has arranged for the publication of a complete edition of Theodore Parker's works in sixteen volumes. Several of these volumes are now in course of publication, and it is probable that at least five volumes will be issued in the course of the current year, others following from time to time until the set is complete. According to the statement of the chairman of this committee, the volumes to be issued this year include: "A Discourse of Religion," edited by Col. Thomas Wentworth Higginson; "Historic Americans," edited by Dr. Samuel A. Eliot; a collection of Parker's literary essays and papers under the title, "The American Scholar," edited by Mr. George Willis Cooke; a collection of Parker's sermons and essays upon social questions under the title, "The Sins and Safeguards of Society," edited by Rev. Samuel B. Stewart; and a collection of wholly new material never before printed in a volume in this country and now gathered under the title of "The World of Matter and the Spirit of Man," edited by Mr. Cooke. These volumes, as they appear, will be for sale separately, and purchasers can thus buy single copies or full sets as they may desire. A peculiarly interesting detail of the work of the board is the tentative arrangements which have been entered into by the publication agent of the Association for the contemporaneous publication of these books in England, thus securing the international circulation of this Centenary Edition.

To all admirers of Theodore Parker, the Elijah of modern America, it is a source of unspeakable joy that at last the works of this prophet and hero are to be published in an enduring form worthy of his noble memory.

LEGENDS OF THE SAINTS.

VI.—SAINT ZITA.

It is easy to imagine that no one can become a saint unless they do some glorious deed, or conquer some great evil. But people who lead lives of quiet unselfish work, can be just as heroic, and for that reason, I have chosen the story of St. Zita to tell you.

She was very different indeed from some of the other saints. Nearly everyone feels at some time of their life that if they were given a great thing to do, they would be able to do it. But after all, most of us are only given a few very small things to do, and we are not always faithful even over these. It is in this matter of the humbly and faithfully doing of duty that St. Zita is such an example to us all.

She was not of noble birth, like the other saints I have told you about. She was the child of some quiet peasant folk, who lived in a little village near the town of Lucca in Italy, and when she was twelve years old, she went to service like the other girls of her age in the village. She was sent to the house of a nobleman in Lucca, and with these people she stayed her whole life long. At first her work was hard, and often very difficult. She was given all the most tiresome tasks by the other servants, and laughed at for her gentleness and piety, for no matter how early she had to rise in order to do her work, she never failed to rise earlier still so that she might have time to pray. But little by little, as the years passed, the other servants ceased to mock at her, and the people of the house found she was always to be depended on for doing what she was told to do, and for showing every possible kindness that came in her way, and by the time she was grown up, she was the dearly loved and valued friend of all the family and household.

There are very many legends which have gathered round her name. She seems never to have heard of anyone being ill or in distress without going to them at once, carrying her own food, or giving away clothes from her own scanty supply.

"Some one else needs it more than I do!" were words often heard upon her lips.

One legend about her is that one day she went to church, and stayed afterwards dreaming and thinking about God, and how she could best serve Him. As a rule she let nothing interfere with her work, but this time she does appear to have forgotten all about it. On her way home, she suddenly remembered that a batch of bread which should have been already in the oven, had not even been begun. She hastened into her kitchen, grieving over having let her prayers come before her work. To her surprise, the kitchen was filled with the smell of newly baked bread, and there in the oven were the smooth brown loaves, made by an angel who had come down to earth to do Zita's simple work.

Another legend is that one bitterly cold Christmas Eve, she met her master as she was on her way to church. She was not very warmly clad, and he noticed that she was shivering. He said all he could to persuade her to stay at home, but she was very anxious to go, and at last he said: "Well, if you must go, take my fur cloak, but be sure and bring it home again." He wrapped it round her, and she hurried on, warmed and cheered by his kind thought. In the church she noticed a poor beggar with a thin white face, who was shivering terribly with the cold.

"He needs the warmth more than I," she thought, and wrapped the cloak round him as they knelt side by side, meaning to take it again at the close of the service. But when she lifted her head from her prayers, he had vanished, and so had the cloak, and Zita had to go trembling home to meet her master's anger. She was telling him about it, when suddenly a stranger with a beautiful kindly face appeared, in her master's room, with the cloak in his arms. He gave it to her, and thanked her for her kind deed and then vanished away in a blaze of light, leaving them standing, wondering and amazed. The legend says that the door of the church in Lucca where Zita first saw the beggar, has ever since been called, "the Angel's door."

Yet another legend is of how Zita set out one day to make a pilgrimage to a church fifteen miles away beyond Lucca. It took her so long to walk there, that it was dark soon after she had set out to return, and she had to face the thought of ten lonely miles in a dangerous part of the country, where very possibly robbers might be lurking. Some monks that she met tried to stop her, and in a little village that she passed, several people tried to persuade her to stay the night with them. But knowing that if she did so, she would not be able to be at her work in the morning, she steadily refused. As she walked on, she felt some one touch her shoulder, and a woman stood beside her, and asked if she might walk with her. Zita joyfully accepted, and found as they walked that all her weariness had passed miraculously away. When they at length reached the city gates, to her surprise they stood wide open, and turning to thank the woman for her company, Zita found a beautiful angel standing in her place, her guardian angel, who had walked beside her and guarded her from all peril through the night.

Saint Zita lived to be sixty years old, and died peacefully after her busy, happy, unselfish life. She was loved by everyone who knew her, and according to legend, at the very moment that she died, a bright star rose and shone over Lucca, as if to guide and protect the people she had loved and served so well. She was no longer among them, guiding and helping them, but the star was a beautiful symbol of the memory she left behind her.

A church was built in her honour, where the cottage in which she was born had stood, and in Lucca her name has always been held in the greatest reverence. She has been too little known to be a special favourite with artists, but where she has been represented, her emblems are the simple ones that fitly belong to her practical life. She has generally a bunch of keys and a bible, and she sometimes carries loaves of bread, a basket of fruit, or a pitcher.

She is the special patroness of servant girls.

UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

WE had already determined to devote our leading article this week to the summer meeting of the National Conference Union for Social Service, when the sorrowful news of the sudden death of Mr. KIRKMAN GRAY reached us. The President of the Union, the Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, writes of this in another column. We can but echo Mr. WICKSTEED's words: "We must all feel that the best tribute we can at the moment pay to his memory is to give vigour and life to the last piece of work to which he set his hand."

The programme of the meeting, beginning on Monday, July 8, at Manchester College, Oxford, is advertised this week. The first lecture on the Tuesday morning was to have been given by Mr. GRAY, the first of two lectures he had undertaken to deliver on "Social Betterment in Germany." The vacant place on Tuesday will be taken by his intimate friend and neighbour in Garden City, the Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED, who will give a memorial address on Mr. GRAY's life and work. The rest of the programme remains as already published, and the presence of such well-known social workers as Miss CLEMENTINA BLACK, Mr. SEEBOHM ROWNTREE, and Mr. PERCY ALDEN, as well as the President of the Union and the Principal of Manchester College, will not fail, we must hope, to bring together such a company of friends as amply to justify the faith which prompted the holding of this summer meeting. It will be seen that much free time has been left, as Mr. WICKSTEED points out, for unconstrained fellowship and converse, and we have no doubt that as in the case of the Summer Sessions for Sunday-school Teachers, which have already proved so great a success, this fresh opportunity for the gathering together of those who are devoted to a common work and a high ideal will be found to be full of delight and most helpful stimulus. Only let the people come! Let the members of our churches, who realise the vital significance of social service for religion, help, wherever they can, and all they can!

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

THE annual proceedings at the close of the session took place at the college on Tuesday. Two hours in the morning were devoted to the reading of passages of essays and examination papers by the students, and the preaching of sermons in the chapel by Mr. Felix Holt and Mr. Stanley Mellor, two of the leaving students. This was followed by the Visitor's address, given by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, on "Economic Aspects of the Ministry as a Profession."

We do not propose to harrow Mr. Wicksteed's feelings by any attempt to report his address. It was full of matter which should receive the very earnest attention both of ministers and congregations, and we deem it wiser to wait for the publication of the address before calling further attention to it. Only one brief reference we may venture to add here. Mr. Wicksteed said some searching things as to the poverty of ministers and also the poverty of congregations, and how, in spite of this, a true minister will maintain his hold upon the things of the higher life. It needs wisdom and courage, he said. A very poor man may live a very noble life, if he is wise enough to know the things which really matter, and courageous enough to take them, instead of taking the things which people suppose to matter. "Keeping up appearances" is a significant phrase. If he have courage to keep up realities instead, he can live a very rich life on small means.

TRUSTEES' MEETING.

In the afternoon the annual summer meeting of trustees was held in the library, the president, the Right Hon. WILLIAM KENRICK in the chair.

Mr. A. H. WORTHINGTON read the minutes of the annual meeting in January, and the catch words of the resolutions of committee meetings since then. These contained a resolution of special thanks to the Rev. W. Addis, for his services as Warden of the Residence, and his appointment as classical tutor, in addition to his office as Professor of Hebrew. In the charge of the Residence he is now succeeded by the Rev L. P. Jacks. Dr. J. Edwin Odgers is appointed tutor in ecclesiastical history for the coming year, the work during the past session having been in the hands of Mr. Vernon Bartlett, of Mansfield College, with very satisfactory results.

The resolution of grateful acknowledgment to the principal and professors having been passed, on the motion of Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, seconded by Mr. G. H. LEIGH, with words of special welcome to the new principal. Dr. Carpenter acknowledged the vote, and after referring to his experience of what had been a very onerous year, said they were looking forward with great pleasure to the return of Dr. Odgers to work in the college. During the past year they had an exceptionally able body of men, whom it had been a pleasure to teach, and they looked forward with the utmost satisfaction to the service they would render in the future. The resolution of thanks to the visitors, with a special request to Mr. Wicksteed that he would allow his address to be printed, was moved by Mr. JOHN DENDY and seconded by Mr. J. W. SCOTT.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS called attention to a gift to the college, by Miss Gertrude Martineau, recorded in the last annual report, but of which due acknowledgment had not yet been made. This was of three large volumes of transcriptions into long hand of the remaining manuscripts of Dr. Martineau's unpublished sermons, and of a course of lectures on philosophy. There were fifty-nine sermons, and some addresses. They were left by Dr. Martineau in a shorthand which very few people could read, but now in his daughter's transcript, given to the library, were placed within the reach of them all. The transcription of these volumes had been a great labour of love, and they had reason to be very grateful to Miss Martineau for the gift. He moved a resolution of very cordial thanks to her, which was seconded by the Rev. F. K. FREESTON, and passed.

The students then came in, and the president presented certificates to those who had completed their course, and also the prizes and Daniel Jones grants. He referred with satisfaction to the fact that there were seven students leaving, and congratulated them on the work upon which they were about to enter.

Of the seven leaving students, the first four have completed the full three years theological course, and received certificates to that effect. The others, as special students, had been at the college for shorter periods. Mr. Stanley Mellor, B.A., the senior student, is proceeding to Berlin as a Hibbert scholar. Mr. Felix Holt, B.A., goes to Bolton, as assistant to the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, Mr. F. Sinclair, M.A. (who came as a student from New Zealand), is already on his way to Melbourne to succeed the Rev. R. H. Lambley in the charge of the Unitarian church in that city. Mr. W. E. Williams, B.A., is about to settle in the ministry in this country. Mr. J. C. Ballantyne, is taking up the work of the Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel, in succession to the Rev. W. L. Tucker, Mr. R. N. Cross, M.A., also comes to London, as assistant to the Rev. F. K. Freeston, at Essex Church, and the Rev. J. Shaw Brown, who was formerly assistant to Dr. Hunter in Glasgow, has already been welcomed as minister of the Bethlehem Chapel, Newchurch.

Mr. Sinclair gained the Russell Martineau prize for Hebrew, and a new prize for proficiency in Biblical studies, given by Miss Emily Sharpe, whose revered father the late Samuel Sharpe was once president of the College, was divided between Messrs. Rowe, Davis and Ballantyne. Essay prizes were awarded to Messrs. Mellor, Sinclair, Rowe, Ballantyne, Cross, Raffay, and Haldar. Mr. M. Rowe, B.A., will be senior student next session, which opens on Monday, October 14, the students to reassemble on the previous Saturday.

Although seven students have left, the numbers next session will not be less, as two or three external students have graduated, and are coming in for the theological course, and others have been admitted as regular or special students.

A vote of thanks to the President, moved by the Rev. H. E. DOWSON, and seconded by Mr. W. LONG, brought the meeting to a close.

VALEDICTORY SERVICE.

The Valedictory Service for the students leaving college was held in the chapel, in the evening. The devotional part of the service was conducted by the Rev. L. P. JACKS, and the farewell on behalf of the College was given by the PRINCIPAL.

The hour arrives, my friends and brothers in faith and work, said Dr. Carpenter, when you take leave of this College and go forth to the scenes of your future life's calling. I will not ask now what added equipment you carry with you. The intellectual gain of your Oxford days is not to be added up in a few words. The examinations through which you have passed have sufficiently tested the use you have made of the particular studies of this place. Nor will I recall the varied memories of our common Oxford life. You will not forget in future years of toil, sometimes among the unlovely streets of our great cities, that you have sojourned in one of the most interesting centres of English life, that you have rested under the shadow of a great tradition, that you have shared in the education of the men of thought and action of the coming age. You will cherish in after days the recollections of companionship, discussions, eager talks in college rooms, manifold experiences of the river and in the field. You have seen and heard some of the best scholars, the most distinguished preachers, the most eminent statesmen of our land. All these influences have streamed in upon you. Of what value have they been to you? Have they weakened or strengthened the central purpose of your life? When you look back on those early years when you first felt the stirrings of high desire or perhaps realised in some lofty moment that vows were made for you, and that you too were dedicated spirits, are you conscious of the enrichment or the decline of your ideals? Is your faith fuller, your hope clearer, your love deeper? Then we can indeed bid you farewell, not without the natural regrets at the severance of cherished ties, but with a cheerful confidence that this College has ministered to your best aims. It has not only opened to you avenues of knowledge, provided you with the method of learning; it has done more than supply a fundamental religious interpretation of the world of man and nature and life, it has been in some measure the channel to you of the grace of God. Through our fellow-work in the class-room, and the chapel, through your own mutual influences for good upon each other, through the hours of intense concentration of purpose which many of you have known, in the solitude of your own chamber as you wrestled for some great truth,—through all this the Spirit of the Father has been widening your thought, and confirming your resolve, and preparing you to endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ.

And now this hour is for most of you like no other hour to which the future will call you. You may again and again change the scene or even the scope of your labours. You may pass from one place, it may even be from one chosen occupation to another. But to-night you quit the ordered and disciplined life of the student for the full self-direction of responsible service. In such an hour you may be already tempted to vain regrets, the remembrance of unused opportunities, of neglected duties—and the very best, nay, all the more the best of students have such memories that may stir compunction—and you may be engaged with fruitless retrospect, which often visits the minister with more passionate regret, concerning what you would do, if you could have your academic years over again. It is a bootless question. Think rather that you are going to make a fresh beginning now, summoned into the mystery and joy of creation, with the unspoiled future under your hands. God calls you to work with Him in the spiritual ordering of yourselves and of the world. Need I remind you that this part of your education, the training of mind, heart, conscience and soul, as fit sons of God, is the most important of all, and never stops. Examinations are ended, but only that you may be exposed to the severer and continuous tests of life.

Of these, in this parting moment, I will name but one. You will be confronted with many new problems—among them, how to use the knowledge you have acquired here for the benefit of others. You will be under the danger of substituting practical ends for ideal pursuits. Economy of time and labour will force the preacher to be satisfied with just enough knowledge for the theme he takes in hand. In the extraordinary widening of the range of demand on the modern preacher, he is practically expected to know something of everything. Resolve to meet this peril of intellectual dispersion by knowing also within reasonable limits everything of something. Keep your hands upon some bit of study to be pursued for its own sake. You will find it a safeguard against those temptations to indolence which beset even the most strenuous spirit. It will be consolation in seasons of anxiety and care, a relief of that overstrained sympathy, which is one of the most serious trials of a minister's life.

Having then addressed a personal word to each of the seven students, Dr. Carpenter commended them to God, with the prayer that the good hand of His sustaining strength might go with them, and His blessing be with them to guide and strengthen them in work and joy.

WELCOME INTO THE MINISTRY.

The Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS, of Nottingham, then gave the welcome into the ministry. He congratulated his brothers on entering upon their life work, and urged them as "apostles to the Gentiles" to magnify their office. Even as a monk gave himself to a great ideal, and a knight vowed himself to the order of chivalry, so they without reservation must give themselves to that ministry. And he proceeded:—

We ministers are not monks, we are to be in the world; we cannot help being also in our measure of the world; and yet—and yet—we are truly set "apart," if only in the commonplace sense, that every distinctive vocation is a sharply definite specialisation of function, the deliberate acceptance of a well-marked division of labour within the sphere of a common social service. It is not necessary to say anything within these college walls in vindication of the truth of the universal priesthood of all Christians. It would be gratuitous to insist that laymen as well as ministers must render spiritual sacrifices unto God, and are a royal priesthood, a holy nation, in which every constituent individual is a mediator, a revealer of God to his fellow-men, an organ of service and of love. But it may be well to-day to remind ourselves that the great affirmation of the Universal Priesthood is at least an affirmation—meaning that we are all priests, and not a sterile negation meaning that there are no priests at all. For the truer truth in this matter is that our faith knows no believer who is not a priest—a sacrificer, a mediator, a revealer, a servant. There is ever operative a pernicious tendency to turn the grandest universal truths into particular errors. To take what may seem trivial examples, we say that all times are sacred, that Monday is as holy as Sunday, but we end too often in the practical conviction that Sunday is as secular as Monday; we say truly that all places are sacred, that therefore the factory is as holy as the house of prayer, but many end in a conduct that shows what they really mean is that the church is only as the factory. We say quite rightly that all honourable and serviceable vocations have their place in the Universal Priesthood, but men too often acquiesce in the view not that the merchant's office ought to be as spiritual as the priest's but that the priest's is as worldly as the merchant's. In ways like these universal affirmations not merely escape into the vague and the void, but are transformed into precise and particular negations.

Yes, truly, we are all called to live the Christian life; we are all called to worship, to pray, to praise, to meditate, to reveal, to serve; but we are not all called to take precisely the same part. In one spirit there must be diversities of operation. The needs of the community classify us and set men apart—some merchants, some statesmen, some teachers, some lawyers, some ministers—and if ministers, let us give ourselves to our ministry, and bind ourselves to it with pledges that cannot be broken. Religion requires its special organisations and its special representatives—be they scribes, pastors, or prophets. The functions of worship demand men of special aptitude and training, who shall have, or shall be provided with leisure to devote themselves, as others are not free to devote themselves, to this particular calling in a particular way. Even the Society of Friends objects not to the ministry, but to the salaried ministry. We may, indeed, apply to ministry in general what a French writer said of voluntary celibacy: "It is evident that this state cannot be chosen by some except on condition of its not being chosen by all." (Rashdall, Good and Evil II., 136.) May you, then, be of those who will not pay any false or flattering compliments to what is called "the world"; never suffer its conventional or customary belittling of your calling to lower in your own sight its significance or its sanctity. Rather magnify your office and glorify your ministry. At the risk of being misunderstood be, and courageously, consistently, uncompromisingly claim to be what you really are—men set apart in a special way for special functions, within the defined sphere of organised religion. Claim this firmly and always, only claim it not vainly as those who would have dominion over the faith of men, but humbly as true helpers of their joy.

And this view of your work is an exacting self-committal not merely to a theory, but to a character. As the office is indeed great, so the men who enter it must be great at least in a sincere aspiration and effort to prove worthy of their calling. Our vocation is no pompous ecclesiastical panoply to cover defects in ministerial character. If anything can avail to bring this office of ours into shame and ridicule in the sight of men it is a swollen insistence on its high dignity when we ourselves are careless of its high demands. To remind men of the deference due to the ministry is indeed not wholly unnecessary—especially in our liberal churches; but the reminder comes with greater force when made (I fear that it seldom is made) by loyal laymen on our behalf. We have to beware lest the plea of the dignity of our vocation should become the last refuge of ministerial incompetence. This vocation cannot ennoble or sanctify a worldling; and if we are ourselves even approximately worthy of it, if we are among men as those who serve, we may with some safety trust that the vocation will take care of itself and be duly respected.

From whatever side we look, then, there is something extraordinarily impressive, something morally and spiritually uplifting, something that should appeal to the imagination and idealism of men in this thought of a special order of persons, in a special degree removed from the ordinary economic competitions of the market-place; removed, too, from the ordinary ambitions and enterprises of the world—an order of persons stripped of much lumbering baggage that they may be in better athletic and fighting trim, more vigorous, alert, independent persons devoted exclusively and directly to the divinest ends of life, with great zeal for God's glory, for the honour of Christ our Lord, and for the salvation of the people—"an order of persons, a voluntary moral nobility who concentrate and specialise on this single task, and solemnly vow to themselves and to their God, 'This one thing I do.'"

This may not be the popular conception of the ministry even among ministers themselves. It is certainly the view which the secularistic temper loves to caricature and to ridicule. But this is due to no defect in the ideal, but rather to the poor realisation of that ideal by us who are utterly pledged and vowed to it. Of this I am absolutely certain that the cure for a false and artificial sacerdotalism is to be found not in sinking our ideal of the ministry, not in the cheap and contemptible estimates of it now so current among Nonconformists, but rather in a higher and more thorough theory, and especially in a higher and more thorough, more disciplined, and more austere practice.

Into the order of the ministry, then, you are now about to enter, and I congratulate you on an inviting and stirring prospect. You begin your career at a great crisis in the history of Christianity. You start at the breaking point between the old and the new, at the growing point of what I believe will prove a fresh variation in the ever-living development of religion. The world toward which you now set your forces is flushed with fresh hopes and wild expectancies. The new wine of life is in a ferment, and there is everywhere a bursting of old wineskins. In ecclesiastical life the sectarian and schismatical forces are either exhausted, or have run to mere licence and anarchy. We see, as in Scotland, vast movements towards union in a simpler creed. In Romanism we have the heroic efforts of a brave band of liberal Catholics. In Anglicanism we see a church contention—tossed with many struggles, and among them a struggle for creed revision and greater comprehension. In Nonconformity we have the sensational appearance of an open break with traditional dogma. Nor is it only in the ecclesiastical world that there is this turmoil and travail, for the more distinctly intellectual world philosophy feels the breath of coming change. Here, in Oxford, you have the revolt of Personal Idealism and of Humanism. There, in America, Professor James prophesies that in Pragmatism we have a movement (his critics would prefer to say a commotion) which he can only compare for significance with the Protestant Reformation. In natural science we have a chastened, a wondering, if not yet believing, tone—a tip-toe waiting for mysteries and for marvels. In social life we hear the ringing notes of juster order bringing glad tidings to the masses and democracies of all countries. In however restrained and prosaic mood we contemplate these things we must all feel that it is an exciting time in which to be alive—a thrilling time for those who are called to a free and undogmatic ministry.

It is not for me to presume to offer you texts and sermons. You will have your own message to this wonderful age. From whatever sources of inspiration you derive that message, it must, before it can be a message at all, have been thoroughly appropriated by you and made your own. Yet suffer me to say that this quickening age will also have its own message for you. It will tell you that it has no ear for the timid and undecided; it will demand of you that you shall commit yourself body and soul to hazards and to risks; it will challenge you to fight not merely on ground not of your own choosing, but on territories that admit of no retreat. It will listen not to your doubts and hesitations but to your convictions. In that sense it will ask for a certain finality and absolutism. It has no use for compromisers, time-servers, or the exponents of mere sects. It will command you to bring life to touch life, and not to make a decorated display of the leavings and refuse of extinct controversies. Precisely because you are men "set apart," a privileged order largely protected from the organised boycott of parties, it will expect that you, at any rate, you, whoever else may fail, shall proclaim aloud in utter scorn of consequence those unpalatable and revolutionary truths which other lips tremble to speak. Minorities, no less than majorities, will seek in you their champions. This big, compromising, cowardly world which is always showing us its kingdoms and all the glory thereof, will yet expect of you what it has so often failed to get from others, not earnestness alone, not enticing eloquence merely, not scholarship and cleverness, not brilliance and originality; these things by themselves are too cheap—but the absolute pitch, the bell note of intellectual and moral integrity. When you shrink from these sacrifices then it will be this very same "world" (and precisely because of its poverty and dire need) that will hold before your eyes the Cross and all its anguish.

Who is sufficient for these things? Who indeed, if his sufficiency be not of God! Yet given that we are more than conquerors—and who can fail?

Do you remember that first interview between Murray Edwardes and Robert Elsmere? They had talked long and earnestly, and at last Edwardes looked at Elsmere with eyes of bright decision: "You cannot work with the Church (of England)!" he said. (There may be some here who can, but he was speaking, remember, to Robert Elsmere.) "It is impossible. You will only wear yourself out in efforts to restrain what you could do infinitely more good as things stand now by pouring out. Come to us! I will put you in the way. . . . Come . . . there is no other opening like it in England just now for men of your way of thinking and of mine. Come! Who knows what we may be putting our hands to—what fruit may grow from the smallest seed?"

The two men stopped. Robert gathered that in this soul, too, there had risen the same large, intoxicating dream of a reorganised Christendom, a new wide-spreading shelter of faith.

"I will," he said briefly, after a pause, his own look kindling. "It is the opening I have been pining for; I will give you all I can and bless you for the chance."

Murray Edwardes is still alive; his invitation is still in our ears. From the great towns, from the slums, from the abyss of doubt, from the baffled and broken, from hungering hearts, from thirsting minds, in country and city, blending with the sad refrain of lonely and discouraged humanity, blending, too, with its triumphant passions, and all its songs of promise, his voice cries: "Come to us! Come! There is no opening like it in England!"

It is in the name of that great call that I bid you, my comrades, welcome; and with the old words of romance and of knighthood I pray:

"God give you joy and good adventure."

THE EASTERN UNION.

THE annual meetings of the Eastern Union of Unitarian and other Free Christian Churches have been of exceptional interest this year, owing to the presence of the Rev. Joseph Wood, President of the National Conference, and Mr. John Harrison. On Thursday, June 13, Mr. Wood visited Bury St. Edmunds, and the little band who have gathered round the newly appointed minister, the Rev. J. M. Connell, were greatly cheered by his words. On Friday, the 14th, Mr. Wood was at Bedfield, addressing the villagers of the district. Sunday morning found a congregation of about 200 adults in the Friars-street Chapel, Ipswich, to listen to Mr. Wood. After a ride of forty miles to Norwich by motor-car, he preached in the evening in the Octagon Chapel on "The New Theology and the Old Religion" to upwards of 400 people. On Monday he visited and preached at Yarmouth, and on Tuesday the members of Octagon Guild of Service met in full numbers and heard a stimulating address on "Character." The tour has been a great success, and promises to be fruitful in permanent results. All the ministers of the district feel deeply grateful to Mr. Wood for the excellent service he has rendered.

On Wednesday evening a religious service was conducted in the Octagon Chapel, Norwich, by the Rev. J. M. Connell, of Bury St. Edmunds. The Annual Sermon of the Eastern Union was preached by the Rev. Joseph Wood, who took as his subject, "The Privileges and Duties of Liberal Religious Thinkers."

The Business Meeting was held in the Octagon Chapel on Thursday, the 20th inst. Mr. W. H. Scott presided, and Mr. James Mottram offered a hearty welcome to the visitors, and this was responded to by the Rev. J. M. Connell and Mr. Rump.

Rev. Alfred Hall read the report of the Executive Committee. During the past year there had been in the Eastern Counties revived interest in the religious faith of the Free Churches. The discussion and inquiry aroused by the "New Theology" affected the Eastern Counties, and the ministers in the Union were not slow to deal with the various questions raised. Some of the Churches had to report that the congregations had increased in numbers, and one important change was that there seemed to be a tendency to listen, both in private and in public, to Unitarians' own statements of their principles, instead of taking the mis-statements of well-intentioned but ill-informed orthodox preachers. There were signs that not only in the Eastern Counties, but all over the country, they were about to have the hearing for which they had waited so long. When that time came, the committee were convinced that the faith they held would commend itself to the reason and conscience of those who desired to hold the truth with reverence. The committee went on to mention in detail the special events of the year, which included the laying of the foundation-stone of the Martineau Memorial at Norwich. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association had not only given help to some of the churches, but had again generously granted funds for advertising special services. The money had been well used, and the results had been good. The work of the Postal Mission had been very successful, and the committee had again to thank Miss S. S. Dowson for her labours. The demand for the literature of the Unitarian Church was increasing. It had long been felt that one of the greatest needs was efficient lay help, and the committee hoped during the coming year a Lay Preachers' Union would be formed, which would not only help the smaller churches, but occasionally set the ministers free for other work. Already some young men were doing good work in this direction. In conclusion, the committee urged the importance of there being a Sunday School Union in connection with the district. Mr. Hall, on behalf of Miss Dowson, also read the report of the Eastern Union Postal Mission, in which it was stated that there were only 95 new applicants for literature from 76 places; 260 letters were received, and 368 sent out; 35 books were lent, and 906 tracts were distributed.

The reports were adopted on the motion of Mr. Rodgers, seconded by Mr. Waller.

Rev. J. Birks proposed that an Eastern Sunday School Association be formed, and that the Secretary of the Eastern Union be asked to take steps to that end.

Rev. L. Tavener, in seconding the motion, said if there was to be any hope for their work in the future, it must be in the direction of the Sunday School, and they ought not to allow any of their Sunday Schools to be isolated.

Mr. Panchen moved, and Mr. Scopes seconded, that the best thanks of the Eastern Union be given to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for their generous support. This was spoken to by several of those present, all of whom pleaded for larger subscriptions to the Association, which had given very substantial financial assistance locally.

A vote of thanks to the secretary and treasurer concluded the business.

Luncheon was afterwards served at the Unitarian Institute, and subsequently places of interest in the city were visited.

EVENING MEETING.

Early in the evening Mr. John Harrison, of London, gave an organ recital, and this was followed by a conference, presided over by Mr. W. H. Scott, at which the Rev. John Birks, of Yarmouth, read a paper on "The Condition of our Churches in Relation to the Supply of Ministers." He said it was a general complaint that the sons of earnest and prominent Unitarians did not enter the ministry. Discussing the causes of the dearth of students for the ministry, he said certainly there was room for improvement in the financial inducements offered, and every step taken to remove financial obstacles from the path of candidates for the ministry should be taken; but he believed the strength of their faith was the most important element in the conditions which determined their success or failure as ministers or as churches.

In the course of the discussion which followed, Mr. John Harrison said that he wished it to be clearly understood that he was speaking as a layman to laymen, and the question he would ask was, "Do we realise our responsibility as laymen to our ministers?" It was sometimes urged that other claims were numerous. That was no answer to this question. It was an unfair shelving of the matter, a shirking of their responsibility. Could any one of them assert that the inducements their ministry offered were calculated to attract the right kind of man to their pulpits? After their ministers had received an expensive training, all they offered them, in most cases, was the stipend paid to a second-rate clerk in a commercial house. And the minister, out of his slender means, was expected to keep up appearances and to incur expenses which, under no circumstances, could be demanded from a clerk. He could speak with knowledge on this subject, for he himself was the son of a minister, and from his earliest years it had been of the deepest concern to him. What was to be the remedy? He did not profess to be able to answer that question fully. But one thing, certainly, was needed—greater earnestness and liberality on the part of the members of our churches. It must be confessed that many of our laymen were not fully alive to the seriousness of their responsibility, and it ought not to be a matter of surprise if some of their ministers should find their financial burdens heavier than they could bear. The subscriptions, in many cases, fell far below what they should be. Sometimes their members gave less to their churches than they spent on some short outing. The matter was an urgent one—an urgent one for every member of every chapel. That was the reason why he had readily responded to the invitation of the National Conference Committee to visit the churches with Mr. Wood.

The Rev. Joseph Wood said the church that could not raise its own ministry was a doomed church. He did not say Unitarians would not always welcome and find place for men who had been trained in other churches. The Unitarian Church would be very badly off if it were not for the outsiders who had come in in the last thirty years. The Unitarian Church had been very much indebted for life, and spirit, and inspiration, and fire, to the men who had come in from the outside, and he did not want to see the door closed. Still, it was their duty to raise their own ministry. There were three minor reasons which prevented suitable young men from entering the Unitarian ministry—(1) inadequacy of stipend, (2) insecurity of tenure, and (3) the position very often given to the minister, which was lower and less looked up to than the position of the minister of any other church in England. There were some deeper reasons. There was a feeling in the hearts of many young men that in these modern days they could better serve their generation as laymen than as ministers, there being so many opportunities for public service of all kinds. He believed the gist of the matter was, as stated by Mr. Birks, the inadequacy of their church life, the poverty of the church idea amongst them, he was going to say almost the absence of the true church idea amongst them. If they were really a church, if the whole of these little communities were federated into a church holding up each other's hands, bound to one another by all sorts of ties, and by moral and spiritual considerations, if the church idea prevailed amongst them instead of what he might call the audience idea, he believed the difficulty would disappear.

Mr. W. H. Scott presided also over a public meeting held later in the evening, when a cordial vote of thanks was passed to the Rev. Joseph Wood and Mr. John Harrison, and a paper on "The Church in Relation to Social Service" was read by Mr. G. A. King, followed by discussion.

WISDOM doth live with children round her knees;
Books, leisure, perfect freedom, and the talk
Man holds with week-day men in the hourly walk
Of the mind's business.—Wordsworth.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCA- SHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

THERE was a very large attendance at the meeting of the Assembly at the Brookfield Church, Gorton, on Wednesday, June 19. The service in the morning was conducted by the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, of Liverpool, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. John Moore, of Hindley, his subject being "Man's Place in Creation."

The President, Mr. Richard Robinson, took the chair at the afternoon meeting, and after roll call gave an address. They all desired, he said, to add their protest to that which had been heard throughout Europe against the unspeakable horrors perpetrated under the despotism of the Congo State. As to religious education, in that assembly they believed in its paramount necessity for themselves and for their children as firmly as any Roman or Anglican. They therefore sympathised with and admired the steadfast adherence to that which others believed of vital importance. The attempt, however, to find a formula of religious education acceptable to everyone had failed, as it was bound to fail. It had been omitted, perhaps, to notice that they did not obtain simplicity merely by excision. Even a "catechism" by a man of science could not be described as the shortest or even as "a shorter catechism." Religious education made greatest progress when left to the exertions of those who felt the need. He welcomed the secular solution in this controversy.

PUBLIC QUESTIONS.

The Rev. H. E. DOWSON, presented the report on public questions. (For the following summary we are indebted to the Manchester Guardian.) The report dealt first with education and the course of Mr. Birrell's Education Bill. Referring to the concessions offered by the Government, the Committee expressed the hope that there would be no further attempt to reconcile irreconcilables. "The Committee look to another policy in future legislation. What is required is a measure to take the education of the nation's children entirely out of the hands of ecclesiastics as such, rates and taxes no longer to be spent in the interests of the churches, but in those of the entire community. What are wanted are citizen schools, in which the money drawn from the people shall be expended on that on which they all agree, and not on that on which they differ. What are wanted are schools by which the great body of Nonconformists, whose vital principle is the separation of Church and State, shall not be aggrieved, but in which the nation shall do its own business of preparing its children to be good citizens, while it is left to the churches to do theirs." The Committee thought that in no matter during the education controversy had more fallacious argument been heard than in relation to the wishes of the parents. "They rarely demand," said the Committee, "for their children schools with ecclesiastical atmospheres under the domination of priests and clerics. Those who have had practical experience in school management know that the demand is mainly clerical. Parents left to themselves, select schools for their children and move them from school to school for any other reason than sectarian preferences. They want their children to be trained for the work and the duties of life, and that is what the nation wants and what the nation alone should pay for. The religious culture of the young is the most sacred responsibility, first of the father and mother in the home, and second of the churches to which they belong; and nothing will give new life to religion so much as the fulfilment of this joint responsibility by those on whom it rests. Religion born in the home is the strongest influence in life, and churches have only to organise a religious teaching far more efficient than they have ever given to gain and keep their hold on the youth of the nation as they have never done before."

Among necessary reforms the Committee placed the establishment of national unsectarian training colleges for the teachers of the citizen schools of the future, to become members of a profession freed from sectarian limitations, and taking a higher place than ever as one of the finest assets of the national life.

Protection of Children.

The subject of the protection of children was also dealt with in the report. The "terrible condition of child life and child death" in our great towns was declared to be shocking. It would be still more shocking if the Christian churches allowed it to go on. The Committee thought the time had arrived for more definite action to be taken, and that at any rate in Lancashire and Cheshire the awful facts must be grappled with and people appealed to for the carrying out of the most needed remedies. Referring to the suffering and mortality among illegitimate children, the Committee said the infants and their mothers must be treated in a more humane spirit. A more effective law of affiliation was needed. In New Zealand and South Australia, where such a law had been in force for some time, the cases of illegitimacy had been reduced by about half. The report recommended instruction in schools regarding the disastrous effects of intoxicants. The Committee also noted with pleasure the recent steps taken for feeding hungry school children, and trusted Lord R. Cecil's Bill for the earlier registration of births might soon become law. In spite of recent legislation, the deliverance of children from overwork was, it was regretfully remarked, still a long way off.

THE COWPER-TEMPLE CLAUSE.

The Rev. CHARLES TRAVERS (Preston), who moved the reception of the report, declared that there was only one solution of the education question possible, and that was the secular solution. "If," he said, "there is a man or a woman in this audience who at this moment requires convincing, he or she has been living in cloudland for the last 20 years and has not observed the trend of events and the forces accumulating, especially during the last two years. I am well aware some of you are afraid of the word 'secular.' I am a secular educationist under compulsion. I do not like the secular solution. I do not think it is adequate, but we are driven to it owing to the blindness and the folly of contending sects." Relating circumstances which had arisen at Preston, he said that, according to a letter from Mr. M'Kenna, it had appeared that even supposing a religious syllabus were against the law of the country, since the repeal of section 16 of the Act of 1870 by the Act of 1902, the Board of Education had no power to interfere in any violation of the Cowper-Temple clause, whatever the local authority might do. In a later communication he said, though not so clearly as some of them could have liked, that the Cowper-Temple clause might be put in force by the Board of Education. That statement, however, Mr. Travers claimed, had only been wrung out of the Board of Education by an agitation which Mr. M'Kenna, or rather Mr. Morant, had never expected to find.

The resolution was seconded by the Rev. DENDY AGATE and passed.

The Rev. H. E. DOWSON proposed a resolution in the following terms:—"That, having regard to the principle on which alone a truly national system of education can be based, this assembly is of opinion that the vain attempt at compromise in the Bill of 1906 should give place to a measure throwing the entire responsibility for the religious instruction of the children upon the parents and the churches, while confining the State to its proper function of educating its young as citizens equipped for public and private duty."

The Rev. A. W. Fox seconded the resolution, and it was adopted.

A report on mission work in the province was also presented and the Rev. William Harrison was elected President. An invitation to meet next year at Stockport was accepted.

The Rev. CHARLES PEACH moved, and the Rev. H. D. ROBERTS seconded, the following resolution:—

"That this assembly notes with deep concern the signs of widespread unrest in India, and, reaffirming its ancient principles of civil and religious liberty the world over, calls upon the Government to meet the present discontent in India by the speedy introduction of some substantial instalment of that principle of representative government which has made the rest of the Empire loyal, contented, and strong."

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, in view of the small time at disposal for the discussion of the subject, said that for the sake of justice to a great question he would move "the previous question," and this was carried.

EVENING MEETING.

The church was well filled again at the evening meeting. After the opening hymn the retiring President thanked the Gorton friends for the entertainment provided, and the Rev. G. Evans responded.

The chairman, Mr. GEO. DANIELS, in the opening address recalled the last visit of the assembly to Gorton, 31 years ago. Except that Mr. Dowson was Secretary then as now, everything had changed. Still the congregational life at Gorton went on as actively as ever, and they loved their church with the same devotion as of old. It was this love and loyalty which remained constant in a changing world, and the principle of freedom in the church afforded room for its growth. As the faithful guardian of this great tradition of Freedom in inquiry and worship he welcomed the assembly.

The Rev. H. E. Dowson spoke on the church and social questions. It was, he held, first necessary to realise that the Kingdom of peace must be established within, and then from that sanctuary of power they could go forth with a principle that would renew the face of the earth. He was glad the new theology had its feet on mother earth. The social sympathies of the churches must grow until equality of opportunity was secured for all men, but the control of men's lives must not be taken out of their own hands. He thought the churches would be wise if they would do as much as was possible in common and as little as was absolutely necessary in isolation.

Mr. JOHN HEYS, of Longsight, spoke on the need of fuller life in our churches. He said our great need was that of great preachers. He feared we made preaching secondary to scholarship and literature. Not that he despised scholarship or anything which would adorn God's service, but he grudged the way our preachers became either professors or editors. Without the prophetic word they could not hope to touch the souls of men.

The Rev. G. E. EVANS, of Dukinfield, spoke on "Our Great Opportunity." He uttered a warning against a perilous self-satisfaction with things as they are in our churches. The great opportunity of the churches was in their openness as seekers after truth by means of which they could gain vital convictions. What men wanted now was not the compulsion of dogma, but openness of mind and the spirit of earnest seeking for truth. But their churches would never exert their real power, or rise to their opportunity, unless their members were themselves faithful; and he concluded with a strong appeal for greater fidelity in the attendance at public worship.

ASSOCIATION OF IRISH NON-SUBSCRIBING PRESBYTERIANS.

THE annual meetings were held in the First Church, Rosemary-street, Belfast, on Tuesday and Wednesday, June 18 and 19. On Tuesday evening Divine Service was held, when the retiring President, the Rev. W. H. Drummond, preached from Psalm cxxvi., on the call of a new opportunity.

A special meeting of ministers and congregational representatives was held on Wednesday morning, to consider the scheme for the re-organisation of the constituent bodies of the Association, with a view to their amalgamation in one united Church body. The adoption of the scheme was moved by the President.

Dr. JOHN CAMPBELL, in seconding the resolution, said:—

From the historical standpoint the present occasion is one of interest and importance. Many of our congregations are old Presbyterian foundations dating back to the early days of the Plantation of Ulster. To the superficial observer it may seem strange that these congregations are now non-subscribing, and have always been dominated by a spirit antagonistic to the compulsory acceptance of human opinion in the shape of creed; but there is nothing remarkable in the fact. It is a natural sequence of events. These congregations were founded by men who had been reared under the influence of the old Scottish Confession of Faith. Of this Confession it has been truly said by the Principal of the United Free Church College in Glasgow (Dr. T. M. Lindsay)—"Drawn up in haste by a small number of theologians, it is more sympathetic and human than most creeds, and has commended itself to many who object to the impersonal logic of the Westminster Confession." We are to-day an echo of that ancient "Confession of Faith of Doctrine, believed and professed by the Protestants of Scotland," which, "under the title Confession Scoticana, remained the symbol of the Church of Scotland during the first stormy century of its existence," and, "though it was displaced by the Westminster Confession in 1647, continued authoritative long after that date." To the "sympathetic and human" influence of that ancient Confession we in large measure owe our non-subscription. When looked at from the philanthropic point of view the fact that we are here to-day assembled for the purpose of federating our congregations assumes an importance which it is hard to realise. It opens up to us the possibility of effectually and systematically doing a vast mission work among the poor, both in town and country. Federation will enable us to look after the orphans, the widows, the infirm, and the aged in an effective manner. By means of funds common to the whole Church the rich are enabled to help the poor, and the wealthier congregations are given a means whereby they can assist the poorer congregations in philanthropic denominational work. But by far the most important benefit which we may derive from our adoption of this resolution is the prominence which will thereby be given to the moral and spiritual improvement of ourselves. We are non-subscribers to human creeds and confessions, but we are so because we desire to accentuate the fact of our adherence to the creed of Christ. This has always been the fundamental principle of non-subscription. This positive affirmation which underlies our negative designation is the important factor in our existence as a denomination. Hitherto it has been recognised as an unwritten statement only. To-day we are about to solemnly declare our attachment to it as the central point round which our congregations gather themselves into a Church. One of the minor historians of Irish Presbyterianism has recently pointed out that "in the early days of Christianity the question of personal purity engaged the attention of the elders more than the doctrines of a creed." We have always desired to uphold this position as the essential one for the Christian Church. To-day we are about to declare our opinion that "unity is to be sought, not in uniformity of creed, but in a common standard of righteousness and obedience to the commandments which Christ Himself has laid down." The fact that we have publicly declared our allegiance to this principle in religious organisation is bound to have good effect on our people. A high ideal may be hard to attain, but the very fact that we have it in view will stimulate us and make us capable of doing better than we otherwise would.

The meeting was pervaded by a fine spirit of union and enthusiasm, and the resolution was unanimously adopted.

At the business meeting of the Association in the afternoon, the Rev. W. H. Drummond was re-elected President, on the motion of Principal Gordon, who said that Mr. Drummond had grasped all the details of the forthcoming reorganisation, and had done good services at their meeting in the morning in steering the business to a successful and practically unanimous conclusion.

At the annual dinner of the Association, Principal GORDON proposed "The Non-Subscribing Association and the Future of our Church." He said that might be described as their charter toast. It might be thought that the work of that day prognosticated that the Association was to be destroyed. He did not look at it in that light. The Association was going into a chrysalis, and was going to emerge thence with new wings, fairer colours, and more activity. It was now 72 years old. The different bodies of the Association were in a way proving themselves to be all of one mind. There were occasions in times past when the Association was a bond of disunion, but they had shown that day how remarkably, how amicably, they could agree, and that augured well for the future of what they might now be privileged to call their Church. Again and again the expression had been used that day "our Churches," and that indicated that hitherto they had not all been united in one common organisation. It had been a matter of regret that in a body so small as theirs, while internally substantially the same principles animated the members, yet they had been held aloof by small separations and divisions. The days in which they lived made a distinct call upon them—a call for more religious life within their own borders and not for more active enunciation of their theological opinions.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning, at latest.]

APPEAL.

London: George's-row Mission.—The Rev. F. Summers writes from the Domestic Mission, George's-row, St. Luke's, E.C.:—"Would you kindly allow me to appeal for help to enable me to provide for the annual Sunday-school excursion? It is greatly needed. The children pay part."

Belfast: Mountpottinger.—The annual floral services in connection with the Sunday-school were held on Sunday, June 23, conducted in the morning by the resident minister, Rev. Joseph Worthington, and in the evening by the Rev. H. J. Rossington, the newly appointed minister at Rosemary-street Church. Special hymns and solos were sung, and the collections were very satisfactory.

Bolton: Bank-street.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held last Sunday, when morning and evening the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, of Wandsworth, preached to large and appreciative congregations. The afternoon service was conducted by the Rev. A. Le Marchant, of Mawdsley-street Chapel, who gave a short address to the children, followed by an inspiring sermon. The anthems at all services were admirably rendered, and special hymns were sung by the children. The collections were highly satisfactory, amounting to £111 2s. 6d., an increase of £18 over last year.

Bolton District Sunday-school Union.—A very successful and interesting ramble through Longworth Clough to Walsley took place on Saturday, June 22, conducted by Mr. W. W. Midgley of Bolton. About 140 assembled in the school-room for tea, after which Mr. Midgley gave an instructive and enjoyable address, descriptive of the physical features of the country traversed in the ramble. The Rev. Peter Holt, president of the Union, occupied the chair, and in the name of the Union, and on behalf of those present, very cordially thanked Mr. Midgley for his kindly service.

Exeter.—The annual Assembly of West of England Presbyterian Divines met at George's Chapel on Wednesday, June 19. The Rev. A. Lancaster, of Moretonhampstead, and the Rev. A. E. O'Connor, of Torquay, were elected to the offices of moderator and scribe respectively. On the same day the Devon ministers held their annual conference, at which a paper was read by the Rev. E. Betham, of Exeter, on "The Real Jesus and the Ideal Christ." In the afternoon the congregation met the ministers at a social gathering in the lecture-room.

London: Highgate.—Last Saturday, June 22, the Band of Hope took part in the United Demonstration of Junior Temperance Societies, organised by the London United Temperance Council, in Finsbury Park, and were successful in gaining the prize in the Amateur Banner Making Competition. The banner was tastefully designed by Mr. Geo. S. S. Cooper, hand embroidered in two shades of green and three of yellow on a ground of dark blue by several members of the band, and finished by a beautiful cord and fringe in the same shades, the generous gift of Mr. F. Withall.

Rochdale (Appointment).—The Rev. John Evans, B.A., of Colne, has accepted a unanimous invitation to the ministry of the Blackwater-street Church, in succession to the Rev. T. P. Spedding.

Shrewsbury.—On Sunday, June 16, the 17th anniversary of the Sunday-school was celebrated, the Rev. W. J. Clarke, of Birmingham, being the special preacher. There were large congregations, and the children sang special hymns. The collections on behalf of the school fund amounted to £7 11s.

Southend-on-Sea (Resignation).—Mr. Delta Evans, editor of the Christian Life, has decided, to the great regret of the congregation, to relinquish the charge of the Darnley-road congregation. He is returning to London, and will reside at North Finchley, but will remain responsible for the services at Southend until the end of September, thus completing two years' service there.

SIR GALAHAD OF THE SLUMS. By J. L. Haigh.

PRESS NOTICES.

"By dint of a dogged Pre-Raphaelite technique Mr. Haigh manages to transcribe, in firmly verisimilar fashion, the brute, obvious body of the place, the big conventional aspects; and that alone is sufficient to grant his story a singular distinction. Out of their special personal stores of knowledge and experience, each of a dozen diverse characters in the book proffer their contributory theories: a drink-maddened neurotic and an erudite Oxford Don, a Devonshire poet and a labourless dock labourer, a policeman and a man of business, a loud-mouthed demagogue and a sane, austere young lady. And moving to and fro among these people, striving to weave their comments into some sort of practical system, accepting a note here and a note there, modifying his modes as he progresses, passes Vernon, the scholarly missionary, scribbling curiously incongruous annotations on the pages of his University-printed mind, adding to it certain queer, grey chapters from the human documents each day forces him to read . . . and much knowledge of a lovingly laborious sort has gone to its making; it is packed with affirmations and disclosures that cannot fail to flutter a good many comfortable dovescotes."—Liverpool Courier.

"It is very well worth reading for its vivid pictures of lower-class Liverpool life, and its sympathetic and often realistic character-sketches of the dwellers in Liverpool slums. One of these, a strong-limbed, big-hearted dock labourer, is the lowly hero who gives the book its title; but its leading characters are two friends, a young house-agent with a passion for disinfecting, and a young minister who runs an unconventional mission, and strives to bring the spirit of Oxford into the sordid lives of the people."—Christian World.

"The title of this story is applied to a dock labourer, one of the manly, self-contained, and complete men, probably sent at times into the world to bring the Great Example nearer, and to enable us to realise something of what he might have been in the flesh had he lived in Liverpool in the twentieth century instead of in Palestine in the first. The book is penetrating, moving, convincing. Mr. Haigh's knowledge of low life, and of what is wanted to ameliorate its conditions, is full and exact. There is love, too, in the story, that between Vernon and Eva, Frank and Hilda, but there is none so sweet, pure, and selfless as that between the brother and sister, Jim and Annie Stephens."—Montrose Standard.

"Jim Stephens is one of Nature's gentlemen, a true knight of labour, stronger than most men both physically and morally, yet tender to the weakness, the faults, and the frailties of others."—Birkenhead News.

"The book throbs with reality. Mr. Haigh has succeeded in revealing one character of which any novelist might well be proud—'Jim,' the Sir Galahad of the title. It is some achievement to have presented in the environment of slumdom such a pure, strong, and spiritually inspired man. He has not an atom of the prig. He is good gold 'all through,' and in fashioning him for our affection Mr. Haigh has put the lover of fiction and the lover of fine human ideals under a deep obligation. It is a book for the thinker to read and for the reader to think over."—Liverpool Post.

"Mr. Haigh presents a picture that must appeal to all who have any knowledge of how it fares with the dwellers in the byways of our great cities. There is here no mawkish sentiment, no thrilling emotionalism, but simply sketches in straightforward language of the lives lived by those who struggle for their daily bread; of their successes and their failures, their temptations, falls, and triumphs. Jim Stephens, the Sir Galahad of the book, is a flesh-and-blood character."—The Scotsman.

"For the majority of Liverpool novel readers it should rank as one of the novels of the year, for even apart from the additional interest which the local colour imparts, the workmanship is by no means indifferent. The central character of the story, although he is not exactly its hero, is a brilliant young Oxford graduate. He has come to Liverpool to devote himself to work in the slums. The first lesson he has to learn is that if he is to succeed he must bridge over the gulf which lies between Oxford and Liverpool's slums. It is only by becoming a lover of mankind that he can hope to initiate himself into favour with the dwellers of the slums. Eventually he succeeds. The poor and the downcast confide to him their troubles; they welcome him into their squalid homes. Of course, he encounters a good deal of opposition at times. 'Parson chaps don't know what a working man has to put up with,' is one of the reproaches hurled at him. But he is a generous 'parson chap.' For the plot of the story readers must refer to the pages of the novel itself. Suffice it to say that it is a particularly stirring plot, which, in the words of the melodrama handbills, may be said to have 'strong human interest.' And naturally, since we are in the tragic atmosphere of the slums, there are times when it develops in human tragedy. As for a solution of the slum problem—well, the book is full of incidental suggestions."—Liverpool Weekly Mercury.

"Many writers have in recent times attempted to portray slum-life in fiction, but few with so large a measure of success as Mr. Haigh. He avoids undue sentimentality, and has a picturesque and humorous touch, which relieves the grey setting of many of his incidents. He introduces us to a large number of characters, all rapidly sketched, and a few of his men and women are very finely drawn. Vernon Carruthers, the altruist and idealist, and Frank Herald, the man of the world, are well contrasted, and the manner in which they tackle many of the problems that face them in the grim underworld of Liverpool forms the greater portion of the interest of this sincere and earnest story. There are pathos and tragedy in Mr. Haigh's work, and it deserves the attention of all those interested in social problems."—Publishers' Circular.

"We can promise our readers that they will meet a variety of characters pictured with abundant humour and penetrating sympathy. . . Taken altogether, it is a very genuine book."—The Inquirer.

"Those among us—and we know there are many—to whom 'Brotherhood' is no empty word, will delight in the spirit in which this book is written, and the loving interest which penetrates to the essential man beneath all external accidents and conditions. The local colour is, of course, strong, and some of the most pressing problems of our day and our city are presented in such a vivid manner as must surely help to force them into recognition. Very many of the incidents are within the range of Mr. Haigh's personal experience, and most of the 'characters' personally known to him. But the story, as a story, never flags; there is no undue exaggeration or emphasis, and the danger of luridness on the one side and mawkishness on the other is carefully avoided. Certain personalities familiar to most of us are admirably portrayed under a thin disguise. We heartily recommend the new 'Sir Galahad.'"—F. R., in Hope Street Church Calendar.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

M. PAUL SABATIER's second article on the Restatement of Catholic Thought, appears in our present issue, dealing with the changed attitude of the authorities towards M. Le Roy, with that remarkable publication by a group of young Catholic laymen at Milan, Il Rinnovamento, and with the Biblical Commission at Rome. M. Sabatier has this week returned from Assisi to his home at Chantegrillet, près Crest, in the South of France.

THE first of two articles by Professor Jean Réville, on the Ecclesiastical Situation in France, will appear in next week's INQUIRER. It deals with the Roman Catholic Church, to be followed by a second article on the Protestant Churches.

IN the next two numbers of THE INQUIRER we hope to publish a full report of the summer meeting of the National Conference Union for Social Service to be held at Manchester College next week, July 8-13. The opening reception by the Principal of the College is at 4.30 on Monday afternoon, and in the evening there is to be a religious service, with an address by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas. The first lecture on Tuesday morning is to be given by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, in memory of our late friend Kirkman Gray.

THE President of the Board of Education, Mr. McKenna, had a word to say on Monday in reply to those rash persons who have asked for somewhat violent haste in dealing with the Education question. He showed that he has the true instinct by asking such advisers to consider what would be the probable effect on the children if schools, now existing by virtue of laws not strictly equitable, were to be closed before better provision was secured. Urgent minds may take comfort from his intimation that next year's Bill is to be one "which will make the House of Lords regret that they did not accept Mr. Birrell's Bill." We hope so—but the peers are rather slow to exhibit the finer qualities, and we are not sure whether as yet they are really apprehensive for their own powers and privileges.

IN reference to the dispute at Preston over the syllabus of religious instruction issued by the local council, a deputation waited upon Mr. McKenna last week, and our friend the Rev. Chas. Travers presented the case for civil and religious liberty—for teachers, especially, but also for those who are compelled to send their children to the public schools and who do not desire them to be made into little Churchmen. The forcible arguments adduced were evidently not without effect, but the upshot of the matter appears to be that a very wide margin is being left to the local education authorities, and the only hope of a reasonable policy being adopted lies in the possibility of bringing their members to a fair and liberal frame of mind. The Preston Council meeting subsequently passed, by twenty to nineteen, a resolution to refer the numerous remonstrances which have been received from Nonconformists to the committee with a view to reconsidering the whole subject. Judging by the remarks of some extremists, the prospects of a modus vivendi are not great, but it is something to have reached the stage indicated.

AMONG the birthday honours announced last week there are two which we record with the greatest satisfaction, the peerage conferred upon Sir James Kitson, of Leeds, and the baronetcy upon Mr. W. B. Bowring, of Liverpool, President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Two of our most honoured laymen thus receive from the King public recognition, for which we offer to them the most cordial congratulations. It is interesting also to note that a Hibbert Lecturer receives a knighthood, in the person of Dr. Rhys, Principal of Jesus College, Oxford. There are other honours conferred upon both literature and art, among the new knights being Principal Donaldson, of St. Andrews, Mr. W. S. Gilbert, Professor von Herkomer and Mr. Orchardson, R.A. The cause of Peace is honoured by the knighthood conferred upon Mr. W. R. Cremer, M.P., while Dr. Spence Watson is made a Privy Councillor.

SIR JAMES KITSON has been a life-long Unitarian, and his name is well known among us as that of a generous supporter of all our denominational institutions. When in Leeds he is a regular attender at Mill-hill Chapel, to the building of which his father was a subscriber. He is one of those few of whom the minister is assured that if absent from his wonted seat on the Sunday morning it must be for some good reason. The congregation are proud of him, not merely because he has been an eminently successful man, but especially for the high esteem in which he is held by all his fellow citizens. The testimony of the Yorkshire Post, the well-known organ of Yorkshire Tories and churchmen, is worth that of many allied to him by the ties of religion and party, and its appreciation of an opponent does honour not only to its object, but to English journalism. It writes: "Political opponents as well as political friends welcomed with great heartiness the announcement of Sir James Kitson's elevation to the Peerage. Sir James possesses a most honourable reputation at Westminster as representing a type of integrity and independence which is, perhaps, not so conspicuous in modern politics as formerly. The new Peer, during the many years of his membership of the House of Commons, has given much sterling service to the public interest, which is all the more to be appreciated because it has been unobtrusive."

FROM the same paper we take the following notice of his career, to which much might be added if space allowed of it:—"Anything like a comprehensive review of the career of Sir James Kitson would require a detailed history of the commercial, educational, municipal, social, and philanthropic life of Leeds during the last half century, to say nothing of the Imperial and political aspects of the life of one whom the people of Leeds have long been proud to regard as a fellow-citizen. As the guiding spirit of one of the most flourishing iron manufacturing and engineering enterprises in the north of England, as an authority whose opinions on all engineering matters has for many years carried great weight among the foremost engineers of the day, as a railway director, whose business experience is appraised at a high value, and in numerous other departments of the stirring business life of the West Riding of Yorkshire, the name of Sir James Kitson stands very high. Sir James has no personal enemies, and what his local political opponents have always thought of him was well expressed by their choosing him as Lord Mayor of the city—an honour which, coming from the source it did, he greatly appreciated. In the development of the Yorkshire College into the Leeds University, and in the welfare of the Leeds Institute, and in almost every phase of the city life—particularly in movements for the benefit of the working classes—Sir James has manifested the keenest interest. A conscientious Radical of the Gladstonian school—so far back as 1880 he was the head of Leeds Liberalism, and entertained Mr. Gladstone here as representative of the party—the hon. Baronet has fought his political battles with characteristic zeal, but always fairly. He has even crossed swords with The Yorkshire Post, but always with good temper. If political fate had determined that a Radical should have overthrown Mr. Gerald Balfour in Central Leeds some years ago, a majority of Leeds citizens would have been content had that Radical been Sir James Kitson. Colne Valley will be sorry to lose one of the ablest and most diligent members that it ever had the honour of being represented by. It is understood that he has previously refused elevation to the Peerage, and, indeed, the fact that he has now accepted will probably surprise some of his friends. His elevation—like that of Lord Allerton—will be very popular in the West Riding."

THE city of Liverpool, and Hope-street Church in particular, of which he has been for many years a most faithful member (he was a devoted friend of the late Richard Armstrong), will rejoice in the honour conferred upon Sir William Bowring. Less than a month ago we recorded Mr. Bowring's generous gift of an estate to Liverpool, and spoke of the fine tradition of citizenship in which he has followed in his father's footsteps. The Liverpool Daily Post, in recording the new honour, wrote:—

"Of Sir William Bowring it may be said that he has throughout a long career given a high tone to politics, and made and consistently utilised opportunities for good public service. He is by parental example and tradition liberal and generous in all his conceptions of public duty, and has laboured in the cause of progress, whether municipal or national, with an unselfish devotion and modesty that entitle him to the highest esteem. His latest service to the public, as everyone knows, is his generous and sympathetic bestowal of the Roby Estate upon Liverpool for the benefit of all its inhabitants, and especially of the poor. Popular feeling will cordially recognise that in Sir William Bowring's case the honour of a baronetcy has been discriminately bestowed."

AND in a biographical notice the same journal said:—"A leading merchant, being senior member of the firm of Messrs. C. T. Bowring & Co.), a justice of the peace, an alderman of the city, an ex-Lord Mayor, and the leader of the Liberal party in the City Council, Sir Wm. Bowring has long occupied a conspicuous and important position in the life of Liverpool."

"At the general election of 1882 Alderman Bowring (as he has been known for many years) unsuccessfully contested the Abercromby Division against the late member, Mr. W. F. Lawrence, standing as a Gladstonian Liberal, strongly in favour of Home Rule for Ireland, Disestablishment for Wales, the direct veto over the liquor traffic, and generally of the democratic principles of government. There are probably very few deserving institutions or causes in the city that do not count him as a liberal supporter, and none will hail with greater satisfaction the new dignity bestowed on so distinguished a townsman than the labouring classes of the city, to whom he has ever been a true and helpful friend."

BE TEMPERATE IN ALL THINGS.

AND first of all let us be temperate in the claims that we make upon God. Our great disappointments come from our great expectations. Children try to clutch hold of the moon, they think it quite near; but somehow it seems to pass just beyond their tiny fingers. No; sadly they realise it, they have not caught the moon. Afterwards, as the years go on, and days of sweetheating come, and moonlight nights, they thank God that their little fingers did not catch the moon. It has remained uninjured and untouched in Heaven still; it was not so easily laid hold of and brought down to earth; it is better where it is; their great expectations were disappointed at the time, but for the moonlit walk and for the glory of a summer's night it remains in the sky, and it is better so. It is with our souls and our visions of God as it is with our earth and our sight of the sun and moon. Religion also has its far distances; things that seem near and are not, they are in the distance. We climb our little step-ladder, thinking to lay quick hands upon them; but they somehow just slip by our fingers, we have not grown accustomed yet to the distances in religion.

It is, perhaps, life's hardest lesson, and its most blessed Gospel, that the goodness of God is so deep and so far-reaching that we can see infinity and gaze deep into eternity, and, lo, one glory shineth here and another there, and the distances of heaven separate one virtue from another, as star from star, each with a glory of its own, shining in its own place; opposite to one another and far away, an eternal and infinite measuring of the depth and height, and length and breadth of heaven.

And at first our childish fingers would draw these distant things together, and in some narrower reconciliation than the infinite love of God would grasp our human handful. We reach them not. They still remain in heaven and still shed light upon our way. Be temperate in all things. We bend down to our tasks and to our work day by day, but our work does not reach perfection. Above and beyond all that we do we see something still better that we might have done. Wherever we are we see the horizon beyond us, where earth and heaven meet. So in all that we do we see still beyond us the straight line of perfection, where the ideal and the real meet. We never reach that horizon line. Sometimes we lose our tempers at this. We see the glories that there are in God; then we look at time, and, behold, the earth moves so slowly; we grow impatient, and we would drag the stars down. We have to learn temperance in religion; to behold treasured objects that we may not touch, to keep back our soul from presumptuous sins, and rich with whatever grace, learn to be modest in our time of wealth. For earth's brightest day's work is but a twinkle in the splendours of the night, the spirit of holiness is a mighty deep, and the glory of God as the stars in the sky for multitude.

They shine and greet one another from afar, every virtue differeth from another in glory, and the virtue that shines in one part of heaven is dimmed in another, an immeasurable modesty banishes each to its own sphere, and veiled in God's remotest depths the far-away virtues shine with a far-away clearness; they light the starlit soul, and in their immensity they twinkle to it.

WILFRED HARRIS.

THE annual examinations of the Presbyterian College, Carmarthen, were brought to a close on Wednesday, June 26, when the prizes were distributed by Mrs. Dawes Hicks, Dr. Hicks presiding, Dr. Talfourd Ely, the Rev. H. Rawlings, and Mr. Harold Bailly being also present as the deputation from the Presbyterian Board. The Chairman's address we hope to publish next week. The results of the examinations were very satisfactory, and Principal Evans thanked Dr. Hicks and the other examiners for their kind expressions.

THE Fifth Avenue Church, New York, of which Dr. Aked is now the minister, has, on the recommendation of its musical committee adopted the new edition of "Worship Song" with tunes edited by W. Garrett Horder as its Hymnal, and it will be introduced forthwith. The organist and musical director of the Fifth Avenue Church is Dr. H. R. Shelley, who is well known on this side of the Atlantic, by his fine settings of several popular hymns as Anthems. "Worship Song" will be adapted for use in the United States by the substitution of American for the British national hymns it contains.

TO CORRESPONDENTS:—Letters, &c., received from J. M. C., G. D. H., R. T. H., A. I. I., A. H. M., P. P., C. R., H. R., J. R., A. T., E. T., C. W. W., J. W.

How can a man learn to know himself? By reflection never; only by action. In the measure in which thou seekest to do thy duty shalt thou know what is in thee. But what is thy duty?—the demand of the hour.—Goethe.

MORAL, spiritual excellence, that which we confide in and revere, is not, and from its nature cannot be, an instinctive, irresistible feeling infused into us from abroad, and which may grow up amidst a life of indulgence and ease. It is, in its very essence, a free activity, an energy of the will, a deliberate preference of the right and the holy to all things, and a chosen, cheerful surrender of everything to these. It grows brighter, stronger, in proportion to the pains it bears, the difficulties it surmounts.—Channing.

THE RESTATEMENT OF CATHOLIC THOUGHT.

M. LE ROY—THE "RINNOVAMENTO"—THE BIBLICAL COMMISSION.

THE hope that I ventured to express at the close of my former article concerning M. Edouard Le Roy's book has not been realised. The ecclesiastical authority, which for two years maintained perfect silence in face of the famous article, "What is a Dogma?"—at the time, that is, when it appeared in the Quinzaine and was rousing the most important discussion of recent years in the religious Press—that self-same authority, on the day that the article made its appearance in book form, suddenly abandoned its attitude of reserve and launched its thunderbolt.

On May 21, the Osservatore Romano published an official communication of unprecedented violence, in which M. Le Roy's book was denounced as worthy of the indignation of the Catholic world. The intentions of the author were made the object of the gravest insinuations, and Catholic booksellers were requested to reject this kind of "goods."

From what quarter did this communication spring? It bore no indication of its origin. Be its origin what it may, it reflects no honour on its author, for it does little more than betray violent anger, and anger of the kind typical of the wielders of absolute power who by a sign can ruin a man and create silence, but who no longer even dream of creating light.

Three days after, Cardinal Respighi, the Vicar-General of his Holiness, prohibited the reading of this book sub culpa lethali (on pain of incurring a deadly sin), and of course this example has been followed in a host of dioceses.

Pius X., then, has judged that in this case the usual method of procedure would not suffice, and has been unwilling to await the ordinary decisions of the Congregation of the Index, whose movements are, in general, slow.

It cannot be said that he has departed from legality, since under a régime of one's own sweet will there is no legality. But here, as elsewhere, this pontiff, so enamoured of tradition, is the very first to break with traditions when they prove a little irksome.

The contrast between the mildness formerly displayed by Rome to M. Le Roy and the present violence, will astonish none but those who are not aware how the apostolic sacred congregations, and especially those of the Index and of the Sacred Office, carry on their operations. The reader perhaps imagines them as committees who feel bound actively to follow the intellectual and religious movement. In reality they are nothing of the kind. These two congregations never act except under the spur of denunciation. And this accounts for the extremely restricted number of English or German books condemned by the Index. In these two countries, works dangerous to Catholic faith are at least as numerous as in the countries of the Latin tongue, but denunciations are of rarer occurrence in those countries. In Rome itself they look black at the denunciations which come from the North. The most reverend Secretary of the Index does his best to hush them up, for he, worthy man, is quite aware that their Eminences the Cardinals are rarely masters of foreign tongues. By way of compensation, however, there are hecatombs of Italian and Spanish books. The hatreds of priest for priest, of monk for monk, and of order for order, find, in the exercise of the Index, a propitious weapon.

The noisy condemnations which have just swooped down on the head of M. Le Roy simply prove that Rome knew nothing of the article, "What is a Dogma?" I will not go so far as to say that the offices of the Curia are just the only place on earth where one is least aware of the movements of the thinking religious world, but everything, nevertheless, goes on almost as if this were really so.

The recent measures have been received by the Catholics of France with very different kinds of feeling. Some have rejoiced exceedingly; others have simply said that the judgments indicated what ought to be the attitude of Catholics; and others have offered criticisms, the severity of which have come but little short of indignation.

The Bulletin de la Semaine,* for example, after having reproduced the note of the Osservatore Romano, simply adds the following lines: "Be the rights of the matter what they may, our readers will appreciate from this note whether the impropriety of its tone and the odiousness of its insinuations, relative to a thinker justly held in esteem by his equals, do not complete the disqualifications of an organ of the presumptuous pretensions of which we have occasion only too often to abate. Is this respectable journalism?"

* * *

It is evident that in raging against M. Le Roy with the rapidity and vigour which we have just seen, the Holy See wanted to "make an example" and frighten innovators.

It can hardly be said to have succeeded. In Rome itself and throughout Italy the religious fermentation is extreme. It is at such a pitch that we should require to go back to the dawn of the great religious movements of the thirteenth century to find any analogous spectacle.

I cannot dream of speaking to-day of a host of writings, some printed and some in manuscript, that are scattered about in the seminaries. In Rome they have never lost the habit of spreading defamatory libels, in which starveling priests attack the prelacy; but the present agitation is a very different matter. It is a question of ideas; and amongst these pamphlets there are some that are masterpieces of biblical criticism, and others which constitute quite a programme of religious renaissance.

* Of May 29. Offices, 15, Rue Vaneau, Paris. This weekly journal is the organ of the intellectual Catholics of Paris, more especially of the group known as the "green cardinals," who, in the autumn of 1905, addressed so fine a letter to the Bishops of France with the object of inducing them to pronounce the tolerari posse in favour of the Law of Separation. And this they did by a large majority (58 to 18). But, as is known, Pius X. was of a quite different opinion.

† This word shows that the Bulletin de la Semaine saw in the note of the Osservatore an article from the editorial department of the journal, and did not perceive its character as an "official communication." Evidently the author would not have spoken thus if he had known that the anonymous note had been, if not written or dictated, at least approved by the Sovereign Pontiff. But that itself is a serious thing. What is the vital force of an authority which is no longer respected except for extrinsic reasons?

The movement of renovation is so extensive and so complex, that much space indeed would be required to convey anything like an adequate idea of it. At present I will mention but one of the most recent and important manifestations, Il Rinnovamento.*

This is the title of a review out and out Catholic and out and out Liberal, which was established at Milan in the month of January. It is not, to be sure, the first periodical of facts, science, and ideas that has come to light in Italy, in recent years, on Catholic ground, but this journal has an important peculiarity, it is entirely directed by laymen. This is a great novelty in Italy. That men, who are all young, and who are outside any ecclesiastical career, should devote themselves to the study of religious questions, seems perfectly ridiculous to the majority of free-thinkers of the common run, in this country, and appears on the other hand, to the clergy, like an intolerable and disloyal competition.

The establishment of the Rinnovamento taken by itself, then, would be a proof of the slow evolution of Italian religious thought, but what is not less a matter for rejoicing and a circumstance of much significance, is the fact of the wonderful success of the enterprise.

Straightway there is seen to be a public prepared to read the young Milanese Catholics, to understand them, and to love them. And yet they have made no sacrifice to frivolity or to the demands of the present age. There is nothing superficial in these numbers which provide, monthly, as much matter as a number of the Hibbert Journal. From the very outset Messrs. Scotti, Alfieri & Casati have succeeded in giving to their publication a value analogous to that of the most important reviews of current thought in England and Germany. On the other hand, what a contrast between the Rinnovamento and the Civiltà Cattolica!

La Civiltà is the famous review of the Jesuits, which is regarded as the scientific and official organ of the Curia. The intellectual—and we ought to add moral—distance between these two magazines is immense. In the Civiltà there is little else than archaeological or liturgical studies of more or less importance, evidencing research and effort. But in all other respects, whether it deals with morals, literature, or politics, the good Fathers dole out the absolute and final truth.

The directors of the Rinnovamento, on the contrary, frankly claim the right to err. They consider that the apprenticeship to the religious life, like all others, has its perils, and that if we would listen to the injunctions of those who have preceded us in the pursuit of truth, it would be indolence, cowardice, and spiritual suicide to neglect to strive in our turn.

They are Roman Catholics, and Roman Catholics they mean to remain. It might even be added that they are more perfectly so than their brethren, for this faith which theirs is no mere acceptance, at one time by constraint, at another time through indifference, of an intellectual yoke; it is, on the contrary, the blessed feeling that they are members of an eternal society with the history of which the books of the Bible partly furnish us, and of which the past, beautiful though it is, is but an image of a far fairer future.

The voice of the young people, so full of vigour and health, under vaulted roofs, where one is accustomed to hear nothing but an eternal indolent droning, has caused quite a shock, and ecclesiastical authority has straightway lost its head. The violence and precipitation with which it has acted have betrayed its agitation; for here again it has inaugurated a novel method of procedure. On April 29, Cardinal Steinhuber, Prefect of the Index, addressed a letter to Cardinal Ferrari, the Archbishop of Milan, in which he requested him to send for the directors of the Rinnovamento, and to enjoin upon them that they would have to cease their publication. I cannot, unfortunately, give here the text of this missive, of which the least one can say is, that one hardly expected to see a cardinal have recourse to this police-station or vestry-room style of doing things.* It ought, of course, to be added that if the Most Eminent Cardinals of the Sacred Congregation have read the Rinnovamento, they have, nevertheless, attributed to its directors intentions diametrically opposed to those which they really entertain.

The directors replied to the summons in a short, grave, and respectful letter, proclaiming their unflinching Catholic fidelity, but declaring their inability to submit to the injunction addressed to them. Such a submission would mean, they said, that they must accept the position that a Roman Congregation had the right to forbid laymen to undertake any labours in the domain of the religious sciences; it would be a confession that the adversaries of Catholicism were right, when they said that only beyond the pale of the Church could one study with perfect liberty.†

This resistance of the Milanese group on purely intellectual grounds is no superficial or isolated circumstance. It follows upon the organised resistance, throughout Italy, by the "Lega Democratica Nazionale," on political grounds. The currents are independent, but created by the same inner forces; and they will unite!

Will the Vatican continue to rage? Shall we see young people solemnly communicated for having the courage to profess their faith and to live it?

One must be prepared for anything.

* * *

Pius X., henceforth, no longer sees anything, no longer understands anything. He is blind to the fact that modernism, in spite of all the rigour with which he pursues it, is invading everything, penetrating everywhere, even into the Roman Sacred Congregations themselves.

* It was published in the Osservatore Romano of May 4, 1907. The Cardinals of the Sacred Congregation therein express "the disgust (disgusto) which they experienced on reading this publication of so-called Catholics."

† On May 13. The text will be found in the Rinnovamento of May, p. 610 et seq.

He judges of what takes place in their sessions by what they show him and by the decrees which they submit for his signature. These being always perfectly in accord with his wishes—of which no one, be it understood, is in any doubt—he appears to labour under the conviction that no hesitation and no discord ever arise.

On May 20, for example, a decree of the "Biblical Commission" on the Fourth Gospel was presented for his approbation. It is a condemnation, at once haughty, trenchant, and puerile, of all the modern labours on the Johannine question. The general public will think, therefore, that no one at the Vatican understands the value of the works published in recent years on the Fourth Gospel. But the general public will be mistaken. The Biblical Commission has, in fact, like the other Roman Congregations, two kinds of members; the members properly so-called, all Cardinals,* and the Consulters.† The former alone draw up decrees, the latter alone labour, study, and present reports,

I can affirm, without fear of contradiction, that there is, in this instance, nothing in common between the decree of the Cardinals and the labours of the Consulters. A fortunate circumstance enabled me to run through the latter at the moment of their appearance from the Vatican Presses.

Several of these studies reflect great honour on those who drew them up. The Consulters were not unaware of what was expected of them, but a good number of them had the candour and the honesty to caution the Cardinals against merely ponderous decisions. They were not listened to. Facts of this kind are worth reflecting on and studying.

A few months ago, Pius X., in the Papal Bull Gravissimo, after having consulted the French Episcopate, decided on a course opposed to that advocated by the Episcopate. So, to-day, it is the Cardinals of the Biblical Commission who make a decree in absolute opposition to the ideas of the Consulters themselves.

It would be true to say that the Roman Authority does not realise how rapidly it is becoming isolated. It is no longer a case of separation between the Church and the State, it is a separation between Rome and Rome; between the old Rome of a handful of Cardinals‡ and the new Rome, represented by all those who have not believed that Catholic faith imposed

* These are Cardinals Rampolla, Satolli, Merry del Val, Segna, and Vivès.

† To the number of twenty. One would seek in vain the names of the most advanced Catholic exegetes, but Leo XIII. understood, nevertheless, that he ought to introduce at least a certain number of the specialists in Biblical studies. Now, since the establishment of the Commission, a twofold evolution has taken place within it. Whilst the Cardinals under the influence of Pius X. have made decisions more and more conservative and reactionary, the consulters, by the very effect of their researches and labours, are finding their way towards increasingly scientific solutions. The conflict of the two tendencies will lead either to the suppression, pure and simple, of the Commission, or more probably—for they will hardly care to confess to a lack of harmony—to a reorganisation on a new basis.

‡ I say advisedly "a handful of Cardinals," for not by a good deal were all the measures taken by Pius X. approved by the unanimity of the Cardinals of the Curia.

it upon them as a duty to ignore the labour of modern exegesis. Of these two tendencies, which will gain the upper hand? Can there be any doubt as to the result?

How is it that the Roman Authority does not perceive that the terrible precautions it takes to keep secret the decisions of the meetings of Bishops or the discussions of the Biblical Commission are, in themselves, a scandal and a confession of weakness.

THE SPIRIT OF DEMOCRACY.*

MR. DOLE has done well to republish as a book these articles which originally appeared in the Springfield Republican. They are thirty-two in number, and all deal with subjects on which we are glad to know the views of a cultivated American writer. It is difficult to select for review among so great an abundance, but one turns hopefully to the chapter headed "The Monroe Doctrine and the Golden Rule." Here will be found a brief but adequate account of the origin of the Monroe doctrine at a time when there was a real danger lest despotic powers of Continental Europe should stifle young republic freedom in Central and South America; and when the promulgation of the doctrine received the warmest support of England. Mr. Dole points out how conditions are now changed, how the nations of Europe, except Russia, have free parliaments, how forcible annexation by them of American States is practically impossible, though many of these States are really despotisms and republics only in name. He then supposes the only two occurrences which are real possibilities, viz., that Southern Brazil should be so largely colonised by Germans and Argentine by Italians that a majority of the inhabitants of these countries should voluntarily desire to change their form of government and establish a political connection with Germany and Italy respectively. Should this ever happen, Mr. Dole declares that there is nothing in the true Monroe doctrine that would require the United States to oppose. More pressing problems arise in connection with the collecting of debts incurred by ill-governed American States. Mr. Dole does not admire some of the recent precedents that have been established, and his words deserve the careful study of his countrymen.

The next chapter is headed "The United States as a World Power." Our author wishes for a world-wide extension of the influence of his country, but he wants it to be the influence of an example showing how its own citizens are lifted up in ethical and social life. He says, too, "As we long ago found that no individual was good or wise enough to be plaintiff or defendant and at the same time the judge over his own cause, so we are learning in the case of issues between nations," and he warmly pleads the paramount importance of international law.

In dealing with "The New Immigration" Mr. Dole notes facts that might well stagger faith in democratic principles. A million immigrants in a single year, no longer chiefly of Anglo-Saxon origin, or even speaking the English language, not even Teutonic or coming from self-governing countries—such is the inrush which has somehow to be dealt with. Mr. Dole's faith in democracy is sufficiently robust to enable him to trust it even under the strain to which it is now subjected. He is unwilling to close the door against those that seek admittance, though he would make the steamship companies more responsible than they are at present, and undertake stringent measures to prevent those thinking of leaving their old homes from being misled as to their prospect in the new country. "Whenever a million workmen are out of employment in the United States the fact ought to be published in all the ports of the world."

We could wish that Mr. Dole had dealt as fully and as firmly with the "Colour Question." He has a few words about it, but no chapter specially devoted to it. He notes that Southern planters are glad to have negro labour to pick cotton, and would be by no means willing to send back nine million blacks to Africa even if that were possible; but we gather that in this more than in most other problems the United States are at present contented with a policy of drift.

In "The Treatment of Crime" he thinks that the growing spirit of democracy is working a radical change, and that the keynote of the new method will be sympathy. Crime is disease, and must be cured, and what is better than cure is prevention. He notes that intemperance is at least one of the causes of crime in 50 per cent. of the cases investigated by the liquor committee; and he asks how anything but crime can be expected from the unhealthy conditions under which life is reared in too many American cities. His remarks, too, on the treatment of juvenile offenders and of discharged prisoners are much to the point.

The problem of pauperism, with its army of tramps and its host of the unemployed is even more severe in the States than in Europe, and one has the feeling that this ought not to be so. It is, however, the inevitable consequences of the individualism which is fostered there, and even enshrined in their sacred constitution. The struggle for existence, the weak to the wall, the race with prizes for the winners and the devil to take the hindmost; these are the outcome of the liberty that the States love so well. We doubt if Mr. Dole quite realises this, and think that something more than the palliations he suggests will be required before America contains none but self-supporting citizens.

In his chapter on "Majority Rule" he recognises how uncivilised and unsatisfactory is a decision arrived at by a vote, a mere tug of war, and notes with pleasure the limitations which secure the rights of minorities. He thinks that the States are ruled by an oligarchy, and that "democracy at best has only a veto power in extreme crises," and quotes a saying, without approving it, "Every man has a chance to become a boss, and this is what makes a democracy." He would like to see an extended use of the referendum as a way of putting a simple issue before the electors who could be carefully enlightened on the sole question which they had to decide.

Other improvements in the representative system are urgently needed to prevent anomalies of which he gives striking instances, as when Missouri sent fifteen democrats and one republican to Congress, and the same year cast a republican majority for President. Such are some of the topics dealt with in Mr. Dole's most interesting and well-written book which we heartily commend to our readers.

OBITUARY.

Mr. A. W. WORTHINGTON, J.P.

"It has been Mr. Worthington's lot, and a tribute also to the high and generous qualities of a rare personality, that he has worthily filled a part in the public life of Worcestershire and of Stourbridge district such as few men can possibly equal, and his death leaves a gap which cannot well be filled. Though well past the three score years and ten, Mr. Worthington, with a vigour and mental freshness which were nothing short of wonderful, continued until a year ago his arduous public services as county councillor, justice of the peace, member of the Stourbridge Board of Guardians, of the County and District Education Committees, and other public bodies with which he was associated, in addition to the many enterprises which claimed his attention in political, religious, and philanthropic life." So we read at the beginning of the memorial notice in the County Express telling of the death of Mr. Alfred Worthington, which we recorded last week, on Monday, June 24, at his residence, The Hill, Stourbridge. To us his departure means also the loss of an honoured friend, widely known in the fellowship of our churches, as formerly, for many years, a minister in active service, and latterly, for the past twenty-eight years, that most helpful kind of layman, one who has intimate knowledge and sympathy with ministerial life. In the old days at Mansfield he was the diligent secretary of the North Midland Association. Then for some years, after his return to Stourbridge, he was treasurer of the Midland Christian Union. He was one of the original secretaries of the National Conference, and secretary from the first of the Sustentation Fund. In these and many other ways he rendered devoted service to the churches to the ministry of which he was early called, and many ministers of a younger generation bear grateful testimony to the constant sympathy and helpful kindness they received at his hands.

Alfred William Worthington was born September 7, 1828, the fifth son of Thomas Worthington, of Manchester. Two of his elder brothers, Mr. S. B. Worthington and Mr. Thomas Worthington, and a younger brother, the Rev. Jeffery Worthington, are still with us. Their mother was the daughter of Samuel Barton, of Bishopsgate, London. On leaving Dr. J. R. Beard's school at Higher Broughton, Alfred Worthington entered Manchester New College, then in Manchester, where among his fellow-students were the late Charles Beard, H. W. Crosskey, T. E. Poynting, John Dendy, and J. H. Brooks, and of friends who survive him, the Revs. S. A. Steinthal and T. L. Marshall. Mr. Marshall recalls the fact that for many years during his editorship Mr. Worthington was a frequent contributor to THE INQUIRER. He took his B.A. degree in London in 1848, and on the conclusion of his Divinity course had a year's further study in Berlin. His first pastorate was at Stourbridge, 1852-54, and then, after three years at Bridgwater, he settled in 1858 at Mansfield, where he ministered for twenty-one years. To the Old Meeting parsonage in 1861 Mr. Worthington brought his first wife, the second daughter of the late Robert Scott, of Stourbridge, but only for two years, for in 1863 she was taken from him. Their only daughter is the wife of Mr. Frank Preston. Mr. Worthington afterwards married the daughter of a cousin (Mr. Walter Worthington), and she was for many years, both in Mansfield and afterwards in Stourbridge, a devoted fellow-worker with him in many a good cause. She died in 1896, and three years later he married the only daughter of the late Rev. W. Cochrane, who survives him.

On leaving Mansfield, Mr. Worthington spent some time abroad, and then in 1882, the year of the establishment of the National Conference, made his home again at Stourbridge. As to the public service he rendered in that district we have already quoted the testimony of one who speaks with full knowledge, and this was repeated on every side by members of the public bodies to which Mr. Worthington belonged. As a citizen, a magistrate, a politician, a guardian of the poor, an administrator both of elementary and higher education, and in connection with other works of philanthropy, he has left a record of rare devotion, of patient conscientious labour, of astonishing grasp of detail, and equally firm adherence to principle, of generous consideration for opponents in matters of controversy, and the staunchest loyalty to friends, of great unselfishness and singleness of purpose in seeking the public good.

Further testimony to the high regard in which Mr. Worthington was held was borne by the presence of a large gathering of friends and representatives of public bodies at the funeral service, which was held at the Stourbridge Cemetery on Friday, June 28, after cremation on the previous day. The service was conducted by the Revs. Dr. Ewart and A. H. Thomas, the present and a former minister of the old Presbyterian Chapel, to which Mr. Worthington was attached with such strong affection. The memorial address was given by Mr. Thomas, and in the course of it he spoke as follows of Mr. Worthington's life and character:—It was a long, honourable, useful life, devoted throughout to the highest ends, and it was a character of singular integrity and sweetness. Doubtless there are others who can tell more fully the record of his public services, but it may be permitted to mention how he laboured as a minister successfully on behalf of those liberal religious beliefs whose power he had experienced in his own nature. No man was more sincerely devout, or attempted more earnestly to bring the principles of religion into the action of every day.

* * * *

His interests were wide and carried him into many branches of work. As a magistrate he brought to his duties conscientious care and fairmindedness. This town and county are under a great obligation for his labours on behalf of education. It was a subject in whose principles he was well versed, and he showed a wide grasp of the details. Those who were privileged to work with him noticed his astonishing memory for all the intricacies of a subject and his power of discovering what was necessary and right to do. In all other movements which were designed to benefit his fellow-men he was deeply interested. The needs of ministerial brethren belonging to the same household of faith, the care of the local hospital and dispensary, philanthropic funds in the neighbourhood and country could all appeal with success to his large catholic sympathies. Many a committee will miss his advice and practical help. This town knew him as a convinced and ardent Liberal, who worked hard for his political party. In pursuit of what he thought the good of the nation, he was strenuous and resolute. Yet you will bear me out that there was nothing of the mere partisan in him. Holding his own opinions so earnestly, he could respect the earnest convictions of an opponent, and meet him with undiminished goodwill as a man. He knew how to conduct controversy on a high level, with nothing of bitterness or smallness in it.

Who can speak adequately of his private benefactions? He did more than the ordinary share of the secret unnoticed acts of kindness. No one will ever know the full extent of them, nor did he himself, for his one hand literally knew not what the other hand did. But in numbers of grateful hearts they are written, treasured, and remembered.

Unknown, perhaps, to him alone, his own life was the example of one of his firmest principles. He believed in the permanence, the eternity of good, the divinity of all righteousness. And, as we think of his honourable, generous life, we are carried to the thought of a Providence which allows no good to cease in silence, but employs it still for perfect ends. So has ended the earthly life of a useful citizen, a loving father, a rare friend. It was so full and complete that it seems hardly an occasion for mourning. Yet there is always the sense of personal loss, and we shall pray that the divine consolations be vouchsafed to the immediate circle of those who were dear to him, and to whom he was dear.

THE REV. B. KIRKMAN GRAY.

THOSE who knew Kirkman Gray, and had received even a passing impression of his singularly vivid personality, must often have wondered under what circumstances it had developed. It is not a long nor an eventful story, but it is full of interest.

Benjamin Kirkman Gray was the eldest son and fourth child of the Rev. Benjamin Gray, for 35 years Congregational Minister at Blandford, Dorset, and was born on August 11, 1862. He passed a dreamy boyhood in the country, and was educated under his father's able instruction, never going away to school. He early learnt to love nature, especially the wind and the trees, with a passionate intimacy. Next, he came to love books, and delighted as a boy in the title of a "book-worm." Games only held a secondary place in his affections at this time.

Before he was fifteen he went up to London, entering the business of his maternal uncle, a wholesale stationer. But although he honestly endeavoured to apply himself to his calling, and was treated with kindly consideration, he was not happy in his work, and after five or six years' struggle he abandoned it. During those years, however, he had learnt much. At sixteen, he had experienced an intellectual awakening. His mind, shook off its slumber, aroused by reading a report of Spottiswoode's Presidential Address to the British Association. Henceforward he was resolved to know. He returned to his Euclid, revelling in "the sublime simplicity of a mathematical universe" where "everything is as it must be and should be." But he found his greatest delight in history and poetry. At this time also, he became an ardent, even rabid, political disputant, espousing the cause of Home Rule before it became Gladstonian. Coming back from work, he would sit down to the Times and a pot of tea in a restaurant, and then with coffee and cold bandages he would read far into the night, Mill or Mallock or some other favourite, giving rein besides to his own active imagination.

He was very solitary, and had his periods of Byronism. The value even of life itself seemed for awhile uncertain. But before he was 21 he returned to Dorset, and the re-discovery of his family, and the formation of a friendship there did much to weaken his bitter and singular resolve that, since people persisted in misunderstanding him, he would deliberately offer himself to them as an insoluble enigma. His intense and passionate nature needed affection and self-expression, and though these became his in time, the realisation of them was long delayed.

From 21 to 24 years of age, he was a teacher. Then he resolved to enter the ministry, and joined his brother G. Buchanan Gray at New College. Kirkman Gray had already been stirred by "the pathos of the world's poverty," and felt that he had something in him which he must offer towards its relief. Often it had seemed a sort of blasphemy to enjoy life while others suffered, and the growing sense of Solidarity, together with the ministry of Nature through the poems of Wordsworth, was destroying those walls of self-imprisonment which for a time had tragically crushed his youth. Now he was to expand more and more into his fuller manhood.

Going back to London in 1886, he formed new friendships there, and notably came under the stimulating influence of Professor Edwin Johnson. Kirkman Gray's adventurous and fearless spirit never suffered from parental estrangement. His father consistently upheld him in his demand for exact honesty and truthfulness of thought.

After college came a pause, filled by study of Economics, and the taking of the Ricardo Scholarship. Some of the evenings were spent in Canning Town, where he worked with Percy Alden. For a time he returned to teaching at Bishop Stortford, but in 1892 he joined Richard Westrope at Belgrave Chapel, Leeds. The two worked together as comrades, and among those northern artisans Kirkman Gray began to find the scope he needed. "Men seemed to divine me," he said. "They fed me with frank kindness. I lived." Not yet believing in himself he had found others who believed in him, and that was more wonderful to him. His orthodoxy was questioned both in Leeds, and in his next post at the Kentish Town Mission. But here again he formed warm friendships with the working men, many of whom petitioned the committee to retain his services. Being accused of Unitarianism, he at first repudiated the charge, but upon reflection, accepted the definition, and in 1894, with the encouragement of his friend the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth, he entered the Unitarian ministry at Warwick. There, as he said, "quite a number of people seemed to find in me something they wanted for life-power." He found regular church-work hard, and he still knew too many hours of despair; but, on the whole, life had now become hopeful; the field of his work was before him, and he was yearly more able and eager for it.

But he craved for yet fuller sympathy, understanding and comradeship. This, too, was given him. In 1897 he joined one of the late Mrs. Cash's parties, on a visit to Spain, becoming engaged to one of his companions, Miss Eleanor Stone, whom he married in the succeeding year. Together they shared the absorbing and exacting service of the Bell-street Domestic Mission till 1902. Kirkman Gray's greatest interest in this work centred in the education of the people; but he was also feeling his way toward definite political action. During these years he was associated with his friends Percy Alden, Will Reason, and Richard Westrope in the formation of the Christian Social Brotherhood.

The Bell-street work ended in a serious breakdown, and Kirkman Gray never again settled in the ministry. His life became filled instead with other work. In 1903 he went to live in Hampstead, and began writing his very able and suggestive "History of English Philanthropy," published two years later. He was at work upon its sequel at the time of his death. He took up journalistic work, preached and lectured in many places, became a worker for the Independent Labour Party and the Ethical Societies. In 1905 he lectured before the London School of Economics, and to the Friends' Summer School at Street. That winter he visited Germany to study the development of municipal enterprise. To this social side of his work he became more and more devoted. Readers of THE INQUIRER need not be reminded of his efforts to enlist all members of Unitarian and kindred churches in the cause of Social Service. They will recall his work on the Public Questions Committee, and the National Conference Union, as well as his many contributions to these pages. Among the most striking of his recent writings was the study of the Ethical Problem in an Industrial Community, contributed to the January number of the International Journal of Ethics. In this he discusses the problem, "Who is my neighbour?" and answers that he is Humanity, en masse—Humanity who must be loved and served even when he is only present to vision under the most impersonal forms. Last May he removed to Letchworth, having long been keenly interested in the movement represented by Garden City. Although he was almost immediately attacked by the disease which proved fatal to him, he yet entered into the social life of the community, taking part in the Sunday evening meeting, the adult school, and the Friends' meeting. He was specially happy in the field-walks and open-air life of the country. Death, from angina pectoris, came suddenly on Sunday, June 23, releasing him from physical agony. After cremation at Golders' Green, his ashes were buried under the trees he loved beside the old village church of Letchworth.

It is difficult to make any succinct statement as to Kirkman Gray's position which would be at all satisfying. During the last sixteen years he had strenuously grappled with many of the greater problems of thought. He was a radical thinker, and the vehemence of his nature expressed itself in his thought. This was often startling and paradoxical, never merely conventional; but at the same time it was earnest and profound. To me, he seems to have been a mystical free-thinker, occupied in the field of sociology, and I would use the definition only in its finest and most catholic application. He had experience and conviction of solidarity: both the communion of the earth, whereof he wrote so nobly in these pages,* and of the communion of all men, sinners and saints, in one common life and destiny.

For him, life was communion. But that is not to say it was merely a passive enjoyment. His response to the life of the whole was a passionate love of mystical depth and intensity, largely incomprehensible to himself, almost wholly incomprehensible to others. His heart burned within him. His sword could not sleep in his hand. His spirit was all of wrath and compassion.

In one of our last talks he was speaking of the poetry of the future: it would be concerned with a new form of passion, uncertain as yet in content, but probably, he thought, that of social solidarity, the absorbing emotion of full-grown men and women who enter consciously into the service and purpose of Humanity, obedient to the Will beyond all individual wills. In another conversation, he said of prayer, that it was only perfect when complete in the one word "God": anything added to that was subtracted from the act of highest devotion.

Kirkman Gray was a fearless thinker, because he had faith in reality, because he rejoiced like a child in life: he was a bold disputant, because he never doubted the ultimate reconciliation. He gave his life without reserve to the great fellowship of Love, and in that transcendent fellowship it abides. We can find him there.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

SOME children, and some grown-up people, too, seem to think that goodness is made up of "nots." The good boy is one who does not smoke cigarettes, and does not drink, and does not use bad language, and does not give trouble, who, in short, does not do anything naughty. And so there are boys and girls who think that is quite right, and rather wish to be good, but do not care very much about it. They have a feeling that it is a fine, brave thing to slip the knots by which they are tied, to break the rules, and risk the unpleasant consequences.

But that is only one sort of good and bad. Let us look at another sort. There were, we may imagine, two biggish boys who went to fish in forbidden waters, trespassing on a farmer's ground to do so. They took with them a smaller boy. After a time they saw the farmer running towards them with a big stick. They immediately ran away and got clear off, leaving the little boy, who could not run so fast, to be caught. That was being bad boys, mean, cowardly, and treacherous. And boys will see that it was bad, even some who might think the trespassing and poaching good fun.

And now for a good boy. We will take a true story, true in the main. There were two boys who were doing a naughty thing, climbing about the roof inside Bridgnorth church, where they had no business to be. They were crawling along a great beam, high above the stone floor, when the one behind slipped, and catching at anything for support, laid hold of the other boy's ankles. He, too, was dragged off the beam, but managed to hold on. And there they hung, the one dangling in the air, the other holding by the beam. They tried to pull themselves up, but it proved to be impossible. Then the boy who was holding on to the other, knew that if he did not let go, he must drag his companion down with him. And he would not do that. He opened his hands (think what that would mean), and fell on to the hard stone floor and was killed. That was a good boy. His act was so good that we call it heroic.

To sacrifice one's life, or any great thing, for another is noble. And the little sacrifices of one's own likings, which all have the opportunity of making, though not heroic, are also good.

There is good and bad conduct of which children are told by parents or teachers. And there is conduct, also, which they know for themselves to be good or bad. It may seem to be a different sort of thing from keeping the rules which are laid down for them. But, at any rate, there is this in common: the bad boy and girl are those who must and will do what they like, who cannot make themselves do what they don't like. Right or wrong, wise or foolish, they let themselves be led by their own likings, and are the slaves, instead of the masters, of their own desires. You may hear children say, and not only children, "I don't like to"; as if that settled the matter. But the good and brave will do what they do not like, when they know they ought.

The good and bad, which are of greatest importance for children, are those which they themselves know to be so. You know quite well what it means, to be brave and true and honest and kind; to be trustworthy, so that you might be chosen as umpire, and all would be sure you would decide fairly. And besides those things, to avoid laziness and self-indulgence when you know they are bad. The things you know are the things that matter most, which show and make your character. But you had better mind the "nots" also.

To swear and use bad language, which I hope no reader of the Children's Column would think of doing, is befouling one's own mouth and mind. To smoke cigarettes is getting into a habit before you know what you are doing. And there is nothing brave about it. It is most often the poor cowardice which cannot bear to be laughed at. Drinking, that is drinking intoxicating liquors, leads to all sorts of misery and wickedness. The temptation to that comes later than childhood. And many a young man has let himself be led into ruin because he had not the courage to say No. And falsehood, cruelty, and dishonesty are always bad.

Children have to begin very much with refraining from things forbidden; as in learning to play cricket you have in the first place to avoid mistakes.

But the goodness that wins the honour of mankind, and for which observing the rules of conduct is a preparation, is the greatest and most truly manly thing in the world. High aloft in the admiration of the ages is the conduct of Jesus, going up to Jerusalem to deliver his message to his people; though he knew there was little hope of their heeding it, and that it was almost sure to lead to his death. That is one instance, standing out conspicuous in the world's history, of what is meant by a good man. And all who are good in any way are on his side, and in some measure of this sort.

There is talk about being good of which children are tired. But really, and that is why so much is said about it, it is the thing that matters more than everything else in the world.

BY AND BY.

NIGHT and day the grasses grow

Under sun and shadow,

Summer comes at last, and lo,

Green is every meadow!

So, as childhood slips away

With its tears and laughter,

Flowers are growing night and day

That shall bloom long after.

Seeds immortal sown in youth—

Quiet hours of duty,

Thoughts of love, and words of truth—

Spring anew in beauty;

Little words of lowly prayer,

Little hymns and praises,

Come again in days of care,

Sweet as summer daisies.

Lilies, roses, sparkling dew,

Happy living creatures,

Praise to Him who gave us you,

All to be our teachers;

Praise to Him who leads us on,

Year by year, unknowing,

Till the harvest joy is won

Of our days of sowing!

THE FREE CATHOLIC IDEAL.

AN article on this subject, by the Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS, of Nottingham, appears in the new number of the Hibbert Journal, still further enforcing the plea he has recently made in his little book, "A Free Catholic Church." Having noted at the outset the impending collapse of dogmatic Orthodoxy, both in the Protestant churches and the Church of Rome, Mr. THOMAS asks what is to take its place; and his hope is set on a new Catholicism, which shall have "the profound and inspiring consciousness of the continuity and solidarity of the Christian communion, and of the living authority of the collective corporate Church life."

For this reason it is that he welcomes with so much ardour the liberal movement within the Roman Church, of which M. PAUL SABATIER gives us, in his article this week, further striking evidence. Mr. THOMAS refers to the notable works of LOISY, FOGAZZARO, and others, and then adds:—

"No one in the least degree familiar with the New Catholic tendency can for a moment doubt that its best representatives are the sworn enemies of superstition and of Ecclesiastical tyranny, and are animated even to the point of heroism by the noblest progressive ideals. When we read words of such calm and assured determination as were spoken by Don ROMOLO MURRI, on the occasion of his recent suspension by the Pope, we cannot but feel that a splendid passion, an intense sincerity, and a magnificent purpose inspire these ardent Liberals of the Roman faith: Those of us who have our own traditions of struggles for freedom cannot withhold our tribute of admiration. With our own memories of conflict and persecution, we must naturally sympathise with the labours of these earnest idealists, as indeed with the labours of all who are devoted 'to truth, to liberty, to religion.' Standing outside their visible Church, we are yet one with them in the invisible Church of sympathy and of aspiration towards the same great ends of unity and universality. We can but watch and cheer their brave efforts in a stirring campaign. They have great allies; their 'Friends are exultations, agonies,

And love, and man's unconquerable mind.'

Those who are pledged to the cause of Liberal Christianity can assure themselves, even if they may not be permitted to assure these others, that in heart and mind and will they are far nearer to them than either party is to the orthodox Bible Protestant. In the light of this impressive movement it would seem as if what is called the New Reformation is likely to be more a Catholic than a Protestant Reformation. It is the conviction of the present writer, at any rate, that the day must come, and perhaps sooner than we dare hope, when the Liberal Catholic movement will have worked itself consistently through into the Free Catholic movement in which Protestantism and Romanism, carried up into a new religious and undogmatic unity, will be there transcended or reconciled."

We have made this long quotation, because it marks in clear and eloquent terms the position which Mr. THOMAS has taken up. For what he next says to the Protestant bodies of the extreme left, we must refer our readers to the article itself. That they are so insensible to the meaning of the "Communion of Saints," as he appears to think, we are by no means willing to admit. Nor do we think that Mr. THOMAS's plea for more symbolism is vital to the cause which with him we have very earnestly at heart. There is, at any rate, something far deeper than that, which must have the first place. The Communion of the "Holy Catholic Church" can be realised as deeply in a Quaker meeting as in Westminster Abbey through the outpouring of the most moving religious music, and by laying hold of that which is common to both we shall find the way of deliverance into the new life, in which religion shall be the master power of our being. There are differences of administration, but one Spirit.

We in our undogmatic churches (for which the name "Unitarian" can be tolerated only because we are now assured that "Unitarian" means just Free and Catholic and Undogmatic!)—we, Mr. THOMAS urges, if we are to live and prosper, and have our place in the better future which is to come, must enter with fuller understanding into "the corporate spirituality of a Catholic life." "The Church Catholic must once more be felt as an ideal and a reality, which can kindle a glowing response in the hearts of men. . . . There must be seen the ideal vision in which the Church may appear as an end in itself, and not only as a means; for the Church Catholic is the highest and most sacred concept of humanity that can ever brighten the mind and thrill the heart." And when we ask what that means, we are referred to "the Rose of Heaven," as DANTE conceived it, and "the union and harmony of active spirits living in perfect love," "which simply is religion—not a mere medium, or means of religious influence, but religious life and influence itself in its supreme expression, that eternal symphony in which the personality of the saint is but a single note." "At that level of thought," Mr. THOMAS assures us, "we may safely take up the motto, so dangerous on lower ground, of 'The Church for the Church's sake,' or what seems at that altitude exactly the same thing, 'God for God's sake.'"

There we have the heart of the matter. This great ideal of the Free Catholic Church is simply the perfected life with God, on earth and in heaven, the Kingdom of God and the Communion of Saints; or perhaps we should say, the Church is the union of those who acknowledge that to be the true end of life, to which their whole endeavour must be given. The only possible Catholic Church of the future, Mr. THOMAS rightly says, must be undogmatic, a Free Catholic Church, and towards this consummation there are movements discernible in all parts of the ecclesiastical world.

To those who understand what this really means, there cannot be any question of setting up a new organisation. We do not want another sect among the many already existing, we want the new spirit more and more to permeate them all. If it should prove possible, according to the ardent hope expressed by Mr. THOMAS, even within the fold of the ancient Roman Church, that would be a great triumph for humanity; but in any case that is the clear line along which, in the coming days, Truth must prosper, and the progress of vital religion be assured. We must rejoice to find comrades in that great quest wherever they appear, and for ourselves simply hold fast to the ideal, and see to it that in our own religious life, and in the spirit of all our intercourse with others, we are not unworthy of it. "I agree," says Mr. THOMAS, "with those who say that the Free Catholic Church is forming itself, not as a separate congregation, but as an inner understanding among existing ecclesiastical bodies." That is the fact, and if we are to have our place and make our contribution to that great fellowship, as members already of free churches, whose essential spirit is that of the Free Catholic Church, we must realise it with a new and more perfect self-surrender and a continuing patient faithfulness. Our calling is simply to life, which is religion, the perfected life of man with God. We have to give ourselves in all sincerity to the affections and aspirations of human brotherhood, consecrated by the Divine benediction, and to the steadfast work of human progress. Where there is genuine life, moving in the power of the Holy Spirit, it will find its own natural modes of expression and methods of operation and organisation. The inward spirit makes the life of the body. And for Truth, which must long continue to appear under many forms to earnest minds, we shall be doing the best service, moving forward together towards completer vision, as we realise that it is through the life of humanity that it must come to us, for so God manifests Himself to His children. That surely was the meaning of the glad tidings of JESUS, his Gospel of the Kingdom of God; it is the abiding spirit of the Christian life. Out of constant, strenuous endeavour to perfect human brotherhood in life as it now is here on earth, faith must ever be reborn, faith which knows the power of God in righteousness, and the Communion of the Spirit, perfected in love.

CHERRYBURN.*

A SERMON FOR ANIMAL SUNDAY.

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.

"Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?"—John i. 46.

THE men of Jerusalem did not think that anything good could come from an obscure little town in the north of Palestine, never mentioned in the Scriptures. The idea that it should be the birthplace of the Messiah seemed to them absurd. But the world is full of surprises. Humanity is a very incalculable quantity. Predictions as to what it will do or be, are, in all matters of righteousness and genius, strangely liable to be unfulfilled. Men, places and circumstances from whom great things are expected often prove fruitless, while unpromising lives, localities and conditions yield sometimes a wealth of noble thought and character. As Jesus said, "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth: so is everyone that is born of the Spirit."

I could not help thinking of this profound saying when a few weeks ago I made my way up the Tyne from Newcastle to Cherryburn, and read on the stone above the door of one of the very humblest of cottage-buildings the words, "Thomas Bewick born here August, 1753." No doubt in Bewick's time it was a more cared-for and less comfortless place than it appears now, for the small house has been turned into a stable. Yet who could have imagined that from such a rude little dwelling would have come forth the integrity, the fine feeling, the artistic skill, and the large mind of the famous engraver?

Tom Bewick's father had to do with a neighbouring colliery, and hired a few acres of land round his cottage. All about him were rough Northumbrian folk, engaged in the pits or on the fells, men and women with good hearts, but primitive and sometimes barbarous ways. The miners and farmers drank and fought and engaged in cruel sports and practical joking. It was not for some years that a gentler spirit than he felt about him awoke in the boy's breast. The pursuing and killing, he says, of the fox and the hare and the badger never struck him as cruel, until one day in hunting a hare he happened to catch the animal in his arms. The dogs and hunters were all around him, and the poor, terrified creature screamed so piteously, like a child, that he would have given anything to save its life. "In this, however," he tells us, "I was prevented; for a farmer, well known to me, who stood close by, pressed upon me and desired I would give her to him, and from his being better able, as I thought, to save its life, I complied with his wish. This was no sooner done than he proposed to those about him, 'to have a bit more sport with her,' and this was to be done by first breaking one of its legs and then again setting the poor animal off a little distance before the dogs. I wandered away to a little distance, oppressed by my own feelings, and could not join the crew again, but learned with pleasure that their intended victim had made its escape."

This was the beginning of a change in the rough boy's life. His father was fond of him, used to be anxious about him when he went alone up the Tyne fishing, and in the evening would send his shrill whistle after him echoing up the valley in the still air to call him home. His father also loved the early morning, and talked to him of the scenery, and the wild animals, and strange birds he saw in the quiet hours of dawn throughout the year. I do not gather that Bewick learnt much at school besides mischief, but his father's thought and word, and the country round the cottage, opened the lad's eyes to Nature. The lowly little home we may recognise in scores of his woodcuts, though the small square window has been filled up which was at his bed's head, and through which he used to hear the stream in flood-time flow through the orchard. He soon used his own eyes, and before long reached that significant period in a boy's life—a period which does not occur, I am afraid, in all boy's lives—when he preferred to watch a bird or a beast and to love it living than to catch and kill it. He tells us of the last bird he killed. He had knocked it down with a stone. "The little victim dropped from the tree, and I picked it up. It was alive and looked me piteously in the face; and as I thought, could it have spoken, it would have asked me why I had taken away its life. I felt greatly hurt at what I had done, and did not quit it all the afternoon. I turned it over and over, admiring its plumage, its feet, its bill, and every part of it. It was a bullfinch. This was the last bird I killed." And might we not say that here was the beginning of that loving observation which afterwards enabled him to write and illustrate his great books on animal life? Stimulated by his father's example, he also got up early to see the sun rise, and to watch the creatures which then came forth. "I have often thought," he said, "that not one half of mankind knew anything of the beauty, the serenity, and the stillness of the summer mornings in the country, nor have ever witnessed the rising sun's shining forth upon the new day." In winter time, when the snow was on the ground, he rose before it was light, and, hiding himself in the cowshed, watched the birds that came in and out for food and shelter. They were so close to him that he could take account of their species and forms and colours and habits.

Thus it was, when he was apprenticed to an engraver in Newcastle, and he learned to draw, and he was employed to illustrate children's books, he turned to the subjects so familiar and dear to him, and produced woodcuts of thrushes and squirrels, dogs and sheep, trees and streams and fields, and, above all, his father's little house—which, indeed, appears so often in his work, at all stages, that it might be almost his sign-manual, as if he intended to say "Thomas Bewick did this."

Bewick, let us remember, lived before Wordsworth, and was older than Burns. He preceded these poets in drawing attention to the beauty and dignity of God's humbler creatures. Until he gave his genius to them they were thought beneath an artist's or a poet's notice. For a long time English society had forgotten the one hundred and fourth psalm and its glorious praise of God for His handiwork in land and sky and water, mountains and valleys and rivers, the grass and the herbs and the cedars of Lebanon, the sun and moon, the light and darkness, the wild asses on the hills, the stork among the firs, the rabbits in the rocks, cattle and singing birds, wild beasts and fishes, rain and wind and tempest. Our taste had grown artificial and mean and atheistic. And good Thomas Bewick, with Burns and Wordsworth, brought us back to simplicity and Nature and God.

When his apprenticeship was finished he went for a long walking tour into the Highlands of Scotland, and he saw with a delight he could scarcely express, the grandeur of the scenery, and the charm of the people. He is the first Englishman I am acquainted with who speaks with enthusiasm of the lakes and mountains of Scotland. "I gazed upon them," he says, "with wonder and ecstasy." This was in 1776, when Dr. Johnson, who despised Nature and, above all, Scotland, was at the height of his fame and the monarch of poetic taste in London. Avoiding the towns, Bewick made his way among the peasantry, and both loved and was loved by them, though he found it difficult to make them understand his English. "These kind, these hospitable people," he wrote, many years afterwards, "I have never forgotten." And again he described them as "these unpolished, unspoiled, honourable and kind people."

Then, from the Highlands he went to London and felt the difference. He was there not quite nine months, and considered that too long. The luxury on the one hand, and the poverty, the degraded poverty, on the other, were new to him and painful. Still more painful was the vice of the great city. The poor girls in the streets wrung his very soul. He had seen nothing half so distressing at Cherryburn or at Newcastle or in the Highlands. "I determined,"

* Preached at Oakfield-road Church, Clifton, on Sunday, June 23.

he says, "to return home. The country of my old friends, the scenery of Tyneside, seemed altogether to form a Paradise for me, and I longed to see it again. While I was thus turning these matters over in my mind, my warm friend and patron, Isaac Taylor, waited upon me; and on my telling him I was going to Newcastle, he inquired how long it would be before I returned. 'Never,' was my reply; at which he seemed both surprised and displeased. . . I told him that no temptation of gain, of honour, or of anything else, however great, could ever have any weight with me; and that I would even enlist for a soldier or go and herd sheep at 5s. a week, as long as I lived, rather than be tied to live in London. . . After a very short passage I arrived in sight of St. Nicholas' Church steeple about the 22nd June, 1777."

And I can never see that same steeple in reality or in Bewick's pictures—where it is pretty frequent—without thinking of these words. Bewick's worldly prospects were high in London. He had what would be called "a distinguished career" open to him, with the promise of position and wealth. But all this he put aside, like a true artist, in order to be among the things and persons he loved and admired, and to devote himself to them. He preferred to be a comparatively poor and unknown man in a provincial town and work out his highest ideals undistracted by the show and folly and wickedness of men. It is a lesson for all who have talent and power. How frequently those with gifts are tempted to use them to obtain riches or social distinction, as if it were the object of gifts to produce something far less than themselves! Bewick was not tempted, he was superior to temptation. His nature was too healthy and strong and sound.

So he went back to Newcastle and to his old master and to his old occupation of illustrating books. And every Saturday for the next eight years he set out along the Tyne to spend the week-end with his father and mother at Cherryburn. After his close work as an engraver during the week, he liked nothing so much as the ten-mile walk to the little cottage on the fells, and a day or two with his old parents among the familiar scenes. Snow-storms, floods, dark nights did not deter him. On starting out he never looked to see whether it was a good day or a bad one—the worst that ever fell from the skies did not prevent his undertaking the journey. Water was nothing to him, he waded through pools and river. His clothes dried on him. He had so habituated himself to temperance and exercise that neither wet nor cold had any bad effect upon him. He never touched spirits. He slept with doors and windows open, so that a draught of air, and sometimes snow, blew through his room. He lay down rolled in a blanket upon a mattress as hard as he could make it, and slept the sweet sleep of the just. Is it surprising that he felt a sort of fellow-feeling with the monks of the olden time, for their early rising and scorn of soft living and devotion to study and labour in the fields? Bewick was one of the first to discover the great and noble side of the Middle Ages. One place he loved in London, and that was Westminster Abbey.

Of course he was thought eccentric—now he is thought wise. His weekly journeys to Cherryburn seemed to some of his acquaintance insane. "But," he replies, "my stimulant, as well as my reward, was in seeing my father and mother in their happy home. I always reflected that this would have an end." The time comes to every son and daughter when the father and mother are no longer to be visited, when the kind features and sweet embrace of those who brought him into the world may no longer be seen and felt. The voice will be silent, and it will be too late to ask for the things which they alone could tell. We do not realise, we cannot realise adequately, what it is to have a father and a mother. Each of us has but one; and if that one be good, who is there that can be better?

And besides this supreme gratification of seeing his parents, there was the pleasure and the education of seeing the changing year, and, by careful observation of it, "of living," as he says, "double one's time." In winter, he tells us, "to be placed in the midst of a wood in the night in whirlwinds of snow, while the tempest howled above my head, was sublimity itself, and drew forth aspirations to Omnipotence such as had not warmed my imagination so highly before." In spring he stopped to admire the dangling woodbine and roses, and the grasses powdered or spangled with pearly drops of dew; and week after week, as the season advanced, he loved the continued succession of plants and wild flowers. As summer came on he rose earlier and earlier to greet the sun. And when the autumn arrived he thought that the most beautiful of all. The yellow harvest of the fields, the fruit in the orchards, the varying foliage of the fading woods, the falling leaves, the gathering in flocks of the small birds, filled him with grateful and solemn reflections.

Need I say that Thomas Bewick was religious? Under the rugged exterior was a tender and reverent spirit. His republican pity for all weak and gentle things, which in atheistic minds is so apt to run to waste in sentimental gush, and then to dry up into cynicism, was kept pure and perennial by the religion of our Lord Jesus Christ. He lived all his life with Nature, and he understood her, both her sternness and her sweetness, and he honoured her ways. He would, I am confident, have equally despised our modern cockney talk about Nature "red in tooth and claw," and our modern callousness to animal pain "in the interests of science." Such aberrations belong together, and are due ultimately to want of faith in the constitution of things. In all his work Bewick knew he was in touch with the Hand of God; and, therefore, his interest never flagged, and his own strong pitman's hand grew more skilful and refined in its touch to the end. At the time of his death he was engaged on some very beautiful plates of fishes.

In the same way, his affection for his father and mother and his old home was deepened and sustained by his love for God. As he looked into their eyes he felt the sacred mystery in them of the divine Spirit. Their commands to him were the more solemn because of the law of God behind them. And their plain little house was rich with associations and relationships which extended far beyond itself. No man has really loved until he has grasped and held the great truth of immortality.

Bewick's theological views have a special interest for us. They approximated more and more to what is called "Unitarianism." He was independent and liberal, and disposed to sum up Christianity in the two great principles of love to God and love to man. He did not agree, he said, with Moses about the creation of the world. In a number of ways he was unorthodox. And he objected to creeds. I have great pleasure in quoting the following lines, for they express the principle of the open trust on which this church is founded:—"The clergy ought not to be sworn to any belief nor trammelled with any creeds, but only to promise with the help of God to instil into the minds of their hearers the purest religious adoration of the Omnipotent and the best maxims of morality."

In all that Bewick did and said there was a healthy, noble commonsense. Too often religion is supposed not to have to do with commonsense. In some forms it does not seem to do so. But how shall we describe the religion of Jesus Christ but as just an inspired commonsense, as reason in its highest mood, that exalted commonsense to which men ever turn again after their sinful and foolish vagaries, and find strength?

THE VAN MISSION:

THE outstanding incident of last week is reported from Stevenage, near Hitchin. Formal application was made to the local Council some time ago for permission to hold the meeting on the Bowling Green, the recognised site for public gatherings. The permission was refused, the local paper announcing that Unitarians were not wanted by the Council. When the Missioners came to Stevenage intent on finding another site they found a large village at the junction of two main roads, which were cheek by jowl for a quarter of a mile or more, the Bowling Green being a series of plots big enough for a sham fight. It seemed a pity that not one little corner of this splendid space could be spared to us for an hour. The only condition, however, would have been that we should come along with the "other gipsies" at the Fair time in September. The Van accordingly turned aside from the main street, and a halt was called on the Letchmore Common, amid the poorer folk of the village. Here Rev. W. H. Rose, the missioner, and Mr. Talbot made preparations for a meeting. Mrs. Roper and Rev. C. Roper, who had not yet returned to London, were also present. Shortly after the proceedings began the police arrived with instructions that the Van should be removed, and the missioners had no option but to leave it in a paddock. They then repaired to the Bowling Green, improvised a banner, took a stand beside the dried-up village fountain, and tried again. On Friday evening the Van paraded the village from tea time, and was kept moving within a space of about a hundred yards during the meeting. Rev. T. P. Spedding uttered a public protest against the action of the individual member (or members) of the Council who had interfered with the Letchmore Common meeting, and stated that Stevenage was the only place where the Mission had so far experienced official intolerance.

No. 1 Van finished with good meetings at Dewsbury and shows a very considerable improvement in the matter of attendances, largely due to the slight improvement in the weather. Rev. J. Ruddle as Missioner was assisted by Revs. H. Cross, W. R. Shanks, and A. Amey, and the Dewsbury congregation took part in the gatherings. The same gentlemen helped Rev. R. McGee, of Blackpool, who took charge of the meetings at Ossett. The Mission opened with an attendance of 60. On the second evening a children's meeting was held, and this proved an admirable means of getting at the adults, who came in to the number of 300, and next night 370. There were some lively passages at question time. Normanton was the next stage in the journey, and the Van is now at Castleford, with Rev. O. Binns, of Scarborough. On Monday it moves to Pontefract, and to Hemsworth and Doncaster afterwards, in charge of Rev. J. Ellis, District Minister for the Yorkshire Union.

No. 2 Van reports good meetings at Auchinleck, where Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman, of Burnley, was Missioner. One evening the attendance was as high as 140. A reporter who called at the Van assured Mr. Whiteman that a good impression had been made at Old Camnock in the previous week. At Auchinleck the audience suggested that Mr. Whiteman should devote one evening to "Religion and Social Problems." He complied, and a good audience assembled. The rain, however, broke up the meeting, but a number of interested hearers remained until 11 o'clock. Good work appears to have been done in this village. At Mauchline, the next stopping place, there is serious depression due to the closing of the quarries, which found employment for a large number of men. Local conditions of this kind nearly always foreshadow small meetings, and Mauchline gave very little show of interest at the outset. A score of adults and as many children put an in appearance, but gave very little response even to so inviting a subject as "Burns' Teaching about Religion." The interest increased, however, as the days wore on, and 130 adults were present at the largest meeting. Rev. E. T. Russell took the week-end meetings, and Rev. J. Forrest and Mrs. Forrest have now joined the van for the month of July, and are at present engaged at Ayr. On Monday they move to Prestwick, and to Troon, probably on the 12th or 13th.

No. 3 Van came to Baldock from Biggleswade, and the meetings were good for so small a place. They never, however, exceeded 100. The Rev. C. Roper, who was missioner, writes:—"I felt that at both places if we could have remained for a week very large audiences would have resulted. We were treated with kindness and courtesy at both places. Of course, we found fanatics, but I believe that even they had a better feeling towards us at the end than they had at the beginning. They, at any rate, admitted their belief in our honesty and disinterestedness. What struck me particularly was the fact that even those {who were lay preachers admitted in conversation that they were intellectually in advance of their creeds, but that the constant use of the old orthodox phraseology kept them emotionally and sentimentally within the fold." After leaving Baldock the Van travelled to Stevenage, where Rev. W. H. Rose, of Walthamstow, took charge. Here is situated the large factory of the Educational Supply Company, where a large number of men are employed. It was hoped to find sympathisers among these, but unfortunately—from the Van point of view—the factory was working overtime, and the workpeople passed only when the meetings were half over. On one evening Mr. Talbot estimated that 200 must have been present during some part of the meeting, but the attendance at one time never exceeded 60. The Bowling Green, it transpired, is regularly used for open air services by the Baptists on Sunday, and the missioners, desiring to avoid any friction, after the episode on Thursday, left early on Sunday morning for Hitchin, where they opened the mission in the evening with a gathering of 250. On Thursday Luton was visited by Mr. E. Capleton, of Stepney, who moves on Monday to Dunstable, and he will be succeeded on Thursday at Tring by Rev. F. Summers.

No. 4 Van.—Good meetings were anticipated at Swadlincoote, and it had been arranged to spend an extra night there in consequence. Rain, however, spoiled the attendance during Rev. J. E. Stead's visit, and only on the last night was there a larger attendance than 100, the number then reaching 30. Rev. Lucking Tavenor of Ipswich, took the address, and was assisted by Rev. T. P. Spedding. At Burton a handful of our friends have been holding services for the last nine years, and the visit of the Van was eagerly expected. Before a company of 500 people Mr. Tavenor recalled the fact that Edward Wightman, the last English Unitarian who was burned for his faith, was born at Burton in 1560. He was accused of sixteen "heretical, execrable and unheard-of opinions, by the instinct of Satan, by him excogitated and holden," and judged to be "an obstinate and incorrigible heretic, and left under the sentence of the greater excommunication." Wightman was burned at Lichfield on April 11, 1612, and to the old Cathedral town the van came after the successful meetings at Burton. The toll-collector had refused permission for a meeting in the market-place, and the Van was taken to the Green Hill. The missioner's opinions created no stir, however. "It is hopeless to expect to do anything," says Mr. Tavenor. "We held a meeting, but it was one of eighty noisy, fighting children." Rev. W. Wilson, of Manchester College, Oxford, and Mr. James Steel, are with the van at Rugeley and Stafford, and on Thursday Rev. F. Allen, of London, will join at Stone.

The attendances for the week are about 4,000.

ABSENCE of occupation is not rest,
A mind quite vacant is a mind distressed.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

For some years past the Degree Day at the Victoria University of Manchester has proved a happy inauguration of the Unitarian Home Missionary College annual examination week. This year was no exception to the rule, and the college was well represented at the robing ceremony both in the Divinity and Arts Faculties on Saturday last. In the former the Rev. H. J. Rossington, M.A., a former student of the college, was the only candidate who qualified this year for the B.D. degree, and his solitary success was well cheered by the undergraduates at the robing. In the Arts faculty Mr. Walter Short, a present student, was awarded the insignia, in cap and gown, of the B.A. degree. A further and even more interesting robing ceremony had taken place earlier in the same week, when the first student of the College to take a Doctor's degree was thus capped. Unfortunately, the ceremony took place too far away for any of his fellow-students to be present, but the news of Mr. Thackray's success at Harvard has given great pleasure to the professors and students of the college. Dr. Thackray, who had previously taken his M.A. degree at Victoria, has been spending a year at Harvard as a Hibbert Scholar, and he is expected home during the present week.

The private examination was conducted by the visitors, Dr. Mellone and the Rev. P. Moore, on Monday, and the public examination of the students followed the day after. At the conclusion of the examination the chair was taken by Principal Gordon, and a large number of ministers and friends assembled in the libraries of the college. The senior Visitor, the Rev. Philemon Moore, delivered the Visitor's address.

THE VISITOR'S ADDRESS.

Having spoken in his address on various aspects of their studies, including the place of philosophy in the formation and criticism of doctrine, Professor Moore concluded as follows:—

The history of religion among men is a history of the continuous feeling for and striving after higher and higher conceptions of God, more and more adequate and perfect modes of interpreting and understanding His operations in man and nature, and His relation to mankind and all inferior things. In all the infinitely manifold universe some thinkers have had their souls impressed with wonders of one kind, others with those of another kind. The true, the beautiful, the good have called for votaries, and have called for seers to interpret to others their claims. No generation has, perhaps, been without its quota of great men, who have seen new visions and added new penetration into the divine heart and mind and character. No clime has been without its witnesses. The thought and inner life of mankind, as a whole, has been beyond all comprehension enriched progressively throughout the entire life-course of the human race. The life has been enriched, and the thought interpreting the life has been ever expanding. Now, only from history, in sequence and in comparison, can all this wealth be known; only by the study of history—including, of course, religious biography—can we or any one of us gather it up: It exists there in greater abundance than we can ever collect in full, or comprehend and assimilate in whole. If we are not philosophers we must draw our religious sustenance largely thence: and if we are we must draw many of the chief data for our thought from the same unexhausted source. But to be valid for either purpose it must all be assimilated to ourselves, and so lose the externality which belongs to historical facts as such. And illustrating by the highest case: the teachings of Jesus are historical, and can only be learnt from history, but as nurture for our religious life they are no longer history. The experience which revealed them to him must be repeated to us, so as to reveal them to us again. Then they are a precious portion of ourselves, to live by on the one hand, and on the other to furnish ultimate facts for consideration or subordination, and for rational construction into a satisfying intellectual system, comprehending under our unifying principle, which must in the degree of its perfection reproduce the divine thought, all the multiplicity of our varied experiences, and giving us the religious system, without which the thoughtful mind can find no rest.

It has been said of late that Unitarians are in some danger of losing the reputation they once enjoyed for hard thinking upon the deeper religious problems which stir the passing times. In religious thought, i.e., in theology, a state of satisfied attainment is always a condition of decay. New life and renewed life is ever demanded to minister to others' life. The deep things of the spirit can only be interpreted and justified to the world without as the result of sustained penetration within.

Go on in your chosen path of duty, faithful to the spirit in which you have taken it up. Never be content to rest long on your achievements. New tasks and duties, new opportunities and possibilities will continue to await you, until, at the ends of lives of faithful service, you hear the Master's glad "Well done!"

At the close of the address the Principal remarked that they were meeting for the first time to hold their annual examinations under their own roof-tree. Before passing to the successes of the year he paid a tender tribute of affection and regard to the memory of former students of the college who had died during the year—W. Robinson, W. Oates, J. Cuckson, and J. Mis-kimmin. Of the late Mr. Cuckson he said he had filled the pulpit of Dr. Channing, with Dr. Brooke Herford between, and had finished his earthly ministry in the church of the Pilgrim Fathers. In addition to the University successes named above, the Principal announced that Mr. E. Morgan, B.A., had taken a step towards his B.D., having passed in the specially selected subject. In the classes at Owen's College some good work had been done by the younger men, and he specially named Mr. L. Clare, who had taken six first classes and been awarded prizes in Greek, Latin, English Literature, and English History. The prizes were then presented. The Sharpe Prize of £10 for Biblical studies was handed to Mr. H. Warnock; the Bibby Greek Prize of £3 was given to Mr. W. McMullen; the Rawson English Literature Prize of £5 5s. was divided between Mr. H. Warnock and Mr. T. Munn; while a special book prize was given to Mr. S. Kiss, the Hungarian student. The certificate of the college was presented to the four outgoing students, and the meeting closed with hymn and prayer.

VALEDICTORY SERVICE.

The Valedictory Service was held in the evening, as usual, in Cross-street Chapel. The Longsight Free Church provided the choir, and Mr. O. H. Heys was the organist. The Rev. W. H. Drummond delivered the valedictory address, taking for his text Acts xx. 32. This he characterised as one of the noblest farewells in history, having about it none of the usual sadness of farewell but only the confidence of faith. Such a farewell he would speak to them on behalf of their college and on behalf of many outside friends. It was a word of farewell and God-speed rather than a welcome into the ministry he had to give: In doing so he asked them not to forget, as they would not be forgotten. The priceless lessons of the College, the spirit of its teaching, the height and dignity of the truth of God it had set forth, these should be always remembered. All the same they were now going out to face the practical difficulties and duties of Christian service, and the quiet of college days was behind them. He begged them to take with them charity, which was more than any intellectual distinction, and to remember to be ministers of a Gospel rather than to aim at being exponents and defenders of a particular theology. The life to which they were going was a special vocation. If, therefore, it was the highest wisdom to be content to be ignorant of some things, so it was part of the wisdom of the minister's life to leave a great many things alone, and to concentrate on religious work. Their real work would be to make God real to men, to make the Gospel a living power; to minister to those in sorrow; to go to those stained with passion and sin, and to those who were drifting in the bewilderment of modern thought, and to say, simply but earnestly to all, God lives and loves.

Addressing the three Irish students who are leaving, he said it was with very deep feeling he wished them God-speed in their new life. He did so especially as representing the Irish Non-subscribing Churches. "We," he said, "knew you before your College knew you. We sent you forward to this work, and we have watched your career from a distance with interest and growing sympathy. And now we pray for you that wherever your lot may be cast, you may have the grace and generosity of an Irish heart, and that your lips may be touched with something of the Irish eloquence: And may God be with you, and guard you." To the Hungarian student who is leaving Mr. Drummond also addressed a touching personal word, and expressed the hope that his residence in England had taught him that the things which unite men are deeper than those which divide.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME, and if private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the senders.]

AN URGENT PROBLEM.

SIR,—On the first reading of Mr. Whitaker's interesting letter, I felt that he must be grateful to me for giving him the opportunity to dissociate himself from the opinions of the author of the book reviewed; and I tendered a mental apology for the imputed phrase: "the Absolute Christ."

But on looking closer, I find my memory to be rightly charged with the term "absolute" as applied to Jesus by Mr. Whitaker: the "Absolute Christ" was my memory-rendering of his phrase "Jesus as absolute."

Before proceeding, I may say that I deprecate looking like the inquisitor of my friend's views. For such a rôle as that I have no authority whatever. I am indebted simply to the judgment of the the courtesy of the reviewer, for editor, and permission to make my observations.

It is desirable, nevertheless, that a critic's point of view should be made known. Mysteries may then become less mysterious. If now a summing-up of Mr. Whitaker's reply be made for the benefit of the average reader, I would venture the following diagnosis of his position: (1) Christianity is religion, i.e., is absolute religion.

(2) The ideal of man has come "full circle," so that we know our further progress will be within that ideal; not beyond it.

(3) Jesus is absolute, and presumably perfect, having embodied the ideal "of perfect human goodness." He is the "full circle." This is further illustrated in Mr. Whitaker's beautiful sermon on "Mediated Religion" (INQUIRER, Sept. 1, 1906, p. 574), to which I now have access: "He is our living sacrament—at once both symbol of loving mercy and fact of it, shadow and substance, revelation and reality. . . . To know Christ is to know the love of God, and to know it in the fullest way possible to men. . . . 'Christ' stands for undying love of all the good, of all the Christs . . . bearing our transgressions, bringing to us the salvation of the Cross."

Jesus is "absolute," as we have seen: "Christ" is as certainly absolute, if words mean anything. Is this inclusive and all-embracing Christ identical with the historic Jesus of Nazareth?

Again let me thank your reviewer for his frankness, and assure him that, however much I may dissent from his point of view, I none the less appreciate his delicate and scholarly handling of theological and philosophical problems. I fear, nevertheless, that the difficulties which beset Professor Burman Foster will be encountered as acutely by Mr. Whitaker, should he attempt a detailed account and defence of his own position.

Here are a few matters raised between us which I will briefly discuss:—

(1) As a believer in religious evolution, I agree with the Harnack dictum that to answer the question "What is Christianity?" we cannot restrict ourselves to Jesus Christ's teaching alone. But I contend that the added religious experience of nineteen centuries may no more be imputed to Jesus than the richer religious experience of Jesus may be rightly imputed to Isaiah or the Psalmists.

The cases are analogous, and stand or fall together. Moreover, the fundamental teaching of Jesus, the teaching which we may believe was actually his, finds no place for the exaltation which "Mediated Religion" thrusts upon him. The whole idea is foreign to the simple message of Personal Repentance; and the Kingdom of God, as represented by such figures as the growth of the Mustard Seed.

(2) The argument of "the crowning of Love as king in man's heart" effectually disposes of the claim "absolute" for Jesus, as for Mohammed. It was Judaism, not Christianity, which proclaimed in the mouth of the lawyer "Love God . . . and thy neighbour as thyself" (Luke x, 26-29). Judaism, not Christianity, spoke in the words of Jesus, in answer to the question, Which is the great commandment of the law? "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God. . . . Thou shalt love thy neighbour. . . . On these two commandments hangeth the whole law and the prophets" (Matt. xxii, 35 to 40).

The form of the imperative was ancient; but the content may be ever richer. Centuries before Jesus, the Buddha laid down the law of love. Lao-tze told his readers "By virtue of love a man shall rule the world." Lao-tze counselled the effort after Perfection. Jesus declared "Be ye perfect." But it is quite possible that every age has a different ideal of perfection.

I am reminded here of Mr. Whitaker's somewhat guarded words—"The further progress of our race within the limits of humanity" (italics mine), and one of his tests of an absolute religion—"Does it make man supreme in his own sphere?"—in his sermon, "Religion is God-in-action." Yet I cannot think we are intended to believe Jesus, the man, is this supreme God-in-action. If not, then let us say with Jesus, "Be ye perfect: even as your Father in heaven is perfect": without limits.

I submit that no religion has yet unfolded the reality of final and perfect goodness, either in theory or in practice. Notwithstanding his reservations concerning Jesus as absolute, Mr. Whitaker still can speak of "enlarging aspirations and assimilations in every age of every aspect of the human ideal, that can be worked up into practical human life."

(3) I would throw out the suggestion that a purer intellectual conception of God, however incomplete, is not without effect on the moral conception. We who cannot say with Jesus, "I beheld Satan fallen as lightning from heaven," nor hold his limited notions of the universe, are by very reason of the absence of these limitations, and with the sequel of a wider and grander intellectual view of the workings of God, assisted towards a higher moral view.

Finally, in my opinion, our reviewer makes evolution halt; invents a special theory of an ultimate morality, already reached; divides the human being into water-tight compartments, so to speak; all in the interest of his particular theory of the supreme value of Jesus. For all this, up to the present, he has offered no grounds. May we invite Mr. Whitaker to state his grounds for his conception of Jesus; how Jesus comes to be absolute, and as "Christ" stands for all human goodness?

H. D. ROBERTS.

WITH THE VAN.

SIR,—My brief experience of one week on No. 1 Mission Van would not justify me in attempting to write a comprehensive article, describing the whole work of the Mission, and weighing its merits and defects with the precision of a man of science. Yet it may be a sufficient excuse for writing a brief letter. My first feeling is a wonder at myself that in all these years, until this van was built and had been in use one whole season and part of another, I had never dared to speak out of doors. It is a thing worth doing. My very first attempt was a lesson to me, if to no other listener. With a miscellaneous group of strangers before me, just near enough to be within earshot if anything good should be said, but also far enough away to be able to disown all connection with me and my message if the word spoken should be unacceptable, I felt that several of the things I meant to say would simply be dispersed in empty air. I must lay hold quickly of the main thought, put it into simple words and attempt to drive it home. To be compelled thus rapidly and decisively to choose among the things I intended to say just those words that could have some meaning to an audience only partially in sympathy, and not particularly inquisitive, was a kind of discipline that one never forgets. My experience at Mirfield has an abiding value.

In the course of the week's duty on the van I took every available opportunity to make myself acquainted with the contents of the little series of blue-coloured tracts or pamphlets issued by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Some of these I had read before, but a number of them were new to me. I was many times delighted to find how admirably they are adapted to just such work as the mission does. Brief, but perfectly intelligible, dealing with living issues, appealing to the candour and good sense of the reader, they form a set of tracts of which we have a right to be proud, and of which we are bound in duty to make good use. I could name two or three especially, but prefer not to do so. They are an admirable series for mission work as a whole.

While we were at Mirfield, standing on ground which we had paid for leave to occupy, and while I was trying, not wholly without success, to hold together a group of people to listen to a specimen of Unitarian teaching, along came a band of people organised by a combination of Evangelical churches, took their stand almost close beside us (but just off the paying mark), and with their ready made congregation and group of leading singers, fairly swept my few listeners off their ground. They came, they sang, they conquered. [This was not an extemporised opposition. I understand, the meeting had been arranged some weeks previously.]

That reminds me, that where we have no settled congregation, perhaps, nay certainly, in some places where we have one, a very great difficulty is to get any adequate response to the announcement of "The first hymn on the paper." We are badly in want of a Sankey, a man who shall be able so boldly and beautifully to sing some simple verse that every passer by with any soul of music or devotion in him will wish to join in the chorus.

To join in the chorus. Yes, that Unitarian Sankey will surely find a hymn somewhere that has a chorus. The admirable little book "Hymns of the Liberal Faith," from which our van hymns are mostly selected, is really more suitable for indoor devotional meetings than for outdoor missionary purposes. Meantime there are those among us who have the gift of song, one or two to whom the writing of cheerful and devotional songs comes as naturally as humming to a bee. They will give us a chorus doubtless, but who will go round and sing it?

Our message must be sung as well as said. We have something to say to the people. It must be said in our best words and sung in our best notes. We must, in our speaking, compel an Amen from even the unwilling listener, we must start a song and chorus that will bring back an echo richer and deeper than the original sound.

"It is glorious to be in the midst of a great struggle," said one of your contributors the other day in an admirable letter. It is glorious to speak the right word, to sing the effective verse, to awaken even late in life to the fact that God meant us to be missionaries, and gave us sense, and courage, and voice for that express purpose.

J. RUDDLE.

P.S.—On looking over the above, I find that it is mostly founded on my Mirfield experience. We did better in Dewsbury; did very nearly as we ought to do. But things that are all right Mr. Spedding will report. Our most valuable experiences are often those which leave us somewhat short of being content.

A ROGUE AND A VAGABOND.

SIR,—I ought to have written before now to have begged space for a cry of "Stop Thief." A young man, I am told, of attractive appearance, has for three months past been begging of Unitarian ministers and others in Manchester and the district, giving my name for reference, and artfully appealing to the compassion of those he addressed by the statement of how much I had done and would yet do for him if only I knew his circumstances. He has generally obtained a meal and often a small gratuity to keep him going while inquiry was made of me. The result was well known to him, and of course he did not return to face it. I have had some fifteen letters about him which, of course, I have had to answer, and I find three more and a telegram awaiting me on my return from Norway. Some thirty letters, so much time and money spent over a worthless fellow—not to make him better—it were worth a thousand letters to do that—but to encourage him in lying and theft and impress upon him the lesson of the gullibility of the public when cunningly approached. And where is the fault? The experience of many years has convinced me of the folly of giving without inquiry to people of whom I know nothing. I may have been unfortunate, but it is the fact that not once have I met with an honest beggar, or at least with one who, having received alms or promises of help, proved his honesty by returning to report himself and hear what I had found out about him. And beggars in the name of religion are the worst, as they are the most persuasive.

I venture to suggest to my friends and brethren in the ministry to make it a rule not to give to anyone without inquiry, if the case seems urgent (which it never really is) by telegram. It is easier and more comforting to oneself to give than to take the trouble to ask questions and write about the case. But to the other self it is far better to learn that lies don't pay than it were to get a sixpence or even a meal. If ministers would say to every unknown applicant, "I will make inquiries about you and do my best to help you, if what you tell me is true," there would very soon be none of this kind of impostor about, and no need of writing letters of use only to extort this protest of your obedient servant,

CHARLES HARGROVE.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEAL.

London Domestic Mission: Bell-street.—Since the Rev. S. H. Street has been obliged to relinquish his ministry, there is the more urgent reason for maintaining all the helpful agencies of the Mission. One immediate need is to provide for the Sunday-school excursions and other summer outings, and an appeal for necessary funds is made to friends who have contributed in former years, and to others who may be willing now to help. Donations should be sent to Miss C. R. Holland, 4, Reddington-road, Hampstead, N.W.

Ainsworth.—All the space for graves in the chapel yard having for some time been used up, the trustees succeeded in securing a plot of land near by, which they converted into a burial ground at a total cost of £900. The opening ceremony took place on Saturday, June 22, commencing at 5.30 p.m., with a short beautiful service in the chapel, conducted by the Rev. R. M. Scott, resident minister. At the close the minister, trustees, and congregation walked in procession to the new graveyard, when Mr. George T. Woolley, of Brookside, Kersall, Manchester, senior trustee, after a few appropriate remarks, opened the gates, and, with the minister, entered the yard, followed by the congregation, and all joined in singing the hymn, "O God, our help in ages past." After tea in the schoolroom a pleasant evening was spent, during which the trustees presented the chapel wardens with the key of the new gates and a plan of the graveyard.

Ashton-under-Lyne.—The Richmond Hill Church has lost a generous supporter and one of the pioneers of the movement through the death of Mr. Samuel Taylor on June 22, in his 85th year. Mr. Taylor, who came to Ashton from the Wigan mining district as a young man, had stirring memories of the Chartist agitation, in which he took a prominent part. On his eighty-third birthday he entertained the scholars of the Unitarian, the New Jerusalem, the Labour Church, and the Spiritualists' Lyceum Sunday-schools to tea at the Central Hall. For sixty years he was a total abstainer and non-smoker. The funeral service at the Richmond-hill Church and at the Manchester Crematorium was conducted by the Rev. John Barron.

Belfast: First Church.—The Rev. H. J. Rossington, M.A., was installed as minister of the First Presbyterian Church, Rosemary-street, at a special service held at noon, on Friday, June 20. The Rev. Dr. Mellone, of Holywood, conducted the first part of the service, and preached an impressive sermon. Principal Gordon then made a statement showing how that church was the oldest existing representative of the Presbyterianism introduced into Ireland by the early Scotch settlers, who came over for the sake of freedom long before subscription to the Westminster Confession of Faith had been made compulsory in that country among Presbyterians generally. That freedom from subscription to any form of purely theological dogma they still retained as one of their most precious privileges; but all that was spiritual, all that was devotional, and all that was in their humble opinion desirable in the Presbyterian form of Church government they continued to adopt. In accordance therewith that congregation had met to instal as their minister Mr. Rossington, of whose high character, learning, and devotion Mr. Gordon spoke in very appreciative terms. The Moderator of the Presbytery of Antrim (Rev. W. S. Smith) then ascended the pulpit, and having briefly explained the method of installation adopted by that Presbytery, called upon Mr. Rossington to make a statement of his principles and object in devoting himself to the Christian ministry in that church. In response Mr. Rossington gave an admirable statement of his religious principles, and expressed an earnest desire to prove a worthy minister of the Gospel of our Lord and Master Jesus Christ. Affirmative replies having been made to the usual questions as to the congregation adhering to its unanimous call and to the minister's acceptance thereof, the officiating ministers and those present, together with many representatives of the congregation, gave Mr. Rossington the right hand of fellowship, and cordially welcomed him amongst them. After devout prayer, led by the Moderator, the charge to minister and people was given by the Rev. William Napier, of Clough, after which the service closed by the singing of the dismissal hymn. The service was followed by luncheon at the Grand Central Hotel, under the presidency of Mr. John Rogers.

Birmingham.—The annual Scholars' Service, in connection with the Midland Sunday-school Association, was held on Sunday, June 23, in the Town Hall. The great hall was crowded with scholars and friends. The service was conducted by the Rev. W. G. Topping (Oldbury), and the Rev. T. Paxton, of Newhall Hill, gave an address on "Keep to the Right." Special hymns were sung by the scholars, and the choir of the Church of the Messiah sang the anthem, "Judge Me, O Lord" (Mozart). The service was in every way a great success. The collection amounted to £6 2s. 5d.

Dudley.—The Council of the Midland Christian Union met at the Old Meeting House on Wednesday evening, June 26, under the presidency of Mr. Byng Kenrick, who paid a warm tribute to the memory of Mr. A. W. Worthington, J.P., of Stourbridge, and proposed a resolution of high appreciation and sympathy with his relatives. This was seconded by the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury. In the course of subsequent business the question of Advisory Committees was introduced by the President, and after discussion referred for further consideration to the next meeting. After tea a service was held, when the Rev. J. Page Hopps was the preacher.

London: Bell-street Mission (Resignation).—The Rev. S. H. Street, B.A., has been obliged, on account of ill-health, to resign the charge of the Mission, to which he came in 1903 as successor to the late B. Kirkman Gray. The resignation has been accepted by the committee with expressions of great regret and sympathy, and the hope for Mr. Street's speedy recovery.

London: Blackfriars Mission and Stamford street Chapel (Farewell Presentation).—A social meeting was held in the schoolroom on Monday evening to bid farewell to the Rev. W. L. and Mrs. Tucker, who, after three years of service, are relinquishing the work of the Mission. In the course of the evening Mr. S. S. Tayler, the patriarch of the congregation, took the chair, and Mr. A. A. Tayler reported letters of regret for absence from Mr. C. F. Pearson and Mr. J. S. Lister. The chairman, in bidding farewell to Mr. Tucker, said that he had known twelve ministers at Stamford street, and no one had put a better, kinder spirit into the work than Mr. Tucker. He had kept them together in an excellent way, and had given them three years of hard and faithful work. They did not wish him to go, but appreciated his reason for relinquishing the work, which was a tax on any man's strength. Mr. Welch, an old member of the congregation added a few kindly words of appreciation, and the Rev. V. D. Davis, on behalf of Mr. Tucker's brother ministers, joined in the farewell to him and Mrs. Tucker, whose work at the Mission had been warmly appreciated. The chairman, on behalf of the congregation and friends presented a purse of £50 to Mr. and Mrs. Tucker, and said that many of the humbler gifts which had gone to make it up would mean very much to them. Mrs. Tucker first responded, and said she was thankful to know that she had made real friends there. She was very grateful to them all. Mr. Tucker also thanked his friends very warmly for the expressions of their good-will. He was not going away, he said, because he could not work any longer, nor had he lost enthusiasm for the work, but he felt that it would be better done by a younger man, and in the hands of his successor, Mr. John Ballantyne, he was sure that it would go on and prosper. He could not begin to thank his friends individually, but he must mention the name of Mr. Tayler, whose presence was always an inspiration and encouragement to him. It was a happy circumstance that they were meeting on the anniversary of Mr. Tayler's wedding-day, and he congratulated him heartily on the occasion. He offered to them all his heartfelt thanks. At the conclusion of Mr. Tucker's address, youthful enthusiasm in the meeting found expression in the singing of "For he's a jolly good fellow." The Revs. W. Copeland Bowie and T. E. M. Edwards were also present at the meeting.

London: Wandsworth.—The twenty-third anniversary of the Sunday school was celebrated last Sunday, the services, morning, afternoon, and evening, being conducted by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant. In the afternoon it was a special children's service, in the course of which brief addresses were given by three of the teachers—Miss N. Lickis, Mr. H. W. James, and Mr. P. Godding, who were all once scholars in the school. Mr. James also presided at the organ, and one of the hymns, "Forward, Children, Forward!" was sung with great spirit to a new tune of his own. That is one of Mr. Blatchford's hymns, and two others sung at the service were by Mr. Tarrant, one, "Night and day the grasses grow," having been written for the anniversary. A choir of the children also sang a musical setting of two of the Parables—"The Mustard Seed" and "Pharisee and Publican," by Mr. Hugh Atkins.

Maidstone.—After evening service on Sunday, June 23, the Rev. A. Farquharson, on behalf of the congregation, presented Mr. E. Weeks with a real George the Third teapot, over 100 years old, bearing the following inscription: "Presented to Mr. E. Weeks by the members of the congregation of the Maidstone Unitarian Church, in recognition of 24 years' services as collector; June, 1907."

Mansfield.—At the Old Meeting House on Sunday, June 30, the Rev. F. H. Vaughan, in his sermon, alluded to the great loss that had been sustained in the death of Mr. A. W. Worthington, formerly for twenty-one years minister of the chapel. At the close of the service, the "Dead March" was played, and a sincere vote of condolence was passed with Mrs. Worthington and Mrs. Preston.

Newcastle under-Lyme.—On Sunday last the Rev. G. Pegler conducted the 192nd anniversary services of the Old Meeting House. Mr. James, of Woolstanton, gave a splendid rendering of Pugh Evans' "Lead, Kindly Light." The attendance and collections showed considerable advance of last year.

Newport, Mon. (Appointment).—The Rev. Arthur Golland, M.A., assistant minister at Essex Church, London, has accepted an invitation to become the first pastor of the Unitarian Church here, and is expected to take charge of the work in September.

Swinton (Appointment).—Mr. W. McMullen, the retiring senior student of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, has received and accepted a call to the pastorate of the Unitarian Free Church.

Warwick.—Heart-felt reference was made at High-street Chapel, on Sunday last, to the death of Rev. B. Kirkman Gray, formerly minister of the congregation. His memory is deeply cherished in the sister-borough of Warwick, Leamington.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE publish this week the first part of a full report of the summer meeting of the National Conference Union for social service at Oxford. A report of the Missionary Conference last week in Manchester and Dr. Hicks' Carmarthen College address we must hold over until next week.

WE reported last week the close of the session of the Unitarian Home Missionary College in Manchester. Weather interfered with the Garden Party on the Wednesday, but a large company assembled, including Dr. Hopkinson, Vice-Chancellor of the Victoria University; Principal Graham, of Dalton Hall; and Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, President of the College. At the annual dinner of the College Union next day a special feature was the presentation to Colonel Pilcher of a beautifully bound and illustrated copy of the Address presented to him on the occasion of his seventieth birthday. Weather again on Friday made cricket impossible, and the usual match between past and present students had to be abandoned.

SIR W. B. BOWRING, BART., took the chair for the first time as President at the committee meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Essex Hall on Wednesday. Mr. David Martineau, on behalf of the committee, offered him a very cordial welcome and congratulations on his new honour.

THE weather has been very much against the three English Vans during the past week. The Rev. R. McGee and O.

Binns were with No. 1 Van, and on Thursday the Rev. John Ellis joined and will conduct meetings at Doncaster from Monday to Wednesday, with the help of the Revs. H. Thomas and W. Whitaker. Then the Van moves to Bawtry and Retford, with the Rev. W. R. Shanks. No. 2 Van in Scotland has been in the neighbourhood of Ayr, and the Rev. J. and Mrs. Forrest are in charge. No. 3 Van at Hitchin and Luton had good attendances. It has since been at Tring, with the Rev. F. Summers, who moves to Berkhamstead on Monday. He is to be followed by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant at Hemel Hempstead and St. Albans. No. 4 Van which has been at Burton, Litchfield, and Rugeley, and thence to Stafford. This week-end the Rev. T. P. Spedding is with the Van. Longton is on the programme for Monday, and on Thursday Stoke, with the Rev. W. Holmshaw.

THE Country-in-Town Exhibition, at the Whitechapel Art Gallery, opened on July 4 by Mr. Thomas Lough, M.P., in the unavoidable absence of Earl Carrington, remains open until July 18 (from noon to 9.30 p.m. each day). It contains some fascinating things, and most interesting collections of flowers grown in London parks, ferns, and other plants suitable for town cultivation, plants grown from seed by London school children, and many examples of Nature studies by school children, and examples of things exchanged between London and country schools under the Schools' Mutual Aid Scheme. The most fascinating thing is the large model of a recreation ground, 24 ft. square, in which there is provision not only for gardening and games, but for camping and sleeping out, for children's baths, and for mothers with their little ones to rest in the sun or shade. Then there is another model of a roof garden on a Stepney elementary school—the flat roof, three stories up, being the children's playground, now furnished also as a garden. A third model, which is life-size, is of a back yard and garden for an ordinary little London house. Examples of the pottery of the Compton Potters' Arts Guild, originated by Mr. and Mrs. G. F. Watts, are also included, and among the pictures are a number of photographs of delightful school journeys made by some fortunate boys of two London schools.

THE Fourth of July had this year a twofold significance, bringing not only the accustomed celebrations of American independence, welcomed with as much heartiness in this country as across the Atlantic, but also the centenary of the birth of the Italian popular hero, Garibaldi, born at Nice July 4, 1807. Mazzini, who was his senior by two years, does not appeal so strongly to the popular imagination, but he was the greater idealist, and a man of profounder spiritual power. The Garibaldi celebrations in Italy were marked by much enthusiasm. In London an Italian procession made its way to Stafford House, where Garibaldi was a guest when he came to London as the popular hero in 1864, and the President of the Veteran and Garibaldi Society of London placed a bronze laurel wreath beneath the bust of the hero. The Duke of Sutherland, the son of Garibaldi's host, welcomed the company, which included a young grandson, Bruno Garibaldi. The Earl of Crewe, on behalf of English friends, expressed to the Italians their sympathy and reverence on that occasion. The reception of Garibaldi in this country, he said, was no political demonstration. It was a personal welcome. The welcome was to Garibaldi, the man, the hero, and the patriot; and it was in that spirit that they in England desired to honour his memory.

THE American celebration of The Fourth in London was signalled by a speech of Dr. S. L. Clemens (Mark Twain), which had a serious passage to which Englishmen will heartily respond. "Our Fourth of July," he said, "which we love so much, is an English institution, not an American one, and it comes of a great ancestry. The first Fourth of July dates from the day of the Great Charter—the day on which Magna Charta was born. Portions of the liberties secured by the hearty barons from the reluctant King John are part of our Declaration of Independence. The next Fourth of July was born in the times of Charles I., when there came the Bill of Rights, which we inherit. The next was the establishment of that principle which remains to this day—'no taxation without representation.' And the last—there are four of these English Fourths of July—was born in Philadelphia in 1776. It is English; it is not American. For the Declaration of Independence was written by an English subject. Every name signed on it was the name of a British subject, and there was not an American in America except the Indians out on the plains. Americans did not begin until seven years later. . . . Lest we forget, let us always call to mind that we owe these things to England, and let us be able to say to Old England, the grey-haired, venerable old mother of ours: 'You gave us our Fourth of July and you gave us our Declaration of Independence, which is the charter of our rights. You, the venerable mother of liberties, the protector of Anglo-Saxon freedom—you gave us these things, and we do most earnestly thank you for them.”

IN the new number of the Hibbert Journal Mr. Bruce Wallace tells of the “Alpha Union” as an attempt to realise the suggestion made by Mr. R. J. Campbell in the April number for a union of all religious liberals. There is also an explanatory pamphlet, “The Alpha Union,” published (1½d. by post) by the Union at Letchworth (Garden City). The late Mr. A. C. Swinton, of Hindhead, left £3,000 to Trustees, of whom Mr. Bruce Wallace is one, to found such a Union, which has taken its name from a book published by the late E. N. Dennys, a friend of Mr. Swinton’s, in 1851. The Union aims at a spiritual catholicity and at the promotion of a higher social order. Membership in the Union is open to all who sympathise, and the annual subscription is 1s. Brotherhood, which is issued quarterly by Mr. Bruce Wallace (1s. 2d. by post, for the year), and since 1887 has been pleading for “the peaceful evolution of a juster and happier social order,” is now the organ of the Union. Both the pamphlet and the note in the Hibbert tell of a lending library which is being organised, and a summer school to be held in August.

As to the aim of the “Alpha Union,” the pamphlet says:—

“Not otherwise than through a spiritual awakening will a genuine uplift come to any age or generation. The religious need of to-day is not a return to mediævalism, nor a resurrection of Reformation theology, nor a reproduction of the eighteenth-century Evangelical movement, but the awakening of people to their eternal spiritual nature, and their living progressively in this new age, with all its new resources, the life of Spirit. This new Union will work, it is hoped, for a spiritual revival which will burst the incrustations of the past and make for itself many new, timely, and effective expressions.

“It aspires to be a Union of people seeking, for themselves and for all their fellows, a higher harmonising consciousness, a higher vantage ground of understanding, from which to work for bringing good into everybody’s consciousness and experience.

“If the churches never allowed ‘the traditions of the elders’ to obscure the revelation that is ever renewed in the souls that learn of the Father; if they were not sometimes quarrelling among themselves over sectional interests which are only illusory; if they always recognised as the gist of ‘the law and the prophets’ what Jesus Christ declared it to be; if they kept themselves constantly free from bondage to the letter which killeth and open to the Spirit which giveth life; there would then perhaps be no use for the Alpha Union. But, as things are, inside the churches as well as outside, there is need for men to encourage each other in the quest of a deeper realisation of what man is, and in the quest of a manner of life and inter-relation on this globe more worthy of the children of Eternal Spirit; that thus they may reinforce one another by coming into closer mutual relations. Whether with the assistance of churches or without it, or even, if necessary sometimes, in the face of opposition from some of them, the Alpha Union will work for an understanding of life and for ideals essentially Christian.

“In brief, the Alpha Union will endeavour to help people to clearer thought on both spiritual and social questions. Its members will be banded together primarily for promoting their own and each other’s education, and the education of as many as they can influence, in the true understanding of life and in the consequent power to draw upon the Infinite for a life of service worth living.”

THE Atlantic Monthly for June contains an article by Dr. S. M. Crothers on “The Colonel in the Theological Seminary.” Those who were present at the London Ministers’ Meeting in Whit-week, 1906, will remember the humour of the situation, and will be glad to make closer acquaintance with the Colonel’s application of sound military principles to ministerial duty. He was a man of noble nature, impressed by the waste and cruelty of physical strife, rejoicing in the thought of the coming triumph of arbitration; and yet he gloried in soldierly virtues. Then the thought of the world as a spiritual battlefield took possession of him, and the place of the Church Militant in it. “He saw at once the irrepressible conflict between those who were banded together on behalf of a spiritual ideal and the forces of sensuality and selfishness. ‘Here is something,’ he said, ‘that can’t be arbitrated. It must be fought out. The Church Militant has, I believe, the right of it, but the question is, is it strong enough to win out? Has it mobilised all its forces, and is it prepared to assume the strategical offensive?’” So he welcomed eagerly his appointment to the Chair of Military Science in the Theological Seminary.

WITH genial satire Dr. Crothers makes his Colonel teach the fundamentals of ministerial duty. Thus he tells of his experience at a certain ministers’ meeting, when, after listening to a discussion, the Colonel broke out: “Gentlemen, I understood that this was to be a council of war. Instead of a plan of campaign you seem to have brought out a clinical thermometer in order to take each other’s temperature. On the eve of an engagement the question is not how you feel, but what you intend to do. Nobody is interested in your symptoms. The only temper which befits men who are called to leadership is that which Wordsworth describes in his character of the Happy Warrior.” Then there is a most amusing description of a sermon: “I went to church yesterday, and witnessed a series of operations that filled me with dismay. The minister began by seizing a text as a base of operations. I observed that the base was not secure, but this made less difference, as he was evidently prepared to change his base if the exigencies of the engagement demanded it. His first mistake was one of over-caution. In order to defend himself from an attack from the Higher Critics he had strengthened his front by barbed wire entanglements in the way of exegesis. This was an error of judgment, as the Higher Critics were not in the field, at least in sufficient force to take the offensive. The entanglements intended to keep a hypothetical foe from getting at him prevented him from getting at once at the real enemy. He thus lost the psychological moment for attack.” Other bewildering evolutions followed, and finally the Colonel came to the conclusion that the preacher had no objective in his sermon, and didn’t even know that he should have one!

THIS article should be read and discussed in all theological colleges, and, indeed, by all who have the effective force of the ministry at heart. One more quotation we must be allowed to make. The Colonel is discussing the present crisis in the Church:—“The Christian Church is at this moment engaged in this most perilous, but often necessary manœuvre—a change of base in the face of the enemy, and as a part of a grand forward movement. There is a call for courage at the front, but the question is in regard to the communications. The line of communication, with the base in Infallible Authority, has been cut; the necessity is to establish free and adequate communication with the ample supplies which are believed to exist in the Religious Nature of Man, and in the Spiritual Realities of the Universe. If this can be done in time, the advance against the strongholds of sin can go on; if not, there is sure to be disaster. It is to arrest this disaster that you are to put forth all your efforts.”

“DR. CAIRO’S retirement from the Mastership of Balliol, owing to the state of his health,” says the writer of the Oxford Notes in last Saturday’s Athenæum, “is a sad blow to the College, which found in him a successor to Jowett and to Lewis Nettleship in one. But at least he can console himself with the thought that he has left the rudder in safe hands. All Balliol men are friends and lovers of Mr. Strachan Davidson, and think of him as perhaps the keenest and most devoted in a college where all are keen and devoted.”

MISS HELEN BARTRAM, M.A. (Dublin), a daughter of the late Richard Bartram, has just been appointed Head Mistress of the new London County Council Secondary School in St. Pancras. Miss Bartram was a scholar at the North London Collegiate School, founded by the late Miss Buss, and now under the Head Mistress-ship of Mrs. Bryant, D.Sc., Litt.D. On gaining a St. Dunstan’s scholarship she proceeded to Girton College, Cambridge, and subsequently trained at Bedford College, London. For the last ten years she has been an assistant mistress at her old school.

THE feeding of the rivers and the purifying of the winds are the least of the services appointed to the hills. To fill the thirst of the human heart for the beauty of God’s working—to startle its lethargy with the deep and pure agitation of astonishment—are their higher missions.—Ruskin.

ALL inmost things, we may say, are melodious; naturally utter themselves in song. The meaning of song goes deep. Poetry, therefore, we will call musical thought. See deep enough, and you see musically; the heart of Nature being everywhere music, if you can only reach it.—Carlyle.

LITERARY NOTES AND NEWS

IN a recent review of Mr. Wilfrid Scawen Blunt's "A Secret History of the Occupation of Egypt," the Athenæum took the author pretty severely to task for the publication without leave of a number of important letters in his possession. Mr. Blunt has replied in a long letter with a vigorous defence of his action. His plea is to the effect that he could not write true history and correct popular misconceptions without giving the text of the letters in question, and that if he had asked for leave it would probably have been refused. With the particular matter in dispute we are not concerned here; but the question of literary ethics is one of great and constantly recurring interest.

* * *

"HISTORY," says Mr. Blunt, "unless it is to become a mere stereotyping of the daily insincerities of Parliamentary and journalistic life, must keep itself free from every rule except that of telling the plain and simple truth, gleaned from whatever quarter, public or private, confidential or proclaimed." To this the editor of the Athenæum makes the following cogent reply: "The point at issue is, At what date does history begin? Mr. Blunt can hardly think that his publication of the secret letters of Sir Edward Hamilton written from Downing-street during an official career not yet ended is in accordance with the judgment of the best guardians of English honour."

* * *

ANOTHER question also occurs, namely, What are the limits of history? Does every man who speaks in public, or writes a book, or guides a movement, enter the domain of history, and become subject to this rule? If so, there is no restriction to the possible violation of private correspondence, and many of the intimacies of life would be at an end. Fortunately for most of us, there is a truth of honour which is paramount over the truth of history for which Mr. Blunt pleads. When confidence is given and accepted among contemporaries there is a mutual, if unspoken, pledge of secrecy and silence which can only be annulled by mutual consent.

MANY writers and publicists have expressed themselves with energy upon this subject. A collection of eminent opinions would be interesting reading, and we should be greatly surprised if they were not almost unanimously upon one side. To such a collection we are able to add two letters of exceptional value. The first is from Miss Harriet Martineau. It is dated "Amble-side, March 3, 1869," and the significant passage is as follows:—

"I am glad you have written to me; and I think you will be even more glad by the time you have come to the end of my answer. My objection is to the unauthorised publication of private letters. The ground of the objection is plain enough—that the practice destroys the confidence which should exist between correspondents as between conversers. If it would be wrong to publish tête-à-tête conversations without leave, it must be wrong to publish letters written in the same confidence. Everybody recoils from the idea of doing the one, while, every day, somebody is doing the other without scruple or shame. It is from want of thought, I really believe; for I have never met with anybody who did not agree with me when the subject was brought clearly before them. Authorisation by the speaker or writer removes the objection, of course, in both cases."

* * *

THE other expression of opinion is, if possible, more interesting in view of the controversy which arose later over the Carlyle correspondence. It is dated 5, Cheyne-row, Chelsea, May 24, 1871. It is written for Carlyle by his niece, and is to the following effect: "In reply to your note, which Mr. Carlyle received yesterday morning, he bids me say, as you are so kind as to consult his wishes on the subject, that, although the letter to Mr. Robinson is of no moment, he would much prefer that it should not be published, as he has a great objection to have his private letters made public to the world." The Mr. Robinson referred to is evidently Henry Crabb Robinson, of the Diary.

* * *

THE celebration of the centenary of Garibaldi's birth should revive the waning interest in the fascinating literature which has gathered round the movement for Italian Unity. Mr. G. M. Trevelyan has paid a fine tribute to Garibaldi's memory in his recent book entitled "Garibaldi's Defence of the Roman Republic," which deals with his career up to 1849. It is welcome news that the same author is engaged upon another volume, which will complete the story. Among other books which we hope will be in request just now are "The Liberation of Italy, 1815-1870," by the Countess Evelyn Martinengo Cesaresco, and "Italian Characters in the Epoch of Unification," by the same writer. The moral passion and patriotic idealism of the movement glow through the pages of Mrs. Hamilton King's poem, "The Disciples." There is also the life of Mazzini, by Bolton King in the "Temple Biographies." But for some of us the most dearly prized volume of all will be "Joseph Mazzini: A Memoir by E. A. V., with two Essays by Mazzini, 'Thoughts on Democracy' and 'The Duties of Man'"; for it was here that we first met the prophetic soul of the Resorgimento face to face. For many the reading of this book has been like a sacred rite of initiation into the religion of democracy. It has widened the moral horizon and implanted an ineffaceable reverence for the dedicated life. We wonder that some publisher does not include this beautiful book among his cheap re-issues for the sake of those who cannot count the original edition among their treasures.

* * *

LONDON is a changed place in the last twenty years. Many of the book-lover's favourite haunts are no more. Bookseller's-row can be only a tradition to the rising generation, and now we hear almost with incredulity that Oxford-street will know Westell's shop no more. It has moved with the times into Charing Cross-road. But what memories the old shop recalls of the days when books were scarce and pence were few. How we used to make our way timidly and after long delay through the piles of books to ask the price of some tempting volume, and then went home triumphant, sympathising heartily with the covetous joy of Charles Lamb!

IT is said that Mr. Westell is writing his reminiscences. When they are published they should be of special interest to the crowd of modest bookmen who have never been to a sale at Sotheby's. There is as much genuine romance in the book purchases of the poor scholar as in the collection, with the aid of a long purse, of rare editions or tall copies or exquisite bindings; and it is for the scholar and the serious reader that Mr. Westell has catered chiefly. The "Book Monthly" for June contained a chatty article about his relations with some of his remarkable customers, and especially with Gladstone, "the nicest customer I ever had in every way," so Mr. Westell called him. "We have few book buyers left like Mr. Gladstone," he confessed to his interviewer, "none, within my knowledge, to compare with him, but fewer, I mean, who go to work on his lines. He bought all sorts of books likely to be useful, although classical and theological works chiefly interested him, while Horace and Dante were his favourite authors. The new sort of book collector runs more after first editions than merely good books, and this is the most striking change which I should note as having taken place in the English second-hand book trade since I have been in it."

* * *

A book which will have a personal interest for many of our readers is announced by Messrs. Sherratt & Hughes, of Manchester. It is called "The Secret Fancies of a Business Man." The table of contents reveals it to be a volume of poems. The author is Mr. James R. Beard. We congratulate him on the happiness which his pleasant fancies have brought him in private, and we wish him heartily bon voyage in his new adventure with the public.

POSTSCRIPT.—It has come to my knowledge that an epithet which I used in a brief reference to Dr. Warschauer's book a few weeks ago is considered offensive. I sincerely regret it, and apologise for the lapse into bad manners of my journalistic pen. I desire to exercise towards all men, and to claim from them, Christian charity and just judgment.

WORDSWORTH IN HIS OWN COUNTRY.*

"It was at Grasmere, in 1903, that Mr. New and I met to settle the project of this little book and the form in which it should be presented to the public. We visited Dove Cottage together; we walked through the churchyard where Wordsworth lies so quietly, listening to the soft voice of the river he loved; we went to Far Easdale, and on another day followed the stream that falls from the deep hollow of Easdale Tarn till it reaches the alders near Steel Bridge; we were companions of the Rothay as it runs, with a young man's strength, from Pelter Bridge to the meadows of Ambleside; we talked together of all the mountains that surround the valley—of Fairfield and Great Rigg, of Stone Arthur and Seat Sandal, of Loughrigg and Silver How, great creatures of the flying mist and the quiet stars, whose names and characters, through a poet's power, are dear to England and the lovers of beauty beyond the shores of England. I felt with him that the poetry of Wordsworth when he dealt with the scenery of the Lake Country had not yet been fully illustrated, that the artists, seduced by the picturesque, had not sufficiently realised that spiritual essence of the landscape and its parts—the soul of lonely places—which Wordsworth made the foundation of his poetry of nature."

So Mr. Stopford Brooke writes at the beginning of his preface to this new Wordsworth book, and concludes it with a letter from the artist, explaining how he came to attempt this series of drawings, and to ask Mr. Brooke's help in producing the volume.

Wordsworth and Nature, Mr. New says, had for years been to him mutual interpreters, and when he went for the first time to the Lakes it brought a new revelation to him, both of Nature's wealth and beauty and of Wordsworth's power.

"Now that I had seen his lakes, his streams, his mountains and rocks, it seemed as if my eyes were opened. I felt that no one who had not visited the scenes which were ever before him (or, when absent, ever cherished by that 'inward eye') could fully understand the Poems; and I determined to make a set of drawings of the country, such as would form a sort of pictorial commentary on the verses, and explain, so far as I was able to make them, what Wordsworth meant by 'rocks and stones and trees,' by mountain, stream, and lake."

Then Mr. New was fortunate enough to obtain the generous and sympathetic help of Mr. Stopford Brooke in the production of his work, not indeed in "a little book," but in a volume substantial and beautiful in form, which lovers of Wordsworth and the Lakes will delight to have. The poems selected by Mr. Brooke, following the method of Professor William Knight, are arranged in chronological order, and the illustrations also, interspersed among the poems, are grouped in a somewhat similar order, representing scenes first at Cocker-mouth, the poet's birthplace, then at Hawkeshead, where he was at school, and afterwards about the homes of his mature life in the Lake Country, at Grasmere and Rydal. Thus they do not, strictly speaking, illustrate the poems, but rather the scenes amid which the poet's mind was nurtured and came to its fulness of expression. The selection of the poems is a large one, 183 in all, including thirteen passages from the "Prelude" and seven from the "Excursion," and there are only 40 illustrations. Thus, of necessity, "many subjects closely interwoven with the poet's thought" are left out (e.g., the Blea Tarn of the "Excursion"), "but I have tried," says Mr. New, "to include pictures of almost all the various parts which combine in making the English Lake Country so eminently beautiful, and in giving so much variety and picturesqueness to the Poems."

The illustrations are reproduced from Mr. New's pen and ink drawings, as in his illustrations of White's "Selborne" and Isaac Walton, and many other books. They cannot represent all the subtleties of light and shade, which the first pencil sketches made on the spot more nearly approached, "but the difficulty of satisfactory reproduction," he says, "together with a feeling that the simple directness of pen and ink was, in a sense, harmonious with Wordsworth's theory of severe poetic diction, decided me to give as much as I could of the character and beauty of the landscape by conceiving it in clear and ordered thought, and expressing it by means of line, in a clear and ordered manner. Such was my intention; the measure of my success and failure is not for me to gauge. I hope these drawings will at least persuade many lovers of Wordsworth's Poems to visit his haunts for themselves, for there only can the right illustrations of his Poems be found."

Mr. Stopford Brooke's judgment of the illustrations is: "When I saw them, I thought that they would not only make that beautiful country more dear to those who loved it, but the poetry which released its soul for us, nearer and more consoling to the heart of man. The spirit which pervades them is in harmony with the spirit in which Wordsworth walked the hills and by the streams, and lived with the shepherds of the valley."

The frontispiece shows Rydal Mount, Wordsworth's home for the latter half of his life (for 37 years) as it was in his time, and the last illustration is of the quiet grave in Grasmere churchyard. Of the other pictures, some of the happiest are the quaint bits of Hawkeshead, including Dame Tyson's cottage, where the boy Wordsworth lived when he was there at school, Grasmere Church, Dove Cottage, and the side view at Rydal Mount (p. 225) showing the window of Wordsworth's bedroom under the little gable roof, with a glimpse of the hill beyond. Others, such as that of Easdale Beck (p. 203) and the Rash Field, Rydal (p. 249), give with quiet truthfulness details of the country, the stream hidden away for a time in a leafy shade, and again the grassy slope of the hill, out of which, in places, the rocks appear and the trunks of stalwart trees. But most completely Mr. New helps us to realise that we are with Wordsworth among his hills in the pictures of Grasmere Lake (p. 129) with Helm Crag and the distance over Dunmail Raise, the two of Green-head Ghyll (pp. 193 and 199) associated with the poem of "Michael," and of Easdale and Far Easdale (pp. 215 and 219). These have given us the keenest pleasure, and especially those of Far Easdale and the Green-head Ghyll valley. In this last there is the very spirit of the lonely hills.

But Mr. New's are not the only pictures in this book. Mr. Stopford Brooke's Introduction furnishes others, and we must have the pleasure of reproducing two of them here.

"Grasmere is a lovely piece of earth and water, a hollow cup of meadows, woods, and lake, the sides of which are mountain slopes. The little village, with its gray church and yard, half-clasped by the clear and murmuring river, is dropped on one side of the Vale like a jewelled cross on a maiden's bosom. No stream is of a purer crystal than the Rothay as it runs among the flat meadows it has itself created to the lake in which from year to year, in frequent calm, the mountains admire themselves and sleep. A hidden place, sequestered from the world, its beauty is soft, softer than slumber; yet the beauty is so various and so full that the senses and the soul of those who love the valley are touched every moment by some new impression, so tenderly, so delicately given, that the main impression of soothing and gentle quiet is not diminished but enhanced. All that tender healing which the poetry of Wordsworth has bestowed on the wounds of England was brought to the heart of the poet by the sweet charity of his own valley. It was a spirit in his singing."

And again:—

"Moreover, I imagine that the deep quiet of Grasmere Lake, and the deep silence of the lonely places among the hills (for all the streams are small and therefore do no injury to stillness), instilled into his verse not only its love of quiet things, but its philosophic calmness of thought, its serenity of feeling. There are many still dwellings and aspects of nature, but few can be more still, or better image a quiet mind, than the Lake of Grasmere when every breath of wind is asleep. For half the year it is as placid as a slumbering child. The water passes into the meadows that border it, and the meadows into the water, so evanescent is the line between, so clear are the reflections. The sky and clouds are as deep in the midst of the lake as they are high above its surface. And when this quiet is on the lake the whole cup of the valley up to the mountain tops seems filled with the water of stillness: and the soul is filled with it to the brim."

Thus artist and poet have conspired together to illustrate Wordsworth, and we are grateful to them for their gift. There is much more in Mr. Brooke's Introduction, but we must leave it here, very sure that it will find many eager readers. The cover of the book is sprinkled over with Wordsworth's daffodils and daisies. It is a book to be treasured and enjoyed in quietness.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

IN this month's Contemporary, Mr. George Barlow writes on "Optimism and Pessimism," an article in which he contrasts the happy faith of the religious leaders of some thirty years ago, including Kingsley, Miss Cobbe, Mazzini, Theodore Parker, Tennyson, and George Macdonald, with the darker thoughts of more recent years, since the spread of theosophy and occultisms generally, and the disillusionment of the South African and the Russo-Japanese wars. Undoubtedly we are compelled now to see more clearly and feel more keenly the dark and painful aspects of life (Mr. Barlow honours Mr. Stopford Brooke as the last of the great Optimists)—but there is as much danger in exaggerating the possibilities of occult evil as in a too ready optimism. It does not appear to us that one gets nearer the sober truth by a return to the Biblical conception of the Diabolical. In an article on "Man and his Brother," the Countess Martinengo Cesaresco contributes a very interesting study of pre-historic man and his relation to other animals. Mr. G. G. Coulton concludes his study of "Priests and People before the Reformation," and in an article on "The Comparative Criticism of Semitic Literature," Dr. Buchanan Gray comments on Mr. Weir's article in the March Contemporary on "Higher Criticism and the Koran." In the Nineteenth Century and After, Mr. D. C. Lathbury writes on "Dis-establishment," and is not afraid of the financial problem for the Church and Churchmen, but appears to be willing still to put up with the drawbacks of an Establishment rather than run the great risks of having matters of controversy prematurely closed, as they probably would be, if the Church were liberated from State control. The Abbé Houtin contributes an article entitled "The Views of an Anglican Ultramontane," in criticism of the views concerning the Church in France expressed last month in the same review and in the Church Quarterly for April, by the Countess de Franqueville (née Lady Sophia Palmer). The Abbé describes very forcibly the unfortunate position in which the bishops were placed by the Pope's refusal to allow any acceptance of the conditions of the Law of Separation. As for the "unity" of which Madame spoke, it is, he says, "a mere façade, both as regards discipline and doctrine. Our bishops have been passively unanimous, like loyal generals who desire to be faithful to their commander-in-chief, even when they are perfectly well aware that he is leading them to disaster. There was, there is, only one way of creating a living and fruitful unity in the Church of France; it is to make the plenary assemblies of the bishops supreme. Will the Vatican ever permit that?"

In the Albany Review Mr. J. Arthur Hill writes on "Mysticism" with much welcome insight, though, as it seems to us, he does very scant justice at the outset to the argument from design as it may now be stated in the light of the doctrine of evolution. But Mysticism is his real subject, and this is his conclusion:—"Meanwhile, however, Rationalist and Mystic will continue to be rationalist and mystic, and neither will convince the other that he is in error. And it may be that in each case the individual soul is traversing a necessary part of its pilgrimage—passing through a necessary phase of its education—and is not really on a wrong track. Both may be right, but their paths lie wide apart, and the hill of Truth which lies between must necessarily present different features to each. We hold the faith that Truth is One—is God—though manifest in diverse forms; let us not deny the vision of one who sees what to us is invisible." Mr. G. W. E. Russell has an article on "Garibaldi," with warmly appreciative reference to Mr. G. M. Trevelyan's "Garibaldi's Defence of the Roman Republic."

In this month's Cornhill Mr. A. C. Benson begins a new series of pleasant essays, "At Large," describing a summer settlement he has made for himself, and incidentally for his friends, in an old house in the midst of the Fens. Canon Barnett has a wise essay on the Recreation of the People, which ends on a happy note of hope: "As a conclusion of the whole matter I would say how it seems to me that Merrie England need be not only in the past. The present time is the best of times. There are to-day resources for men's enjoyment such as never existed in any other age or country. There are fresh and pure capacities in human nature which are evident in many signs of energy and of admiration, and of goodwill. If the resources were used, if the capacities were developed, there would soon be popular recreations to attract human longings and encourage the hope of a future when the glory of England shall not be in its possessions of gold and territory, but in a people happy in the full use of their powers of heart and of head."

In the World's Work one of the most attractive articles, fully illustrated, is on "New Zealand of To-day." Mr. J. J. Conway writes on "Municipal Ownership in Paris," and Constance Smedley on "An Old-fashioned Vocation: Guardian of the Poor."

THE July number of the Mill Hill Pulpit contains the sixth of the Rev. C. Hargroves' series on "Thirty Years' Changes of Religious Thought," the subject being "The Worth of Miracles." Of miracles in the sense of Divine marvels Mr. Hargrove says:—

"They are of to-day, of every day! Look and you shall see them around you, and make no demands of the past to furnish you with proofs of God, for 'the heavens declare His glory and the earth shows His handiwork and day unto day utters speech and night unto night shows knowledge.' Every day, every night, every land, they are full of miracles; why seek afar when God is within?" But as to miracles in the old sense of a marvel outside the manifest order of the world, of special evidential value, he says, in conclusion:—

"The demand for miracles, the dependence on them, the fear of giving them up, and the strenuous defence of them, are all symptoms of little faith, of hardness of heart, of insensibility to God's Presence 'in all and through all and over all.' We need no miracles if we believe in God."

OBITUARY.

MRS. HENRY CURRER BRIGGS.

TEN months ago all Leeds was mourning the loss of one of its best and ablest citizen servants, cut off in the flower of his age. Now in the fulness of years the mother has followed the son, well worthy each of the other, both animated by the same high motives and both devoted to the public welfare.

Mrs. Briggs was a daughter of Edward Shepherd, late governor of Wakefield Prison. One or another member of the family had held this position at York, Beverley, Chichester, and other places for 150 years; and so Mr. Shepherd had, as it were, grown up to the calling and devoted himself to his work with the earnest desire to benefit the poor outcasts of human society which the law had given to his charge. He was one of the pioneers of prison reform, and his Unitarian faith prompted him to give his life to the service of his fellows.
